And so society is face to face with two conflicting theories of right. The undeniable social right of the employee under certain circumstances to employment and just relations in that employment, and the equally undeniable right of the proprietor under present legal conditions to do what he pleases with his own property. The result to which it all comes, in my judgment, is twofold. We may either modify the theory of private property applied to that relation or we may socialize the property itself. I take it that the Nation would not be ready for the latter course, but in a purely suggestive way, with a view of relieving the conditions that may prove serious for the peace of the Republic itself, I want to say that it seems to me that it might be worth the time of this commission to inquire whether the public utility in the ways you know, might not be called in some preventive fashion, when these industrial strifes threaten, to determine the facts—to determine the merits of the controversy so that the views of society could speak, and speak with the efficacy it usually does, that is, with the influence of determining the controversy itself.

That is all I wish to say on that subject. Do you wish me to proceed along the other line?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; you may proceed.

Congressman LEWIS. With regard to the telephone communication, I may say that I have given it some two years of study, under the limitations of the layman, however, and not with the advantages of the skilled telephone engineer. It will be natural for the commission to ask for some principle upon which the action is proposed. In short, is there anything about the telephone instrumentality, as well as the telegraphic, that distinguishes it from the ordinary postal communication, or does it more properly fall within the line and under the rules applicable to private industry?

I wish to say to the commission that in taking a position on this subject one needs not necessarily to characterize himself as a socialist or as an individualist. Indeed, after much thought and experience, I have come to the conclusion that glibly as we may assign ourselves to one or the other principles of thought, very, very few of us really are socialists or individualists or communists, but that, on the other hand, we are all three; that there is hardly a man to be found that does not believe that the present method—at least legal proprietorships as a method of conducting the farm is the most efficacious, that communism as applied to the public roads and public schools is a principle sound in itself, and that socialism, as we see it in the post office most markedly, has been sustained by the experience of mankind. The truth of the matter is that no nation up to date has been so narrow as to make itself a one-fingered institution. It has used all those principles and has found them necessary for the proper action of society and development of the public welfare.

Now, when we come to the field of communication, I wish to call the attention of the commission to what may prove only a too elaborate statement of the characterizing facts.

First, it is to be noted that our country stands alone among the great nations in allowing the electrical communication to be handed over to the private financier. Is there any reason in the United States calling for that distinct kind of departure? None that I can find or that has been pointed out so far. The truth of the matter is that the telephone and telegraph present the same economic and the same social characteristics in the United States that they present elsewhere, and that we have a right to proceed upon the assumption that reasoning applied elsewhere is fairly applicable here. I ought to ask the commission what the limitation of time will be, because there are a great many facts to present.

Chairman WALSH. There are no other witnesses here this afternoon, Mr. Lewis.

Congressman LEWIS. First, I wish to say that the telephone and telegraph functions are inherently monopolistic in their nature. No one should wish to have two telephone agencies in the same office. Nobody can really gain advantage by having two telegraph offices, as we have in the National Capitol, each at the side of the other. Competition in the telephone field is ineffective to cure this well-known effect of human instinct where it has the power to fix the price without the veto power upon the part of the consumer, and that has proven equally true in the telegraphic field. Society, therefore, because it is a postal function, and again because it is a monopolistic function, ought to consider the propriety of taking over those two functions. But there is another reason, a qualifying reason, and one which I urge as of very great importance. There is throughout every community a well-settled conviction that somehow or other men will not work for the Government with the same earnestness that they work when supervised by the self-interest of a private employer.

Mr. Chairman, I concede that that statement contains a very large element of truth, but there are exceptions to it. Now, those exceptions consist of the cases where the work can be precisely assigned out in advance, its quantity measured, and the task of each man fixed and the conditions of his service determined at the time of his employment. The city letter carrier is an illustration of that. His work each day, his route, is fixed, and his failure to perform his services, his delinquency, will almost automatically check itself. The rural route in a less perfect way is another illustration. And so it may be said of the telephone communication and of the telegraph, where the flow of traffic in any particular office has been ascertained, the amount of work which the employees should do, the number of hours the employees should work, can all be safely and thoroughly determined in advance, and their failure to make good as employees adequately checked. Therefore, without going into other fields of thought, we have the conditions which justify social interference in the field of electrical communication. It is an inherent monopoly. The work can be adequately done, and society will be free from "soldering" upon the part of its employees.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to call the attention of the commission to the particular facts of an economic and social character which, independent of general reasoning, call upon us in the United States to postalize those institutions here as elsewhere. First, let me say that when you have a monopoly of a character where the law of increasing returns may be said to apply, in such an instance society, acting for itself, can produce much higher economic and social results or products than the private financier, for the following reasons, which I shall read because of the precision of their statement. They are taken from the work of Prof. Henry C. Adams, a very just celebrity, on "The State and its Relation to Industrial Action."

"A monopoly has the following advantages if it is conducted under the public-service motive:

"(a) Unity and exclusiveness of organization.

"(b) Details of management well worked out.

"(c) Facility for extension by mere duplication of existing structure.

"(d) A social demand for the service which is widespread and constant.

"(e) Adequate ability in authority.

"We may expect the following results:

"(f) Service at less cost than if broken into groups.

"(g) Assured demands for service admits of closest calculations.

"(h) Extent of demands admits of most minute division of labor.

"(i) Absence of rivalry reduces to a minimum the amount of capital and other expenditures necessary for the performance of the service.

"(j) Speculative management is eliminated.

"(k) And thus with a public-service motive—

"(l) The maximum of cheapness and efficiency is rendered possible."

Now, a word or two as to the possible service motive. It must be recognized that the rules of private financing and the rules of public financing are inherently different in their objects, and that is said without any purpose to depreciate one or to glorify the other. The private financier is the private investor. His motive for making the investment is the fact that determines whether he will make the investment or not. Naturally the rate of return to be expected is what he is looking to as a fact, and if you say to him the return is to be too low or the return is to be absolutely uncertain, he makes no investment at all.

Now, it so happens that as a general rule, especially with monopolies, the higher the price fixed by the financier the greater will be the profit, with certain qualifications against insane excessiveness in price. It also happens, under those circumstances, where the private financier is in control and you have a monopoly subject to the law of increasing returns, that the higher the price fixed the lower will be the utilization of the plant in his control. But without going further with academic statements, I wish to give a concrete illustration.

There was running from Chicago to Milwaukee for many years a little telegraph line known as the Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph Co. For many years it conducted a service of 10 cents per telegram, the telegrams being mostly delivered by phone to stock exchanges. After a time the Western Union, not liking that any too well, for obvious reasons, entered into competition with it, and they had a 5-cent rate between the two cities during the time of the competitive struggle. That competitive struggle ended as they usually do. They agreed and a 15-cent rate was established between the towns. Under the 15-cent rate the Chicago & Milwaukee Telegraph Co., in 1909, did a business of 103,000 telegrams; but a year later a subsidiary of the Bell telephone system acquired this little telegraph plant, and the rate was immediately raised to 25 cents per telegram. The next year the telegraph business fell to 57,000 telegrams. In short, an increase of 60 per cent in the rate had worked a decrease of nearly 50 per cent in the product in the social service rendered by the institution to the people of Milwaukee and Chicago. This is said without censure of any of the parties concerned. The old concern at 15 cents was making, I think, about 3 per cent dividends. That return was not adequate to private capital. The new concern, by cutting the business down one-half through raising the rate about 60 per cent, was able to discharge two telegraph operators and two messengers, and I think they come out about 5 per cent in the way of a return after they reformed this plant according to the laws of the private financier.

Now, in contrast with that, let us present the public-service motive as apposite to this field of action. When the parcel-post law passed Congress—of which I may explain I had the honor to prepare the House version—it was reformed in the Senate until the rates were made so high that only the express rates exceeded them in scandal; but happily a provision was inserted in the law giving the Postmaster General the same power over the postal rates in that respect as a railroad president has to conduct the service on his road. It was my pleasure to go to the Postmaster General a few weeks after his appointment and suggest that the rates on the shorter zone, say, the 150-mile zone, be cut down from 4 cents per pound to 1 and on the 50-mile zone from 3 cents to 1 and other changes that have since taken place. Now, how did the Postmaster General reason on that subject? He reasoned according to the instincts of the public financier. He said, "If I am assured that these rates will pay the cost of the service"—and he was so assured—"but even if some uncertainty exists, I am justified in making the reductions in the rates proposed, because the post office and the people being identical terms, if I should lose 1 per cent in one pocket I gain 100 per cent in the other pocket in the form of social service rendered."

Let it be said for his ability to reason and to act that the profits under a traffic that actually trebled under the influence of these normal rates—these rational postal rates—the profits are quite as great as they would have been under the old restricted rates. In short, the Postmaster General proceeds, as the illustration suggests, upon wholly different rules of financing from those he would apply himself in the State of Texas if he were conducting a hotel of his own or a street-car line, or, indeed, was sinking an oil well and selling the products. The laws of private financing are as distinct from those of public financing as the night is from the day.

Now, let us see what the effect of that private financing has been in the United States on the subject of our telegraph and telephone rates. I have all the supportive data and statistics before me, but will give only conclusions, because it would take hours to supply all the data in detail.

We will take first our telegraphic rate and we will compare it with New Zealand's. I take New Zealand for comparison because New Zealand compares with the United States in wage levels, in social habits, in education, and in tradition, in the purchasing power of the people as expressed in dollars and cents, and as one State in the United States compares with another. Now, in New Zealand the rate is 12 cents for 12 words, good all over the island, comparable, let us say, to the State of New York. And what is the effect of that rate? In 1912 the telegraph business of New Zealand amounted to 9 telegrams per person. In the United States the rate is just twice that in New Zealand, with higher rate for longer distances. The number of telegrams in the United States in 1912 was 1.15—about 1.1 telegrams per person against 9 in the little State of New Zealand.

Now, of course, the suggestion comes at once that perhaps in this country, because of its character, state of development, the interurban telephone has taken the place of the telegraph. That is true, to a certain extent, but it does not answer the difficulty of low social utilization in the United States, for we rank only ninth among the nations with respect to the use of the telegraph, and when you combine the number of long distance and interurban telephone conversations with the number of telegrams you find that instead of ranking first we rank thirteenth among the peoples of the world. In short, the same phenomenon of prohibitive rates is found in the telephonic field as is found in the telegraphic field, both fields being combined under the rule of the private financier who makes rates on the principle that the higher the rate the greater the profits—who makes his rate as the hotel people in the city of New York make their rates, and for the same reason.

Now, we come to the local telephone rate, and it is hard to be in New York City and not make a concrete illustration of these rates. First, let me say with respect to the local rates, we have the lowest postage rates the world over except with a single instance, which I will mention. The postage rates of the United States are the lowest in the world with the single exception of Japan, where the letter rate is a cent and a half per letter. Even our parcel-post rates, for the shorter distances, in the very infancy of the development of that institution, are only half as high as they are in Great Britain, are as low as they are in Germany, and are only excelled by those of Switzerland and one or two other little countries, in the matter of shipment. But when we come to the matter of telephonic rates locally here, we find, speaking for the Bell system which represents about two-thirds of the field in this country, our local call costs on the average twice what it does for the rest of the world. The independent telephone companies of the United States get 86 cents per 100 calls; the Bell system gets $1.86 per 100 calls; and that figure represents all their plants, the little town plant with the flat rate and the unlimited service, all the way up to the New York City plant with rates which are actually the highest in the world. It happens to be a fact that the rate for a business telephone in New York to-day is as great as the unlimited business telephone rate of London, Berlin, Paris, and Stockholm combined. In other countries, with a postal motive active in the making of the rates the local call tends to cost about half as much as the postage rate—a little less than a cent; but in the United States, especially in the larger cities, the local call rate tends to run with the street-car fare, is sometimes twice a street-car fare, and I believe up to within a limit of six or eight hundred calls in this city to-day it represents about 8 cents per local call, a price for which the post office will carry a parcel from New York to Baltimore—a 4-pound parcel for 8 cents and make a fraction of a cent profit in the bargain, and that after paying the railroads adequately, too, for their services.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I come to the subject of the long-distance rate. The long-distance telephone rate of the Bell system in the United States—I speak of it, of course, not in any indicting fashion, but because it is representative of our telephone condition in a national sense more than any other—the Bell long-distance telephone rate is based on the scale of 6 mills a mile for a conversation of three minutes. Six mills a mile—what does that represent? Well, the railroads only get 7 mills a mile and a fraction for carrying a ton of freight a mile. It costs as much practically to send a long-distance telephone message over the wires as it does a ton of freight, and you, gentlemen, can realize how very weighty these conversations sometimes are over these telephones.

In the other countries in the world—and I must ask permission of the commission to read some figures—these long-distance telephone rates run from one-fourth to one-eighth of the rates required here. I will read quickly now a comparison of continental long-distance telephone rates with those of the Bell system, made on the scale of 6 mills a mile.

The average continental rate per hundred miles is 20 cents; Bell rates 60 cents.

Three hundred miles the continental rate is 37 cents; the Bell rate $1.80.

Four hundred miles the average continental rate is 39 cents; the Bell rate is $2.40.

For 500 miles the average continental rate is 46 cents; the Bell rate is $3.

Now, it must be said, to be just in this statement in regard to the rates, that they do represent some different rate conditions. The Bell people, in answer to this suggestion, say that their service represents an immediate service—not a take-your-turn service, and wait until other parties have been gratified. I shall assume that their statement on that subject is correct, because they ought to know, and it must be said, in candor, that I have not found them misrepresenting the facts in this controversy. But they give only one rate, and that is this high-priced rate for the immediate service. Postal systems are anxious to come within the reach of all kinds of patrons with all kinds of business, and make two kinds of rates. They first make the take-your-turn rate, and that is the rate I have read. You might have to wait half an hour or an hour to get your turn under those circumstances; but they also make a rate that corresponds in function with the Bell rate, an immediate-service rate, and in most of those countries that rate amounts to twice the ordinary rate. In Belgium I think it amounts to three times the ordinary rate, but even making the comparison on that basis, the long-distance telephone rates of the United States still remain the scandal of public-service rates the world over.

The Bell system itself has practically made a confession of the justice of the complaint made with regard to these rates. It is said that they could give an ordinary take-your-turn-strap-hanger service, I think they call it, at rates more or less equal to those granted in other countries; and you ask why they do not do it. Their answer is, "The public does not want such rates. They only want this high-priced service, this immediate service," which they say they give. Well, now, they are not speaking at least for one part of the public, if I may introduce my own personality. The Capitol at Washington is about 150 miles from my home. When Mrs. Lewis was not with me, it meant a letter every evening or so. I could have sat in my office or in my room and waited until they could have given me a service at 15 or 20 cents and talked to her over the phone, instead of resorting to the letter-writing art. I do know, as a man of experience, that an immense proportion of our business, an immense percentage of our affairs, are such as could wait for an hour or two or three or four hours, if a consideration like 50 per cent or 75 per cent reduction in the rate were offered as an inducement.

Now, the very natural result of this extraordinary rate is to deny society the full utilization of the telephone machine. Comparison shows that while the interurban long-distance lines of this country are utilized to the extent of only 4 per cent of their potential time—the potential being treated as every minute in the year—the German interurban lines are utilized under these very low, popular rates to the extent of 19 per cent. In short, the utilization of nearly 500 per cent is obtained on German lines as against 100 per cent here—the pure necessary and proper result of rates made by the private financier.

This may be the proper place to call attention to some recent postal history. In 1909 we have statistics showing the number of parcels carried by the express companies of this country. They numbered a little less than 300,000,000—about 3 per capita. In 1912, 1913, and 1914, an account has been taken of the number of parcels moving in the post office. We find we are moving now at the rate of 300,000,000 parcels a year by post. Not more than 50,000,000 of those parcels formerly moved by express. In other words, we have taken about 50,000,000 parcels away from them. All of which shows that 250,000,000 parcels are moving now under postal rates that never moved before in this country; that a flow of 250,000,000 parcels, or at least $2\frac{1}{2}$ per capita, has been potential in this country ever since the days of Lincoln, and that that potential traffic has been absolutely murdered by the prohibitive rates of the express companies of this country and the rules that the private financiers find necessary to apply to the express business as a squatter on the postal function.

Now, I make no doubt, sir, that the telegraphic and telephonic systems of the United States are suffering in even greater proportion as the result of these double rates. I haven't any question, sir, that the introduction of normal postal rates into the local telephone and into the long-distance telephone field would increase the utilization of those agencies of communication in a few years by many hundredfold. I know it is the habit to think very ill of the express companies, and after what I have said it is my duty to give a few facts in justification of their course. When we read about their cutting melons of 100 per cent and paying dividends in former years that were actually 100 per cent of the capital invested in the business, the inference is at once natural that they were behaving rather beyond the permissible extremes for private financiers. In short, that they were hogs. But that was not true by any means. At no time had the express company made more than 3 or 4 cents out of the average parcel carried; while its dividends on the amount invested, which was insignificant, were naturally very great, the margin of their business applicable to dividends, I think, never rose above 8 per cent. In other words, only about 8 per cent of the rate—8 per cent of the dollar that they took in—was applicable to profits; and when the rate maker comes or the financier comes to making rates that involve a margin smaller than that he is trenching upon dangerous grounds for his own investors. The express companies have that excuse for the rates of the past which have destroyed so much traffic in that field.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when you come to the objects of postalizing these functions, what are they? The functions—what are they?

The only objects that are obvious are first, to give the people of this country—in the postal field with respect to communication—a normal rate, a righteous rate. There are two other objects into which I shall briefly enter. What should be the ideal of the postal establishment in the telephone field? I am sure I should hesitate in expressing this ideal if I had formed it myself, and it is only because of the authority which I am able to quote for it that I have the courage to mention it to this commission. This authority has said there is a road to every man's house and there ought to be a telephone on the inside. That authority was Theodore N. Vail, president of the Bell telephone system. It is true the ideal was used in a well-paid magazine advertisement, and not in one of his reports to his stockholders. But the president of the Bell system, in making that very splendid expression, overlooked the facts. There is a road to every man's house; that is one fact. But that road was not built under the rules of private finance. That road was not built by private monopolists, but it was built under the influence of the social ideal, and with the financial power of that society alone. That is one idea. But what would its value be?

I come now to a subject that may seem at first somewhat foreign to the inquiry in which we are engaged, but which I think is germane, and which I trust will interest this commission. In making a study of the parcel post and express subjects I made what was to me a discovery. I found that we had plenty of wholesale transportation in the United States, but practically speaking no retail transportation except what the express companies gave under their prohibitive rates—relatively prohibitive rates—and under a service which failed again to reach the farm. I found another fact—nearly everything we eat on our table is produced originally on the farm in the retail form. I mean by that that the butter is produced roll by roll. The chickens are killed and dressed one by one. The eggs are marketed dozen by dozen. In short, farm table products begin in retail forms to suit the requirements of the ultimate consumer. But lacking retail transportation as one reason—another reason I shall reach later—instead of those retail forms going to the consumer at once, for want of a conduit, they had to pass through several expensive commercial operations. First, the buying collector went out on the farm and bought these farm supplies up, converting them from retail into wholesale quantities; that is one commercial transaction with its attendant charge for profit, insurance, waste, and the other elements involved. Then he turned them over to the wholesaler, a second commercial transaction with all its attendant charges. Then the wholesaler turned them over to the retailer, a third commercial transaction with its attendant expenses. And finally the retailer reconverted them into their original retail forms and letting the consumer have them at a price that doubles and at a smell that had not improved any during its intercourse with commercial transactions. In short, the consumer was the third or fourth purchaser even of these standardized retail forms instead of the first, and secured them in depreciated quantity as well as doubled price.

Now, we have applied to the postal establishment the transportation conduit for the movement of these retail forms from farm to kitchen. It was thought at the time, and I confess I had the hope, that a letter—the written communication—would prove sufficient to bring the farmer and the consumer together. It has in a small degree and there is a little of that traffic oozing through between farm and kitchen; but what I wish now to suggest as an objective of this legislation is this, that with telephonic communication possible between the consumer of the city and the farmer in his environments it is probable that the housewife will be able to communicate directly with the farm, as she now does with the grocer over the phone in many instances and that thus this direct transit of the retail article to the kitchen will be secured.

At present, however, under the influence of the rates we have been discussing, a very cursory and quite inadequate investigation of rates around Washington disclosed this fact, that although Washington City is completely environed by farms within 3 or 4 miles of the city limits, you would not be able to communicate from the city to a single farmer that I could find at a cost of less than 15 to 20 cents. Of course those rates were not made with a view to direct talk between the city purchaser of farm products and the farmer and are very different from the freight rates of our country that have been made, sir, with a view to moving the potential traffic.

Whatever may be said of our railroads, of their sins and delinquencies in the past, it must be said of their rate makers that they have made rates that moved the American traffic from the point of natural production to the point of natural demand. The telegraph monopoly and the telephone monopoly of the United States have utterly failed to discharge that function.

Now, sir, I come to another feature of the subject which, for conservative men, may possess a greater interest than any I have discussed; and that is the question of the relative efficiency of the postal management, of these agencies, as compared with private managements.

We hear on all sides the suggestion that no man will work for the Government, that they are loafers, and that all Government service in a sense of economy is grossly inefficient. However true that statement may be with regard to some employment by cities and States, it is not true with regard to the postal establishment. What is it that our postal establishment does? Manifestly up to date its work has been that of handling the mail. When you compare its work in that respect with the other postal establishments of the world, like Germany, France, England, and the rest, conceded to be of the best efficiency, because in the case of Germany, I believe, it is suggested that classes obtain there and that somehow or other under the class system of the Government men may be made to work where under a democracy they may not.

We find that under the American postal system in 1912 there were handled 60,000 mail pieces per employee; that was his product in work done, as against less than 40,000 for Germany and less than 40,000 for France and England; that only Belgium excelled this, with a product of 85,000 postal mailing pieces per employee. And if it is called to mind that Belgium represents a congested population, about like the State of New York in population, and even less in area, with no great rural delivery service, it will be readily seen that the American postal system ranks at the very head of all postal establishments in the efficiency of its employees; that is, in the amount of work gotten out of them as employees of the Government.

Now, how does the case stand with regard to telegraph employment? Well, in New Zealand the facts show that the average telegraph employee in the year 1912 got out a product of 4,000 telegrams and that only amounted to about 11 telegrams per man per day, but in the United States the private telegraph companies got out a product of only 2,900 telegrams per year with a daily product of 8 telegrams per employee. The comparison, however, is still unfair to New Zealand, because in New Zealand the average telegraph office had a supply of less than 13 telegrams per office per day, while the average telegraph office of the United States had a supply of 41 telegrams per office per day. In short, the telegraph employee here had four times the opportunity to work—three times the opportunity to work that the employee had in New Zealand and that circumstance again, instead of suggesting that the employee of the telegraph office here is a loafer, or soldier, brings only to mind the old principle that their rates are so high that they affect the utilization of the machine. But that does not wholly account for it. The American post office like most of its brothers, has a genius for doing small things cheaply and well. The genius springs from the fact that it possesses the power of simplicity, by which I mean to say its details are well worked out, and it has the postage stamp, which is the most wonderful accountant in the world in accuracy and economy of operation.

I have before me a computation made by an experienced telegraph man of the number of operations through which a telegram goes in the United States. There are some 24 concerned with its physical handling. Altogether there are 74 processes through which it goes. All of these processes but 24—probably all but 25—would be eliminated by the postage stamp under the postal system. Instead of possessing that institutional efficiency, in which the private financier points with such habitual pride, if the telegraph companies of this country may be taken as examples, they represent the lowest productive efficiency in the world to-day. We may safely, therefore, proceed on the theory that if our postal establishment ranks first in the work it is doing, and our telegraph companies rank lowest in efficiency in the work they are doing, I mean the product per employee paid, that the like results will attend the postal establishment when it attends to the telegraph.

And now we come to the telephone communications. It should have been urged again that the Postmaster General would not be able to make the telephone employees do their work. Let us see about that. What is it that the telephone plant does? It handles calls. When you divide the number of calls in the United States as represented by the Bell system, by the number of employees, you find that their work per year represents some 64,000 calls. Now, the little country of Norway under postal management has employment that represents 118,000 calls. In short the Bell system, instead of ranking first in private aspects, ranks ninth, among the telephone institutions of the world. Nor yet, sir, is this any reflection upon its personnel. The fact is that it comes back to their rates, as the utilization of the plant is restricted to such a degree that the employee does not have the opportunity to put out the product. Remember that about one-half of the employees are not engaged in the direct work of the exchange operator.

We have found now that while postal rates in this country are as low as any other countries, telegraph rates run twice as high and local telephone rates about twice as high, and long-distance telephone rates to the ordinary user run from four to eight times what they do elsewhere.

But, says the conservative man, and I confess the conservative man is the man whose judgment we seek in this matter, conceding all you say with regard to these rates, rather than take recourse to the purchase of a billion dollars' worth of property, and its postalization, had we not better rely on regulation to secure the rates desired? The answer to that is, that regulation can not be made to give us postal rates. Regulation was tried on the express companies and it must be conceded that it was sufficiently drastic. The most we could do with that 25 cent minimum rate, we actually murdered 250,000,000 shipments in this country, and the result of its passage was to reduce it from one quarter to 21 cents, and it is a matter of admission of students of express transportation that the express companies are actually losing money to-day on their 21-cent shipments, while it is true that the postal establishment is making money on its 5-cent rate, because it has got a great agency already spread over the country that reaches the farmer. It has its details well worked out, and this power of simplicity, and is able to eliminate from its operations some 40 per cent of the incidents that attend the movements of packages in express transportation.

But coming back to regulation with regard to the telegraph rate and with regard more especially to the telephone rates, I wish to give a concrete illustration of the inapplicability of regulation to procure the results. Of course, regulation implies, to begin with, proper respect for the laws of property, not merely the statutes of property, but those laws of property written in the human heart, those laws which if not respected stop private investments and completely defeat the function of private operation. As a concrete illustration of the regulatory theory, I shall quote you facts applicable to the year 1910 for a city of 600,000 people in this country, the name of which I shall not give, because its rates are now in private litigation and I have no wish to embarrass either of the parties in that controversy by anything I may say. That city, as I say, represents 600,000 people, and therefore presents metropolitan conditions. Its rates, briefly stated, are as high, with some slight exceptions, as the rates in New York City. It had 43,000 telephones. The telephones had an average call service of 993 calls per year. The average number of calls on all telephones in this country is 2,023 per year. Thus it is seen that in that city the telephone was performing only one-half its customary function and was doing less than 1,000 calls a year when the average telephone under the same commercial and social circumstances was doing a business of 2,000 calls. That average of telephone calls represented a cost to the consumer of about one and one quarter cents per call. In this city of which I speak the average cost to the consumer was three and a half cents per call on the measured-service basis. It is obvious in that case that the degree of the charge under measured service had cut down the function of the telephone about one-half. Very well. Now, then, the private regulator is called in and what does he find? He finds about \$5,000,000 invested in the telephone in that city; that its net earnings for the year were about \$1,200,000, which would be about 7½ per cent. Parenthetically, let me say that about 7½ per cent is about as low a rate as you can concede private capital in the telephone field, and be sure that it will undertake those new enterprises essential to the proper development of the telephone institutions. But the commission is faced with that fact at once. However, the proponents of the people say this telephone is only rendering half service at an expense of \$200,000 more per year. That, with additional switchboards and with additional exchange operators, these rates can be cut in half, and we are assured by the average service performed throughout the country that the service will double and the returns to the company in gross be what they were before. Conceding all that to be possibly true, the net returns to the company in that case would be cut down \$200,000, from $7\frac{1}{2}$ to about $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. And no regulative tribunal could ask private investors, however desirable the social results, to have the telephone charges in that city reduced, that their return on their capital should be cut in half, from $7\frac{1}{2}$ down to $2\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, the point at which private capital would say to the regulator, "You must go and get your capital where you get your regulation, from the city; I will have none of it."

But the Postmaster General walks in on a situation like that and finds that the telephone is performing only one-half of its functions and he is dissatisfied with that as compared with the postal service. He knows that if he will cut his rate the gross receipts will be the same, but that his earnings would be cut down to about $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, or possibly even a little lower, and what is his reply? Acting on the rules of public finance, again he says, "Cut the charge in two, I think the service will double and my gross receipts remain unchanged; even if the profits are as low as 3 per cent, I can purchase capital at that cost." And so the service goes on. It is one thing to say that regulation affords some defense of production to the citizen against discriminating rates and charges; it is quite another and fallacious thing to say that regulation can ever be made to produce a service as cheap at 7 per cent return on the capital as postal service with a return of 3 per cent on the capital.

I will dismiss the suggestion of competition as a remedy and go on to briefly touch other objections that are made.

One of the objections urged, and I consider with sincerity, in the report of the Bell system against postalizing the telephone, is a good objection unless it is provisionally incorrect. I believe it is provisionally incorrect. That objection is that the future telephone development of this country requires not only continuity of plan and policy but continuity of technical ability and a personality in control of the situation. It is suggested by the Bell system that that is not attainable by the postal establishment. I respectfully submit to the commission that that objection is not well taken in view of her history. We do have, at least in two departments of the Government, continuity of plan and purpose as well as persistency of personality and expert knowledge. I refer to the navy establishment and to the war establishment where it must be said that the very highest ability is obtained, is kept, and, thank God, has never failed us in our history to meet the requirements of the Republic in its direst times.

Now, in regard to the postal establishment, in that respect the bill, which has been proposed, provides for this very continuity and service and personality, because a board of directors is established into the bill and is continuous in office some 10 years and with qualifications which go to their expertness as electrical telephone engineers, as express experts, and with reference to the other qualifications involved.

The objection is with regard to the personnel. It is suggested that the addition of great numbers of persons to the Government service may so affect the electorate in determining our elections as to lead to undesirable results.

Let me say in regard to that that the number of telephone employees in the United States is about 200,000; that a little more than half of those are women. And let me say besides that in the development of the telephone art the automatic telephone has witnessed the examples of postal establishments in other countries and independent telephone companies in this country, especially the Federal Telephone Co., of Buffalo, which have introduced the automatic system under which the exchange girl is completely eliminated, except in those instances where a toll service is required.

Now, even that circumstance does not present an awkward affair, because it will take time to substitute the automatic for the manual system. And it happens that the girls who work in the telephone exchange last about two and one-half to three years in that capacity, for the average telephone girl marries.

I shall not go into greater details this afternoon with this subject, Mr. Chairman, because, although I am sure you would realize that it has incidents and circumstances which would prolong not only into the night but, perhaps, into to-morrow, as well.

There is another circumstance, however, that ought to be mentioned and ought to be considered, it seems to me, in reaching a conclusion upon this great subject; that is, the social influences active. When the private financier is turned into this field of postal monopolies, with no purpose to be sensational at all, it is my duty to say to the commission this afternoon that as long as these telephone franchises remain matters for private promotion—remain private in character—securing them will be a circumstance attendant with the hope of very great profit. The promoter, under those circumstances, too often becomes the bribe giver. And we have, I am ashamed to say, in the telephone history of this country cities, as great as San Francisco, disgraced in the most shameful way by its telephone experience in franchise giving.

Just a few years ago the city council of San Francisco, I think, with the exception of one or two men, was bribed by both the contestants for the telephone franchise in that town. They went out of the council meeting with, perhaps, in each of their pockets a bribe from both of the contestants to the controversy. And I ask you to compare that history not alone with the history of London, of Berlin, or of even gay Paris in the matter of telephone order and telephone morality. As against it we have the postal establishment without motive to corruption. We have the postal establishment that stands in ranks primary among all similar institutions in the world. I believe that most men will concede that the subject of slavery and the ensuing Civil War exerted upon the history of this country a disturbing influence which we have not yet half overcome. Instead of the social problem securing our attention here, it did in other countries a generation ago, and the solutions they have secured there—problems arising out of slavery and the Civil War—have engrossed our statesmanship and our people. Meanwhile our country had to build up—200,000 miles of railroad had to be built. The great industrial institutions, of which you know, also had to be erected, and in erecting them great princes of finance were developed—princes of finance whose clamor far excelled and whose power far exceeded the power of the States and the Government whom they have overshadowed for a generation. You went not to the statehouse of your American State to find the active, moving power of society. You went not to the White House, or even to the Capitol, to find the active moving powers of the Nation. But you went to the back offices of the great princes of finance of whom be it said that their clamor exceeded that of the highest officers of the Government. And I challenge the commission, on its recollection at the moment, whether it be not true that they can remember the names of half a dozen great princes of finance of the last generation quicker than they can remember the names of the cotemporary presidents of this Republic?

It was only natural, when the governmental functionary had been so weakened and disturbed by these extraordinary incidents of the war, that these great potentates of private finance should slough upon the Government domain. They did squat on the postal function. The cost of it in the express service we now definitely know. Half of the potential express traffic was killed for 40 years and was prevented from moving. The cost of it in the telephone field we can determine inferentially by the experience of New Zealand and other Empires. The cost of it in the telephone field can be easily surmised when we remember that it cost as much to ship a telephone conversation a mile as it does a ton of freight.

Now, as one more instrumentality of the Federal Government the commission to investigate these subjects I have come to New York City in the humblest way even if with the most positive and confident matter to suggest recommendations on your part with regard to this great subject.

Postal establishment is the greatest agency we know, despite what has been said about it. It is the most economical industrial agency in the world to-day. It represents more income than any railroad system in our country or indeed of any country except the Prussian railway system. And it represents, Mr. Chairman, much more than that. It represents the one industrial, the one commercial agency in the United States that is absolutely on the square with all its citizens; that gives a nondiscriminating service to the poor and to the rich alike; that follows the farmer out into the recesses of the forest and even the pioneer of our country, into the frozen mountains of Alaska itself, to take there perhaps the mother's message to a heroic son and to bring back perhaps the son's new found gold to the succor of an aged parent.

I thank you for your attention. [Applause.]

Chairman WALSH. Ladies and gentlemen, we are required to maintain perfect order. If you are allowed to express your feelings, these meetings would not last a day; if some opinion may be expressed that meets with your approval I am going to ask you all to please help me and not to give expression to your feelings.

Congressman LEWIS. I have a full record of the discussion on this subject and I desire, if I may, to submit it to the commission.

Chairman WALSH. I shall be very glad to have that made a part of the record. When do you go back to Washington—to-night?

Congressman LEWIS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. There were some general questions that I desire to ask.

Congressman LEWIS. I will be very glad to answer them.

Chairman WALSH. Well, it is our adjournment time now, and perhaps I will submit them to you on the outside, Mr. Lewis, and have them made a part of the record.

Congressman LEWIS. Either way; if you wish, Mr. Walsh, and think it is necessary, I will stay over here.

Chairman WALSH. We will be very glad to finish the record and ask these questions. I will give them to you so that you may be prepared in the morning.

Congressman LEWIS. If the questions are all written, I could reply to them in writing just as well. But there may be others—

Chairman WALSH. There are others that grow out of them. This is a questionnaire written for you.

Congressman LEWIS. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if you have observed the effect of the growth of large corporations and the centralization of their control on the condition of labor in the United States; that is, has it tended to improve the general condition of labor, or otherwise?

Congressman LEWIS. I think there has been an improvement in the condition of labor, but whether enlargement of the corporate unit is the cause I would rather not say at this time.

Chairman WALSH. Have the corporations shortened working hours as rapidly as the development of the industry would warrant?

Congressman LEWIS. I think they have not in the coal-mining industry with which I am most familiar. A very large proportion of it is conducted under an eight-hour system, but a large portion of it remains under the 10-hour system.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any cases of corporations that have voluntarily shortened working hours—that is, the large corporations—in what might be called the basic industries?

Congressman LEWIS. No; I do not. But I do not wish to imply that there are not such cases. There may be.

Chairman WALSH. Is the bargaining power of the workmen either as an individual or a group improved by the growth of large corporations?

Congressman LEWIS. I think it is weakened, except as being organized into corresponding organizations.

Chairman WALSH. Has the thought of labor changed in respect to that, the thought changed in respect to that, or has the impression been maintained—it has been stated here upon the witness stand during this hearing that during the period when the large corporations were forming, were concentrating their plants, that the idea among labor generally was pretty strong that it might be a good thing; is that not correct?

Congressman LEWIS. Well, I think it fair to say that as the corporation has grown very much larger its responsibility to the people correspondingly enlarged, broader ideas and broader feelings have been manifested by the managers with respect to the relations to their employees.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think the highly concentrated manufacturing corporations have tended to prevent the growth of trade-unions essentially?

Congressman LEWIS. I would not be a good authority on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Have you considered, or have your investigations led you to a consideration of the fact as to what extent stockholders and directors of these large corporations are responsible for the labor conditions existing in them?

Congressman LEWIS. Now, I think you put your finger upon a great weakness in the large corporate organization, a weakness that perhaps affects its stockholders even more than employees. I think now that the connection of the stockholder with an immense corporation in many instances is so remote that it practically amounts to no effective relation at all and would not be any greater than the sense of responsibility of the average citizen for what is going on in Washington. I am informed that it happens as a matter of habit that the directors of the great industrial organizations when an election is coming on they will send out their proxies to the stockholders, who are often women or uninformed men, and that possessing up to that time the confidence of the community they have a form of election only without active discretion obtaining. And I think that there is a very different relation between the stockholders and the directorate of a large railroad or the United States Steel Trust, for example, from that between the stockholders and directors of the little electric railway in my town. That personally carries knowledge and perhaps a sense of responsibility.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed in your investigation of the telephone industry in the United States the manner in which they deal with their employees so far as organization is concerned? Is there an organized industry or an unorganized industry or what?

Congressman LEWIS. I think the tendency is absence of organization.

Chairman WALSH. Does that run pretty generally through the industry in the United States?

Congressman LEWIS. That is my judgment, although I have not probative data on the subject.

Chairman WALSH. Assuming that this responsibility for conditions exists on the part of directors, how can that responsibility be made effective, if you have studied that subject or would care to give an opinion? Could it be made so by legislation?

Congressman LEWIS. I have given it some thought, Mr. Chairman, and discussed it some with others, but I have not reached a conclusion satisfactory to myself.

Chairman WALSH. If it be true that the organizations of employees have been weakened by the concentration of their employers, we might put it that way—what agency, if any, could be used to more nearly balance the power between them?

Congressman LEWIS. I have none in mind except the suggestion made in the beginning of my remarks, that qualifications upon the absoluteness of the ownership of the property where social relations are sustained, such as now are imposed upon public-utility companies, for example, might be made. But I know there would be differences of conditions that would perhaps render the suggestion debatable. The public-service commission now is largely confined to the field of monopoly, especially to the field where rates are non-fluctuating. Prices of street car service, gas, electricity, and railway service are nonfluctuating, and competition is absent as an element to deal with the private management. In the coal-mining business competition is present and you have fluctuating prices. The argument might be a little weaker in the case of a public-utility commission, in that case than in the case of a glaring monopoly. But I do not think of any other suggestion that to me seems practical at this time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you given some thought to the question of the condition of the employees in an industry like the telephone industry in case of postalization by the Government? How would it affect the freedom of contract, the right to bargain collectively, exert a democratic influence in the fixing of conditions of their labor?

Congressman LEWIS. Well, speaking frankly on that subject, I think the relation of the Government as an employer to the workingman is very different from the relation of the private employer. Without any purpose to stigmatize the interest of the private employer his interest is as an investor. If he does not think about himself first nobody else will. He may have an interest there for underpaying his men or overworking his men. But the Government is purely an ethical agent. It has no feelings, it has no purposes except those that are ethical and it is absolutely without temptation to overwork or underpay its employees. Therefore the labor organizations as an instrument of defense in private employment is unnecessary in public employment, and the relation of the employee under the Government, the Postal Service to the Government, seems to me should be more in the order of my relation to the Government; that is, one of individual character.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Lewis, when you were dealing with the first proposition that you presented, you made reference to the fact that boards of long existence of public-utility commission should be utilized in large industrial disturbances to determine the facts for the purpose of informing the public as to the facts causing the disagreement. Did you look on that as only a means for the furnishing of knowledge, leaving to other agencies the recon-clinging of the disagreement after the facts had been brought out or the using of this commission as a settling agency also?

Congressman LEWIS. Well, they could be mediators as well as fact determiners. It has been suggested this European war might have been prevented if we had had a public-utility commission that would have had authority over those royal bumps. I think frequently these great disasters, industrial strikes, might be avoided if there was some place to go to state your case. In all my experience as a striker I got licked. I am, therefore, very much in favor of arbitration more than a very dear friend of mine who always won. His reaction to the subject was different from mine, you see. I think the interests of society are so great that they ought to predominate in this matter with regard to the wishes of employer and employee.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe that a different commission or agency might be better able to utilize the facts that were developed by a public-service commission than they would themselves—that is, as a settling agent? Would the publication of the facts weaken their influence as mediators and arbitrators?

Congressman LEWIS. Very probably so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is the point that appealed to me when you were making the statement, to determine which of those two things you thought were preferable?

Congressman LEWIS. Perhaps while the commission was getting the facts that the parties can be making up their minds whether they were for or against them, and they would thus perhaps become disqualified as an impartial tribunal.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That was the point that appealed to me. One thing further I would like to have your opinion on, because it is purely a matter of opinion. The question really consists of—I have got to state certain things that naturally follow the primary stage and then you can arrive at its sequence. We will take Government supervision. It is a foregone conclusion that supervision without control is forced—is there any power to put it in if deficit ensues, and on account of the measures that are put into that control deficit follows—now coming back to the original statement: Can there be effective supervision and consequent control without it leading to Government ownership?

Congressman LEWIS. Well, they can not be effective in the sense of absolute result without that conclusion. Society would have to take the responsibility for its orders.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is the natural consequence of supervision and control that is necessary to make supervision effective, is it not?

Congressman LEWIS. If the employer were ordered to pay certain wages and work certain hours and to sell at certain prices, he would quit employing people unless the conditions were working out satisfactorily. Therefore industry would depend upon the Government for its future conduct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If you leave the question of wages out, for instance, to fix the price of the product, and from other causes a deficit ensues, isn't there a nice question there as to who is going to assume the responsibility for the deficit unless ownership is assumed?

Congressman LEWIS. That is all involved in the problem, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you, Mr. Lewis, very much.

We will now stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(At 4.50 in the afternoon of this Tuesday, January 19, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 20, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m. at the same place.)

NEW YORK CITY, January 20, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, and Garretson.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will please come to order.

Call Mr. Schiff.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JACOB H. SCHIFF.

Chairman WALSH. Your name, please.

Mr. SCHIFF. Jacob H. Schiff.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live, Mr. Schiff?

Mr. SCHIFF. New York.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. SCHIFF. Banker.

Chairman WALSH. In what corporations are you a director?

Mr. SCHIFF. I am a director of the Oregon Railway & Navigation Co., a subsidiary of the Union Pacific; the Western Union Telegraph Co.; the Central Trust Co.; the Wells, Fargo Express Co.; the Baron de Hirsch Fund; the Montefiore Home and Hospital for Chronic Diseases; the Tuberculosis Preventorium. There are some more that I can not remember.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate and state how many of those there are which you can not remember?

Mr. SCHIFF. I can not remember them all.

Chairman WALSH. No; I say could you state approximately the number of them, without designating the names.

Mr. SCHIFF. Call it in round numbers 10.

Chairman WALSH. Ten that you do not now recollect?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes—

Chairman WALSH. Or 10 that you do recollect?

Mr. SCHIFF. No; 10 altogether; 10 altogether. I have named the principal ones.

Chairman WALSH. In those purely industrial corporations that you have named, leaving out for the present those that have for their object philanthropy, or public matters entirely, do you own or represent any considerable amount of stock in those companies in which you are a director?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes; I think I do.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent, please.

Mr. SCHIFF. In which?

Chairman WALSH. In the companies that you have named.

Mr. SCHIFF. You want to have it in each separately?

Chairman WALSH. In each separate company; yes, sir.

Mr. SCHIFF. Well, call them off, please.

The REPORTER. Oregon Railway & Navigation Co.

Mr. SCHIFF. The Oregon Railway & Navigation Co. is a subsidiary company of the Union Pacific, and I represent several thousand shares in the Union Pacific; perhaps 10,000 or more.

Chairman WALSH. Ten thousand or more. Now, do you own those personally?

Mr. SCHIFF. Personally, and as representative of others.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, how many do you own personally and how many do you control as representative of others?

Mr. SCHIFF. Well, I would say I own personally 5,000 or more.

Chairman WALSH. Of the Union Pacific?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I wish that in giving the amounts of the others, Mr. Schiff, you will please make that disconnection; that is, the amount that you own actually, and the amount that you represent.

Mr. SCHIFF. As I say, I actually own 5,000 or more.

Chairman WALSH. But I say in giving the general numbers, I wish you would call it in that manner when the other names are read off to you by the stenographer, that you will make that distinction and I will not have to repeat the question every time.

Mr. SCHIFF. What is the next?

The REPORTER. Western Union Telegraph Co.

Mr. SCHIFF. I should say 3,000 or more personally.

Chairman WALSH. Do you represent any others in the Western Union?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes; when I say 3,000 or more, it is my own stock.

Chairman WALSH. Now, how many would you say you represented? How many shares of stock in the Western Union?

Mr. SCHIFF. Many thousand shares.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate how many?

Mr. SCHIFF. No.

Chairman WALSH. You could tell that, could you not, from your books?

Mr. SCHIFF. No; I could not.

Chairman WALSH. Is there no way in arriving at the number of shares of stock you represent in the Western Union?

Mr. SCHIFF. Only by the stock standing on the books of the company in my name, or the names of some one of my firm.

Chairman WALSH. Does all of the stock you represent in the Western Union stand on the books of the Western Union Co. either in your name or in the name of some member of your firm?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes, sir; that is correct, including clerks.

What is the next?

The REPORTER. The Central Trust Co.

Mr. SCHIFF. One hundred shares.

Chairman WALSH. Do I understand that the 100 shares are yours?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you represent any others?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not.

What is the next?

The REPORTER. The Wells, Fargo Express Co.

Mr. SCHIFF. One thousand five hundred shares or more of my own.

Chairman WALSH. Do you represent any in that company?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately how many do you represent?

Mr. SCHIFF. Perhaps two or three thousand.

Chairman WALSH. What information, Mr. Schiff, do you possess, either as a stockholder or as a director, concerning the labor conditions in these corporations in which you are interested?

Mr. SCHIFF. None.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make any effort to ascertain the labor conditions in those corporations?

Mr. SCHIFF. Only when there should be trouble.

Chairman WALSH. Only when there should be trouble?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And then what action do you take as a director?

Mr. SCHIFF. I ascertain the causes of the trouble and try to bring about a just treatment of all interests concerned.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive reports from these corporations which give you any information regarding labor conditions before actual trouble breaks out?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any system in any of these corporations by which the directors are advised of complaints of men—of the employees—when they reach such proportions that trouble in the nature of a strike or lockout or violence is imminent, but before it actually takes place?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. We will take the Western Union first; what is the nature of the reports that you receive from that company?

Mr. SCHIFF. During my directorship of the Western Union, which extends back about, I should say, 15 or 18 years, there has been only one serious trouble. I don't remember exactly when, but it was about five or seven years ago that there was a general strike on the Western Union. It may be 10 years ago; I don't remember exactly the time. This was the only time when the question of labor conditions came before the board of directors, or before the executive committee rather, to which I belonged. It was stated by Col. Clowry, who was then president, that trouble was brewing; that there was agitation on the part of the president of the telegraphers' union. He said certain demands had been made which it was not possible for the company to accede to, and then very serious consideration was given by the executive committee to the conditions among Western Union telegraph employees. Propositions were made to and fro, but the strike resulted before anything tangible could be arranged.

Chairman WALSH. When did you say that threatened trouble took place—about 15 years ago?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not as long as that. I think it must have been between 7 and 10 years ago.

Chairman WALSH. Now, do you have any organized or regular system for receiving reports from these companies as to labor conditions?

Mr. SCHIFF. That would naturally be in the hands of the executive officers—the president and general manager and general superintendent. It is not the office of directors to interfere in the management—in the technical management—of an industrial corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in any corporation that is engaged in the mining business?

Mr. SCHIFF. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in any corporation that is engaged in the manufacturing business?

Mr. SCHIFF. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had any first-hand contact with labor questions on the Western Union other than that which you state took place 7 or 10 years ago?

Mr. SCHIFF. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, Mr. Schiff, to what extent are the stockholders and directors of corporations responsible for their labor conditions in them?

Mr. SCHIFF. Stockholders are not responsible at all, in my opinion. The directors are responsible as far as these matters are brought before them by the executive officers of the corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose that the attention of a director was called to the alleged facts from a source which appeared authentic that the laws relating to the safety and well-being of employees passed by the State in which the corporation was located were being violated, what would be the duty, in your opinion, of the director?

Mr. SCHIFF. It would be his duty to go to the president or general manager of the company—to the president in the first instance—and inform himself of conditions, and if it is his belief that the laws are violated or that conditions are not as they should be, in his own opinion, he would bring it before the executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. And the executive committee would then do what?

Mr. SCHIFF. The executive committee would then discuss it, and if it found the statements correct it would try to correct conditions which are either in violation of law—it would alter them as far as they are in violation of law, and try to correct other conditions which might not be found as they should be.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to come to that. Suppose in the same way the attention of a director was called to the alleged fact that the conditions otherwise were not fair to the employees, although not within the inhibition of any statute, what would be the conduct of the director so informed?

Mr. SCHIFF. He would discuss it with the president of the company, get his explanation, and if his explanation is not satisfactory to him he would bring it before the executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. Do these executive officers of the company make regular reports to you or to the executive committee of these large corporations as to the general financial conduct of the corporation?

Mr. SCHIFF. They do.

Chairman WALSH. That is, there is a close check and audit kept upon the accounts of such corporations?

Mr. SCHIFF. There is.

Chairman WALSH. Now, do you require those to be made to the executive committee?

Mr. SCHIFF. To the executive committee and finally to the directors.

Chairman WALSH. And finally to the directors. Is the machinery such that it comes to the executive committee first?

Mr. SCHIFF. It does.

Chairman WALSH. And in the case of a company like the Western Union, how often does the executive committee meet regularly?

Mr. SCHIFF. Once a week.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently does the board of directors meet?

Mr. SCHIFF. I think every two months.

Chairman WALSH. And in case the situation of any sort became important enough, would the board of directors meet more frequently than that?

Mr. SCHIFF. There would be special meetings called.

Chairman WALSH. At any time?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, would you please state, Mr. Schiff, what conditions of the company, financially or otherwise, are regularly reported by the executive officers to the executive committee?

Mr. SCHIFF. The earnings, the internal state of the company in general, financial requirements, necessity for opening new offices, the necessity for new material, and matters in general.

Chairman WALSH. Does it cover a balance sheet, profit and loss account, showing in detail the disposition of all financial matters?

Mr. SCHIFF. That would come at the end of every three months in the Western Union. It is done quarterly.

Chairman WALSH. And how about—is there any marked difference in the operation of the large railroad properties like the Union Pacific?

Mr. SCHIFF. There is not, except I believe in the Union Pacific it is done more frequently; probably done monthly.

Chairman WALSH. I say to make the matter in as concise shape as possible and not to make a particular study of the Western Union, I will, however, ask with reference to that company: Do these reports show the cost of production?

Mr. SCHIFF. Production of what?

Chairman WALSH. Of the work—the product of the Western Union out of which it makes its money—the sending of messages and the other duties performed by the Western Union.

Mr. SCHIFF. The monthly or quarterly report would show.

Chairman WALSH. What are the products of the Western Union? What does it do besides send messages or telegrams?

Mr. SCHIFF. The products of the Western Union are the earnings from the telegraph business. The products are the telegraphic receipts.

Chairman WALSH. Do they also control subsidiary companies in the city which hire messengers to go from place to place on the private business of persons who hire them?

Mr. SCHIFF. As far as I know the Western Union controls the American District Telegraph Co.

Chairman WALSH. And that company has offices throughout the United States where they have men and boys who go off on messages under private employment?

Mr. SCHIFF. I only know as far as New York is concerned.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to the practice in any other city at all?

Mr. SCHIFF. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in the American District Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Does the American District Telegraph Co. ever report its activities to the board of directors of the Western Union Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. I believe not.

Chairman WALSH. In what way is the American District Telegraph Co. controlled by the Western Union Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. By stock ownership.

Chairman WALSH. By stock ownership solely?

Mr. SCHIFF. As far as I know; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Then, does it own all the stock or a majority of the stock or a mere control?

Mr. SCHIFF. As far as I know it owns a majority of the stock.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know offhand what amount it owns in the American District Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to the fact, if it be a fact, that the American District Telegraph Co. employs boys that are under legal age at any place?

Mr. SCHIFF. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to the alleged fact that it makes a large amount of returns by sending small boys into vice districts in the great cities?

Mr. SCHIFF. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever heard of such a thing as a director of the Western Union Telegraph Co. or in your capacity as a citizen?

Mr. SCHIFF. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Do the reports that you get from these companies show the operative cost of the operations of the Western Union Telegraph Co. in the various parts of the United States and in different parts of the United States?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not in detail.

Chairman WALSH. Not in detail. Is that done at any time during the year?

Mr. SCHIFF. That would not come before the directors. They would be embodied in the reports which go to the stockholders.

Chairman WALSH. Well, it would come to the directors then merely as stockholders with all the other stockholders?

Mr. SCHIFF. It would.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have a report printed periodically, a periodical report of the inspection of the equipment and machinery used by the Western Union Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. We have not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have a system by which these inspections are required?

Mr. SCHIFF. The executive officers would naturally have.

Chairman WALSH. To whom then would the reports upon that subject go?

Mr. SCHIFF. They would report in general to the executive committee whether the machinery of the company is in good condition or where it needs improvement.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently would that come to the executive committee?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not at stated times—as often as necessary.

Chairman WALSH. In the actual practice, how often does that come to the Western Union Telegraph Co., to the executive committee of the Western Union Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. There is no actual practice about it. That would come before the executive committee as often as is required.

Chairman WALSH. During the past 10 years could you tell us how often such a report has come to the executive committee of the Western Union Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. I can not say offhand.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a periodical inventory made of the entire assets of the Western Union Telegraph Co.?

Mr. SCHIFF. That would be made once a year before the final balance sheet is made.

Chairman WALSH. Before what?

Mr. SCHIFF. Before the final balance sheet is made.

Chairman WALSH. I see. And does that come to the executive committee?

Mr. SCHIFF. It would.

Chairman WALSH. From the executive committee all of that information which you have detailed would go to the board of directors at an annual meeting?

Mr. SCHIFF. Would go to the board of directors probably at its very last meeting before the close of its fiscal year.

Chairman WALSH. Now, generally speaking, the practice that you have detailed here holds good throughout all of these large companies?

Mr. SCHIFF. I can only speak for the companies in which I am a director. It holds good in those.

Chairman WALSH. I mean those large companies—

Mr. SCHIFF. It holds good in almost every well-regulated company.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are there any other reports regular, we might call them regular reports of the conditions made to the executive committee that I have not enumerated here?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not think so.

Chairman WALSH. You think you have mentioned them all?

Mr. SCHIFF. In a general way; yes.

Chairman WALSH. You think I have mentioned them all?

Mr. SCHIFF. In a general way.

Chairman WALSH. Would you regard a submission of regular reports to the executive committee, and from them, say, an annual report to the stockholders and the directors of these corporations, setting forth in full the labor conditions of those companies?

Mr. SCHIFF. Would I regard what?

Chairman WALSH. Would you regard that as desirable, that a very definite report, such as those you have mentioned, should be made at stated intervals covering labor conditions?

Mr. SCHIFF. It would be neither desirable nor undesirable. I don't know that it would lead to anything in particular, because the executive officers, as I have already stated, of any well-administered company, must deal with labor conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Must he not also deal very definitely with all of those financial conditions I have enumerated?

Mr. SCHIFF. No.

Chairman WALSH. He must not?

Mr. SCHIFF. No.

Chairman WALSH. Now, will you please outline, Mr. Schiff, the various philanthropic activities with which you are connected?

Mr. SCHIFF. I have named the different corporations already. If you will pick out any of them, I will answer you.

Chairman WALSH. We will take the Baron de Hirsch Fund. I have a little list of those you have given, and maybe we can get at it quicker in that way. What is the Baron de Hirsch Fund, briefly?

Mr. SCHIFF. The Baron de Hirsch Fund is a fund of originally $2,400,000 which was given some 25 years ago by the late Baron de Hirsch to a board of trustees for the purpose of promoting the welfare of the Russian and Jewish emigrants that come into the United States. It was later raised by gifts and legacies from the Baroness de Hirsch to $4,000,000, which it is now.

Chairman WALSH. You are a trustee of that fund, are you not, Mr. Schiff?

Mr. SCHIFF. Trustee and vice president.

Chairman WALSH. How many trustees are there?

Mr. SCHIFF. I believe there are 12, as far as I can remember.

Chairman WALSH. How many meetings did you attend during the year 1914, Mr. Schiff, of the Baron de Hirsch Fund?

Mr. SCHIFF. I should say from 6 to 10.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently are these meetings of the trustees held?

Mr. SCHIFF. The meetings of the trustees are called—the meetings of the executive committee, of which I am a member, are called—as often as sufficient business has accumulated to make a meeting necessary.

Chairman WALSH. How many members of the executive committee are there?

Mr. SCHIFF. I think there are eight—probably eight or nine members of the executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. Is the executive committee taken from the trustees?

Mr. SCHIFF. It is.

Chairman WALSH. What funds does the Baron de Hirsch Fund exercise control over?

Mr. SCHIFF. Only its own funds.

Chairman WALSH. In what sort of securities is that represented, or what form of wealth?

Mr. SCHIFF. Practically all in bonds and mortgages, real estate mortgages.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any particular portion of the country selected for the securing of the loans, the paper?

Mr. SCHIFF. Altogether in the State of New York.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly indicate what work this fund does.

Mr. SCHIFF. In the first place it subsidizes the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society and sets up Jewish farmers throughout the United States by making advances on the chattels of the farmers. It maintains the so-called Baron de Hirsch trade school. This is a trade school which has two semi-annual classes in which men engaged in manual labor and otherwise—younger men—learn the rudiments of different trades, and it turns them into trade helpers, from which they become gradually industrial workers.

Chairman WALSH. Who determines the character of the vocational training that shall be given to these persons?

Mr. SCHIFF. The trade-school committee in the first instance, which is a sub-committee of the trustees having charge of the trade school. I suppose it consists of four or five members.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any outside party connected with the organization that controls the trade school—any representative from any local educational body, I mean?

Mr. SCHIFF. Ex officio, the superintendent of the trade school, a Mr. Talden.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any other outside representation, outside of that?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not that I can remember.

Chairman WALSH. When was the last time that any determination was made as to the course of studies in the trade school, or has it been a development?

Mr. SCHIFF. That is continually being done. They teach some five or six trades, principally electrical work, carpenter work, printing, plumbing, machine work, and painting. I believe that is about what they teach.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any committee or any member of your organization which seeks to obtain employment for the graduates of the school?

Mr. SCHIFF. The superintendent attends to that. These boys are nearly always—younger men—they are between the ages of 16 and 20. They are nearly always in very considerable demand. The unions are rather favorable to the trade school.

Chairman WALSH. Did you say favorable or unfavorable?

Mr. SCHIFF. The labor unions are favorable to them, and it has been a very successful undertaking.

Chairman WALSH. There is no effort in any way made in the school to direct the students along any lines of social or political economy, is there?

Mr. SCHIFF. No; there is not.

Chairman WALSH. Did I interrupt you, Mr. Schiff?

Mr. SCHIFF. I only wanted to go on and tell you—

Chairman WALSH. Please do so.

Mr. SCHIFF (continuing). Then, we maintain an industrial school at Woodbine, N. J., where we give the young men an education in agriculture. Generally, we take them at the ages—I believe the minimum age is 14 years—and try to train them into agricultural helpers—something better than farm hands, and we have graduated a very considerable number of young men from there who have gone into agriculture.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say was the total attendance during the past year in your trade school?

Mr. SCHIFF. In our trade school the actual attendance is about, in each class, between 150 and 175. When I say "each class" I mean each five months' class, so that the school would turn out in a year about double this number, say, from 300 to 350.

Chairman WALSH. And in the agricultural school, what number?

Mr. SCHIFF. In the agricultural school, I believe, the attendance is from 70 to 75.

Chairman WALSH. What reports are issued by the Baron de Hirsch Fund?

Mr. SCHIFF. The Baron de Hirsch Fund issues no public reports, as it has no stockholders. It is not a stock company. It issues a report from its books, which are open to inspection, but it does not issue a printed report of its activities.

Chairman WALSH. Does it make a report at any time that is given to the press?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not in particular, except as the press inquires.

Chairman WALSH. You say that they have books. What do you say they have for public inspection, if desired?

Mr. SCHIFF. Any legitimate party is free to look at its books.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the total expenditure of the Baron de Hirsch Fund to date in benefactions, in round figures? Approximately, what has been the total amount of the benefactions it has given to trade schools?

Mr. SCHIFF. I should say the average it has expended during the past 20 years is about $175,000 a year.

Chairman WALSH. Now, outside of the schools, what are its other benefactions, Mr. Schiff?

Mr. SCHIFF. We have founded in south Jersey about 20 years ago—20 or 25 years ago—the town of Woodbine, which is an agricultural farming and industrial settlement, and in which we have invested a considerable amount of money. The town is now self-governing and has been for something like 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. Do you ever extend any personal or individual aid?

Mr. SCHIFF. Please repeat that question?

Chairman WALSH. Does your Fund extend individual aid to persons?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes; I have already said it makes loans to farmers; it makes loans to settlers—individual loans. It also aids committees, educational committees in various cities of the Union, like Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and, I think, St. Louis, to a small extent.

Chairman WALSH. By what means is the succession of trustees provided for?

Mr. SCHIFF. The trustees were originally named by Baron de Hirsch, who died in 1894, and it is a self-perpetuating body.

Chairman WALSH. How would a trustee be disposed of in the event of misconduct?

Mr. SCHIFF. Under the laws of the State; but such things do not happen.

Chairman WALSH. Such things have not happened in your organization up to date?

Mr. SCHIFF. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But, if such a thing did happen, is the power in the majority of the board of trustees, or is it lodged some place in the body to remove a trustee for misconduct that might not reach the magnitude of an infraction of a State law?

Mr. SCHIFF. Only so far as it is provided for in the laws of the State of New York.

Chairman WALSH. By what principles are the individuals selected who receive this aid, if they are so selected?

Mr. SCHIFF. They are selected by the judgment of the executive trustees for their high-mindedness, conscientiousness, and known qualities as good citizens, if you mean the trustees.

Chairman WALSH. About how many appeals do you receive in the course of a year? How many appeals for aid?

Mr. SCHIFF. We do not receive any appeals for aid. We do not disburse original aid in the sense of charity.

Chairman WALSH. Do not persons appeal to you individually in any instance—for instance, to obtain loans to go upon farms, and the like of that?

Mr. SCHIFF. Those appeals would be made to the superintendent of the Jewish Agricultural and Industrial Aid Society.

Chairman WALSH. What connection has that society with the Baron de Hirsch Fund?

Mr. SCHIFF. The Baron de Hirsch Fund delegates certain of its directors or managers and pays it something like $50,000 or $60,000 a year.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in that?

Mr. SCHIFF. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you study the operations of that subsidiary organization as a director of the Baron de Hirsch Fund that sets aside $50,000 or $60,000?

Mr. SCHIFF. The organization issues an annual report, which I study very carefully, and by conference from time to time with its manager, Mr. Robinson.

Chairman WALSH. Have they some sort of systematic scheme by which they look up the person that might be benefited in the way you have indicated, individually, by putting them on a farm, and so on?

Mr. SCHIFF. Very systematic indeed.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly state what is the system of selecting the people.

Mr. SCHIFF. You must turn to the manager for that. I can not give you the details. I know it is done generally—very systematic and very successful.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the general details as to whether or not they have agencies in different parts of the country or in different parts of the world, or whether they receive personal appeals from individuals and tabulate them and investigate them, or how? Just in a general way, tell us.

Mr. SCHIFF. The information that I could give as to this would be so meager that I would suggest that you call Mr. Leonard G. Robinson, the manager, before you, and he can give you anything in that regard.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will get the information from him, then. You make no personal efforts, or the board of trustees of the Baron de Hirsch Fund have been making no personal effort to locate where the persons to whom these benefactions may be extended?

Mr. SCHIFF. It does not.

Chairman WALSH. It is all left to that subsidiary organization?

Mr. SCHIFF. It is all left to the organization.

Chairman WALSH. Is there or is there not waste in the field of what you might call charity, of extending aid to unemployed persons that need assistance?

Mr. SCHIFF. Is there any what?

Chairman WALSH. Is there not waste in the field? Have you observed as a person interested in those subjects whether there is waste?

Mr. SCHIFF. Waste?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. SCHIFF. There is nothing in human endeavor which has not waste. I believe in general the philanthropic work—so-called charity work—certainly wherever it is done in this city, is done with a great deal of efficiency.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed during your life, Mr. Schiff, and your efforts in the field of which you have spoken, not only with the Baron de Hirsch Fund but with the other organizations that we will not go into in detail this morning, any scheme by which, first, the necessity for such help might be best prevented?

Mr. SCHIFF. Preventive charity is always the best, and there is a great deal of effort made in that direction and a great deal of successful work done.

Chairman WALSH. Along what general lines, for instance, laying aside the important thing of educating the young to be useful, along what general lines would you say that effort has been?

Mr. SCHIFF. To help those who are able to get into dignified work to secure dignified existence; if they can get small means, to help them to help themselves; to help people in general to help themselves; to find employment for the handicapped.

Chairman WALSH. I did not catch that last. Will you read it, Mr. Langdon?

The REPORTER. To find employment for the handicapped.

Chairman WALSH. You mean for the physically handicapped, or the economically handicapped, or what?

Mr. SCHIFF. Both.

Chairman WALSH. Now, have you given any study to any definite mode by which you would work out that last suggestion?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, first we will take those that fall below what you might call the minimum of efficiency physically for some reason.

Mr. SCHIFF. For instance, there are a great many who can work who are crippled but who still can work, for whom you might get small trades; you can set them up in stands, trading stands.

Chairman WALSH. The idea, then, being, Mr. Schiff, to direct those persons along what you might call the line of vocational guidance into what they were best fitted to do with their physical handicaps?

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes; to some extent.

Chairman WALSH. And would that include the institution of industries, probably, that would take care of persons of that kind, so handicapped?

Mr. SCHIFF. It would.

Chairman WALSH. Now proceed, please. I say, just proceed, please.

Mr. SCHIFF. In a great many instances small loans to tradespeople, to be gradually repaid from their earnings, or not, if that be not possible, in order that they may not become a charge upon the community; loans to the laborer and others on pawn, or chattel, or even on their own responsibility, to help them over the hard times. The activities in that direction are so many that it is impossible to point out actually everything.

Chairman WALSH. Could you suggest some other line of activity along what you designate as furnishing the man who is not handicapped physically with the means of earning his own livelihood?

Mr. SCHIFF. In the first place, employment offices.

Chairman WALSH. Would you have those public or private, or how operated?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not think any employment offices can be successfully conducted, or are successfully conducted, except for domestic help—I exclude that—except if the United States Government would take this altogether in its own hands. We need a constant bringing together of those who need work and those who have work to give in all parts of the Union. As it is now, there is too much congestion and too much crowding into single sections; there is always a great superabundance of labor in New York and in the Atlantic coast cities. That should be prevented if possible. There should be some way by which there could be pointed out to the labor seeker, who can not find labor in the place in which he for the moment dwells, where the laborer is needed; and there is labor needed somewhere in the United States at all times. I know of no employment exchange—local employment exchange—that has been honestly conducted that has ever been a success. I have been connected with quite a number of these. A great deal of money has been sunk in local employment exchanges, and none of them have been able to exist for an indefinite time. At some time they all had to give up for the want of funds with which to further conduct them, because they were limited to find labor locally. It is only through the Federal Government that—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Well, you think it is impossible, then, to correlate such public agencies unless they are nationalized—unless the Government does it?

Mr. SCHIFF. That is my opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Have you considered—did you get a copy of the bill proposed by this commission through the mails during the last few months, Mr. Schiff?

Mr. SCHIFF. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. It has not been called to your personal attention, then?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not that I can now remember.

Chairman WALSH. What substantial result, if any, do you consider has been achieved by these activities, such as the Baron de Hirsch Fund and others, toward reducing the amount of poverty and suffering?

Mr. SCHIFF. Very considerable. You can not point it out in figures, but the result has been tremendous.

Chairman WALSH. Would it or not be a good idea to have statistics kept of the general benefits derived by the whole social fabric through these activities and publish them from time to time as part of the work and as a guide to others that might be inclined?

Mr. SCHIFF. I have no doubt but that all these foundations—I know that the Baron de Hirsch Fund and others with which I am connected keep such statistics. But certainly it would be well if these statistics be published in general.

Chairman WALSH. Would they be formulated in such a way as to indicate to the public the advance that was made from time to time in the whole social scheme by such work?

Mr. SCHIFF. Only good result from it, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that more substantial gain might be made in the conduct of these great betterment activities by democratizing them, by bringing in outsiders other than indicated as trustees, or, perhaps, not persons of great wealth themselves, or injecting the hand of the State, say, of the municipality, the community as it were into them, or have you given that subject any thought?

Mr. SCHIFF. I am very certain that in the selection of trustees or managers, or whatever you may call them, of these great foundations the question of wealth has absolutely nothing to do and has absolutely not entered in. I am convinced that every foundation—at least, every one that I know of—at the first determining or election of trustees and manager have had no sort of desire but to bring in the most able and most efficient men or women, whether they be rich or poor—in most cases they are poor—what we call poor in these days—to help in managing and guiding the work of the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. What do you say as to giving the State a representation in them, or the Nation—the Government, I will say?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not think it would be a proper thing to bring in what we call in general the political element, which, in that case, would be the State.

Chairman WALSH. Well, would what you would call the political element include all of the officials of the Government, the representatives and the executives of the State?

Mr. SCHIFF. It does.

Chairman WALSH. And speaking of that as the political element, you do not believe that it would be wise to allow the State representation through officers of that kind in these organizations—in the administration of them?

Mr. SCHIFF. As a general proposition, I do not think it would be wise.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward the organization of employees for their own protection and the advancement of their own interests, if they so consider it?

Mr. SCHIFF. I believe that the proper organization of employees for their own benefit, which is the benefit of the State, ought to be encouraged in every way.

Chairman WALSH. What benefits that you include are there—moral and financial betterments?

Mr. SCHIFF. Their moral and economic betterment.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what information or experience, Mr. Schiff, is your attitude in that direction based?

Mr. SCHIFF. Upon a close study as a citizen of labor conditions generally.

Chairman WALSH. Have you taken any action publicly or privately with regard to the organization of the Western Union Telegraph Co. employees?

Mr. SCHIFF. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact, if it is a fact, that the Western Union Telegraph Co. maintains what is called a blacklist—that is, a list upon which the names of men are placed who are accused of being active in promoting organizations of employees?

Mr. SCHIFF. As far as I know, I doubt whether such a blacklist is maintained. I think that is a charge that frequently has been made and does not exist. Do not forget that the Western Union, if you pick out such a company, is a public-service corporation which owes to the public a duty to efficiently do its service and that it can not subject itself—less perhaps than any other industrial corporation—to the dictates of a labor union.

Chairman WALSH. The popular name given to this information is called a "blacklist," and I am using that simply—

Mr. SCHIFF (interrupting). I know nothing of that and do not believe it exists.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). I was just trying to explain to you why I used the term "blacklist," as has been complained of. I use the term "blacklist" as has been complained of before the commission from time to time as said to consist of the names of men who are active in attempting to organize their fellow employees into labor organizations, as they are known to-day, into the ordinary labor organization.

Mr. SCHIFF. I know nothing of that.

Chairman WALSH. Now, regardless of the maintenance of such a one in the Western Union—because I am using that company always, as I told you—

Mr. SCHIFF (interrupting). I know nothing of it.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). What is your attitude toward such conduct?

Mr. SCHIFF. I don't think that any executive officers of an industrial corporation who are self-respecting would maintain any such list.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact, or is it a fact, that the Western Union in all of its leases reserves the right to specify what men shall work upon leased wires as laborers or employees?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do not know anything about it.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward the employment of children in industry?

Mr. SCHIFF. I believe that the child should be protected in every possible way. I do not think that any child under 14 years, as a minimum, ought to be employed in any kind of labor for profit.

Chairman WALSH. Now, above 14. What is your attitude as to the protection that should be furnished to children in industry, both as to health and morals, assuming that 14 is a tender age, of course.

Mr. SCHIFF. That is a very far-reaching question. The first condition should always be that the child, if it is employed at all, be surrounded with every protection for good morals and for good health.

Chairman WALSH. Have you read any of the reports of vice committees in the United States that pointed out the alleged fact that large numbers of boys in the employment of the American District Telegraph Co. were sent in the nighttime as a regular practice to vice districts in the conduct of their everyday affairs.

Mr. SCHIFF. If I remember correctly, some years ago such a statement was made in some newspapers. I can not exactly now recall what it was. I would prefer not to answer this, because I do not sufficiently recollect what it was.

Chairman WALSH. Has the executive committee—I believe you answered that they did not have any knowledge of it—or you have any knowledge of it, if it is a fact?

Mr. SCHIFF. Not at all.

Chairman WALSH. And therefore no action that you know of has been taken. As the result of your observation and experience as a banker and a man engaged in the work of the betterment of mankind, do you believe that industrial discontent in America is increasing?

Mr. SCHIFF. I should rather think and hope that it is decreasing.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you a few questions, if you please, Mr. Schiff.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On what basis, Mr. Schiff, does the Baron de Hirsch Fund make loans to farmers?

Mr. SCHIFF. Well, I have already said, in reply to a question put by the chairman, that you better direct that question to the manager of that department of the society. Certainly you can thus get more minute information.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not know their rate of interest which they charge or the length of time allowed the borrower to pay back?

Mr. SCHIFF. I know the rate of interest charged is generally 4 per cent.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Four per cent; and how many years does the borrower have in which to repay the loan?

Mr. SCHIFF. I think you had better ask the manager about that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Untermeyer, in giving testimony the other day—the following was stated, and I am sure the commission would be very glad to get your opinion on the statements made. The question was asked Mr. Untermeyer:

"You made the statement that the railways of this country, as a great body of the railways, are practically under the control of two financial groups?"

"Answer. A large part of them are. A large part of that mileage is under the domination, or under the potential domination of these groups.

"Question. How has the reserve banking act affected, if at all, the banking control of railroad systems?"

"Answer. Not materially, as yet. It is hoped that it will. It is expected that it will in this way: That until the banking law was passed the reserves of the banks all through the country were deposited in New York largely, and these reserves were deposited in banks that were controlled by the same groups, and those vast funds were under the domination of these men. Now, the reserve act, when it gets into full operation, which will take a few years, will distribute those reserves, and the vast sums that come to New York will not come here; and in that way there will be, to some extent, the centralization of the control—concentration of the control of this money that was in the banks. I look for very substantial results from the Federal-reserve act. I think it is one of the greatest pieces of constructive work this country has ever done."

In how far, Mr. Schiff, does your opinion concur with this?

Mr. SCHIFF. My opinion concurs with that of Mr. Untermeyer as to the Federal-reserve legislation, that it is one of the greatest pieces of constructive legislation we have ever done. As to the statement that two groups of bankers control most of the railways of this country, I think it is sheer nonsense.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think Mr. Untermeyer is mistaken about that?

Mr. SCHIFF. Very much so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What are the facts, as you know them, Mr. Schiff?

Mr. SCHIFF. I do know—so far as I know there is absolutely no control except that such control is exercised indirectly by the officers and directors for the time being who from year to year send out proxy blanks to the shareholders who are at liberty to return them or not. I believe that the weakness of the whole system is the human weakness, that stockholders, as long as things go right, do not pay any attention to the management of their property; and that only when things go wrong they come to realize that they are stockholders, and that they should not have permitted their property to be controlled by those who have wrongly or badly managed it. If stockholders would make it a business of exercising their right as stockholders and devote themselves—which I am afraid you can never make them do by law—to the affairs of their companies very little of what is called railroad mismanagement would happen in this country.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think that the railway mismanagement, then, is largely due to neglect of their duties on the part of the stockholders.

Mr. SCHIFF. To neglect on the part of the stockholders—a human failing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Untermeyer was further asked this question:

"You also pointed out how, under the system of railroad reorganization, a small minority is made to control. In other words, the tail wags the dog.

"Answer. Well, not exactly that. That was not what I intended to convey. I intended to convey the idea that the financial interests that dominated the road when it gets into trouble retain that control through our method of reorganization after it gets out of trouble and continues to dominate.

"And in the case in which it does not dominate the road before it got into trouble, our system lends itself readily to getting domination over it when it gets into trouble and when it is out of trouble.

"Question. Well, now, so far as you have been able to observe, has that system proven helpful or hurtful to the railroad stockholders?"

"Answer. I think very hurtful.

"Question. You think very hurtful. That is, it has robbed the majority of the minority stockholders of a voice?"

"Answer. Not only of a voice, but it has robbed the roads of the protection that would come from the protection of a minority voice.

"Question. And I suppose you would point to the New Haven road as a horrible example?"

"Answer. Well, I should point to others as much more horrible examples, because in the New Haven road I do not think there was much corruption, if any—"

Mr. SCHIFF. There was much what?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. "Corruption, if any. There was very bad judgment and recklessness in attempting to dominate nearly a whole section of country; but in other roads it has been much worse."

Now, the point is, in how far from your knowledge and experience and observation Mr. Untermeyer is correct in his statement, when he says that when a road gets into trouble the banking interests dominate it and retain that dominating control after the trouble has been righted.

Mr. SCHIFF. I think what Mr. Untermeyer points out is, in a certain way, correct. The difficulty is not in the banking interests that have reorganized that wants control; it is the fact that in most instances the banking interests can not rid itself of certain control. When the stock issued in a reorganization is issued to the banking interests, those to whom it goes—often people to whom such stock goes live in remote places. They represent former bondholders in Europe and all over the United States, and they won't transfer their stock as they should into their own names from those in which they receive it. There is where the difficulty is, and I am quite certain that most of the banking interests who in a reorganization have to make themselves responsible for the first year's management immediately after a reorganization is completed would much rather rid themselves of that responsibility if only the stockholders would take hold themselves.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, the banking interests look upon that as a burden and a liability rather than as an asset.

Mr. SCHIFF. Somewhat in that way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, furthermore, the question was put to Mr. Untermeyer:

"Question. You also pointed out that the large industries or important industries getting into a few hands was inimical to labor?"

"Answer. Yes; puts it at a great disadvantage.

"Question. That is, minimizes the possibility of labor organization?"

"Answer. Well, not only labor organizing, but unorganized, in getting its rights, because labor has nowhere else to go. If the labor in an industry has only that industry that it can deal with and has to deal with the whole industry and their terms are unsatisfactory, then it has nowhere else to go."

Now, has it been your observation, Mr. Schiff, that the large industries getting into a few hands was inimical to labor, to the interests of labor.

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes and no. It is very difficult to set forth an opinion. I believe it is of much advantage to labor to deal with large organizations. I believe it is of more advantage to labor to deal with one body of men who are in the limelight of public opinion. And no matter what they personally may want to do, they must regard what the public tells them is right, and public opinion is generally right. It is harder for the laboring man to deal with many small employers, who may be selfish, and often are, and who are not amenable to public opinion; so I say yes and no.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have just pointed out the advantage to labor in being where it can deal with a few large corporations that are in the limelight and are a target. What are the disadvantages?

Mr. SCHIFF. The disadvantages are that the smaller employer can often not hold out as long against the demands of labor. He employs his own capital, and when he succumbs it is his end. The large corporation can, as a rule, with much more power, hold out against what it thinks may be an unjust demand.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it not also a fact, Mr. Schiff, that very large corporations that are only indirectly dependent upon public good will, like a great steel company that sells its product to builders and contractors and to manufacturers, and coal mines that do not deal directly with the consumer, that enterprises of that character can afford to ignore public opinion, as they did in Colorado where every possible pressure was brought to bear on them through public sentiment, but they refused to yield to public sentiment?

Mr. SCHIFF. I did not speak of public good will, but public opinion, and I do not believe that in the long run public opinion can ever be defied. The last word has not been said yet in Colorado. Public opinion in the long run always survives. Sometimes public opinion is wrong, but in the end it determines all matters generally justly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it that you think public opinion can crystallize itself into legislation that no one can deny.

Mr. SCHIFF. Yes. Sometimes it is mistaken legislation, but then legislation may likewise be corrected through public opinion. That is all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Schiff, thank you.

Is Dr. Hollander here?

TESTIMONY OF PROF. JACOB H. HOLLANDER.

Chairman WALSH. State your name please.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Jacob H. Hollander.

Chairman WALSH. What is your profession?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I am professor of political economy in the Johns Hopkins University.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you held that position?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I have been connected with the teaching staff for 20 years.

Chairman WALSH. Has that been your life work?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It has.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you prepare yourself?

Prof. HOLLANDER. At the Johns Hopkins University.

Chairman WALSH. You are a graduate of that university?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I am.

Chairman WALSH. You reside in Baltimore?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made any study of the questions, the broad general questions of unemployment, industrial warfare, poverty, and its causes?

Prof. HOLLANDER. My interest has been, I think, that of all political economists, a study of the causes of modern social unrest. The opinions which I have reached are, I think, in a general sense, those of modern political economists. A very considerable number of economists have doubtless developed minor differences, but in the main I should say there is a reasonable consensus of opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make a particular study of the effect of the concentration of industry—the organization of industrial plants into very large corporations?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Only as the general problem has led to a study of that particular phase of the matter. Might I ask, Mr. Chairman, whether it would not perhaps be simpler if I were to describe, not in any great detail, the general point of view from which I have approached this problem?

Chairman WALSH. I think it would be very well to do that.

Prof. HOLLANDER. The opinion of political economists, in so far as I can voice it, is that the social unrest—manifest not only in this country but in every industrial country—is due to the existence of economic want or poverty, as distinct on the one hand from pauperism and on the other from economic inequality. By poverty, I mean the existence of large areas of industrial society the members of which are in receipt of incomes less than enough to maintain themselves and those dependent upon them in decent existence. I believe that such poverty is the consequence, not of any absolute dearth—that the world produces enough to go around, that economic want is therefore not a question of insufficient production but of defects in distribution.

The issue then presents itself as to whether these defects are fundamental, involving the whole distributive system, or whether they represent merely friction in the existing system. The first view is, of course, that entertained by the socialistic school, and by the extreme individualistic school. As to it the attitude of the political economist is that the case is not proven, even though it may hereafter appear that the defects of the existing industrial order are beyond remedy, and that we will then be warranted in attempting some radical reconstruction. In short, we must exhaust the possibilities of remedial correction before taking a leap in the dark. Political economists therefore are in sympathy with forms of social intervention whereby, to some extent through the pressure of public opinion and to some extent by actual legislation, society shall intervene to correct the ills which have developed. Now, those ills, we believe, are largely consequent on insufficient income. We recognize that there are existing disorders, quite apart from questions of income, such as the well-known evils of city residence, insanitary environment, the needs of labor legislation and the like. But in the long run it is true that the great mass of poverty is the consequence of the inability of men, anxious, eager, and ordinarily competent to work, to earn enough to maintain the standard which prevents poverty. Now, this conclusion does not run counter to the accepted theory of wages. Perhaps, instead of "accepted theory of wages" the proper term is "prevailing theory of wages," for there is no complete agreement among economists as to what determines wages. But whatever views or theories obtain as to the law of wages, whether it is determined by the standard of life or by the productivity of labor, or by demand and supply, there is nothing in any current theory of wages that precludes the laborer from obtaining a sufficient wage. If he fails to secure such a wage, it must be in consequence of the fact that he enters into the wage contract on a plane of competitive inequality. The wage contract, in short, is the result of a bargain between the employer and the employee, and if the employer is in a superior competitive position, by reason of combination, and the laborer is unorganized, he is at a bargaining disadvantage which is certain to redound to his hurt.

I think political economists accordingly then are in agreement that trade-unionism is essential as a means of bringing the workman into industrial bargaining on a plane of equality. Trade-unionism is not, however, a complete panacea. There remain certain industrial classes who are unorganizable and other classes who through defects of body or mind are unemployable, as, too, there are certain social phenomena which at recurring intervals make employment impossible. So that trade-unionism must be supplemented by provision for three classes; the underpaid, whose needs should be met by wage legislation, commonly described as "minimum-wage legislation"; the class of the unemployed, who are brought to their plight by seasonal or cyclical fluctuations in industry; and the class of the unemployable represented by the maimed, by those who have reached industrial old age, and by those who have been thrown out by sickness. Trade-unionism, in other words, supplemented by provision for the underpaid, the unemployed, and the unemployable, represents the program. I may say finally that I am far from suggesting this is a platform on which all economists are agreed, but I think it might be described as the general consensus prevailing among them.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say you believe that remedial measures have not been exhausted under our present system. I wish you would apply that general statement to the situation as you find it from your research in the country to-day and suggest, first, what remedial measures you would indicate as being fundamental to an approach to the situation, aside from regulation of tenement districts, etc.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Society has never taken seriously the problem of poverty. We have never attacked it as disease is attacked. What we have done is to devote attention to pauperism, because that is spectacular, the inability to provide decent livelihood only comes to the fore when there is some spectacular disorder, a great industrial conflict. The silent, tragic mischief-working conditions have never received attention. It is like a form of disease that goes on and no one discovers it until the collapse comes. When we realize that there are at any given time vast numbers, perhaps 10,000,000, of persons in the United States in that condition and undertake to analyze the causes and proceed to apply general remedies, then it seems to me we have launched upon this kind of intervention. You have asked specifically what form it is to take. It means in the first place a very decided revulsion of opinion as to trade-unionism. The general attitude among employers of labor is often open and decided opposition to labor. Until society recognizes the unwisdom of that attitude and demands that the laborer must enter into his wage bargaining on a plane of competitive equality society has not lifted its finger to remedy that evil.

Again, when society, having taken that step, and having recognized that trade-unionism is a proper and legitimate social institution as much as the regulation of the employment of children or the limitation of the hours of employment of women, and meets the further difficulty that there are classes of workers who can not be reached in this way, then society will take the next step. Not next in the order of time, for it may proceed on simultaneously in the way of minimum-wage legislation, and thereafter in other directions.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a scientific basis for minimum wage outside of the question of legality?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes. Society has never hesitated to intervene to define minimum standards of employment as to hours of work, as to the age of the worker, as to working environments. Time was when society looked upon with the same wonderment upon the proposition that the State should intervene and say to the employer, "You shall not employ children under a certain age; you shall not employ women over a certain number of hours. Those are matters of free contract."

Now, if this can be done with respect to minimum conditions of employment, why should it not be done as to minimum wages?

Chairman WALSH. What would you say about the suggestion that if that principle were settled into the law of the land—in logic, could it be used to establish a maximum wage and thus the employment would, through the law, be made subject—

Prof. HOLLANDER (interrupting). That, it seems to me, would be nonsequitur. The law intervenes to define minimum conditions of employment. It says you must not employ a child under a certain age, but it does not say what the age of actual employment shall be. It says that you shall not work men or women more than a certain number of hours, but not how many hours you shall actually work them. The idea is to establish the plane upon which competition shall prevail.

Chairman WALSH. What is your diagnosis of the industrial situation, say, as to the principal ills from which American industry is suffering at the present time?

Prof. HOLLANDER. The existence of economic want. The existence of large numbers of people having less than enough to maintain themselves and those dependent upon them in decent existence. Society has no sympathy with mere economic inequality if the least well off have enough for decent existence. It is a fact that there are great areas of decent, God-fearing people, who have less than enough, and that makes the problem grave.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say would be the immediate and practical remedy for these ills? We will leave the question of minimum wage.

Prof. HOLLANDER. I should say provision for what I have defined as the unemployable, those who are in a measure down and out, either from accident, which involves a system of workmen's compensation; and those liable to become down and out from the results of sickness, which involves insurance against sickness; and those actually down and out through old age, which involves insurance against old age. That is, minimum wage legislation supplemented by a system of social insurance, together with some provision against that cruelest of all social injustices, unemployment.

Chairman WALSH. A suggestion along that line, if you please, as to machinery.

Prof. HOLLANDER. I should say we can do no better than to follow the lead of progressive communities, notably England, in that respect. A system of State administered employment bureaus, together with certain measures designed to affect decasualization.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any effort that has come under your observation of decasualization of labor; that is, any invention or plan that if it could be called such has a tendency to decasualize common labor or to make it less seasonal?

Prof. HOLLANDER. The most remarkable example, I suppose, would be that of the London dock workers. This is a story doubtless familiar to the commission and I need not go into it, but it was one of the most scandalous evils of our modern industrial system. Thousands of men were clamoring like wild beasts for a chance, each morning, at the gates of the London docks, with no possibility of more than a fractional part of them ever getting a day's work, and the whole mob being kept alive by the fact that in the course of a week perhaps each could get two or three days' work.

The newly formed employment bureau took the matter in hand, and by a system of registration, whereby it was definitely indicated by each of the dock companies as to how many they needed, undertook to practically establish a permanent dock force. The result doubtless has been some temporary hardship suffered by those who had been looking for this casual work, but the net result has been great good, in that it assigns to dock work the number of men who are needed for that, and gives no work of that kind to this surplus, leading eventually, indeed, to their dissipation and absorption in other fields of industrial employment.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any plans that have been attempted to be worked out in this country?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Nothing, it seems to me, that has gotten beyond the mere employment-agency idea, the theory summed up in that—a common phrase of "the jobless man and the manless job." But that, it seems to me, is only one of the features and rather a minor feature of an employment agency.

Chairman WALSH. Could not a scientific approach be made to the subject of the casualizing labor generally; that is—

Prof. HOLLANDER (interrupting). Undoubtedly.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). That is seasonal labor as it exists in this country to-day?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Undoubtedly.

Chairman WALSH. Has no one made the effort?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I do not know of anyone that has. I think it is under contemplation. We are groping toward it. It is being tried out by cities and States. It seems to me that the obvious approach would be through a national board, the idea of—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Of what character?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Through the establishment, as I believe is in contemplation, of a national employment bureau, commission, or board.

Chairman WALSH. Would that not necessarily involve cooperation on the part of those individuals who are engaged in these large operations where large numbers of casual laborers are employed, take the lumber, the ice, and the coal—not the coal business, perhaps?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It would. It might mean something more, perhaps, if the conditions in this country are as the most acute students of the problem of unemployment have analyzed them, namely, that unemployment is not due merely to seasonal or even to cyclical fluctuation, but to the vicious practices which enable industries to accumulate surplus funds of labor; that is to say, to have on hand enough men to meet the maximum requirements and not the average normal requirement. It is the story of the dock workers over again. It was a convenient thing to have hammering at the gates of the docks enough men to meet the extraordinary requirements.

Chairman WALSH. By what way is that influence exercised, or what control can the employer have over that, so far as the individuals in that industry are concerned?

Prof. HOLLANDER. By a definite coordination of the employing requirement, so that in the case of a given industry in a locality it would be known just what the normal labor requirement was. By such "dovetailing" the normal demand would constantly approach to the average demand. If I may revert to the dock illustration again, since all the boats might come in on the same day, it seemed desirable to keep enough laborers on hand to meet just such a contingency. It would have been far better to have adjusted the arrivals so that the men that were docking to-day on this ship could dock to-morrow on that, and not all dock on the same day and the next day the whole gang be idle. Now, some such coordination ought to be possible in regard to industries in general, and would be through the cooperation of the employers.

Chairman WALSH. Why does not a large concern like the packing establishment deal with the common laborers the way that it does, for instance, with its clerks, stenographers, and highly skilled laborers that are paid for a definite time, even though the work is not always so large at a particular time?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I am not sure I understand.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps I have not made it clear. If it is a custom now, as you say, on the docks just to use these men, and we will take the dock illustration, just when a ship comes in, why could they not so manage their work that the laborer would be in exactly the same condition as the engineer, or perhaps the fireman, or the skilled clerk in the large establishment?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It is quite possible that such improvement might be affected or would develop out of it. Of course the obvious contrast is the distinction between time pay and piece pay.

Chairman WALSH. But let me make the suggestion as it comes to my mind as a witness, for instance, who describes much like the case of the fireman that does not go to a fire for two or three days, but sits around during all of that time and draws his salary all the time.

Prof. HOLLANDER. I think that the idea of decasualization would involve the replacement of the men with the occasional job by a condition of employment under which he would be permanently employed.

Chairman WALSH. If decasualization of employment does cause misery and suffering and general social ill, should that not, as a scientific matter, be taken into consideration in the organization of industry?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Undoubtedly. Of course, it means not only hurt to the workman but it means social injury through the reduction in productive power. If there are so many men casually engaged in a particular industry that they can only find part employment it would be vastly better if a small number were engaged in that and the surplus were absorbed in something else or distributed somewhere else.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the effect of the development of large corporations with the centralization of control in the hands of directors who are entirely separated from the industries in which they are interested, and who may be entirely ignorant of the labor conditions in the industries in which they are interested, if you have an observation on that development?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Of course, that is a matter of fact as to which I have no information that would be of value to the commission.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention, during your studies, been called to the fact, for instance, in the labor literature of the day—

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). As to whether or not such have existed?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Of course, it is as old as economic observation. Adam Smith, the father of political economy, wrote nearly 150 years ago, calling attention to that silent, tacit agreement among employers which brings them into the wage contract more or less concentrated as against the scattered and dissipated voices of the workmen. Now, to the extent that that tacit agreement is replaced by an outright consolidation into corporate form of the bargaining power, as it were, of the employer is that much enhanced. As against that it seems to me something is undoubtedly to be said as to the matter that has already engaged the attention of the commission, namely, where the corporation is one that is represented in ownership by a wide dissipation of its securities, and which occupies, in a high degree, the public attention. It is undoubtedly amenable in such cases to public opinion in a way that a smaller employer is not. Even the most glaring instances of the apparent violation of that tendency, I think, fall under the rule because the mere outcry with which the assertion of a contrary principle is received bears testimony, I think, to the fact that it runs counter to prevailing public opinion.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to submit some questions to you, and I will submit them in the form that I have been asked to: What are the qualifications and standards necessary for trade-unions to possess to make it a proper social institution?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I should say in general that their policy be not hostile to the general social interest; trade-unionists, like any other class of workmen, are entitled to pursue those courses which will benefit them without at the same time inflicting injury upon society.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider the absolute control of industry by the closed shop desirable or a remedy?

Prof. HOLLANDER. No; I do not believe that. I do not believe trade-unionists believe that either. What they want is the maintenance of standard conditions, and if those conditions can be established they are more or less indifferent to the fact. There is a certain violation of the class esprit, I think, in the open shop; men benefiting by the gains of trade-unionism should feel enough loyalty to bear its burdens. The insistence of trade-unionism is, however, to establish standard conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe in what is called scientific shop management?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Well, I do not know whether I quite understand what it is myself. There is some danger of the term being used as a sort of charm to cover a number of different things. If it means devices whereby the total productivity of society, the efficiency, so-called, of the laborer can be enhanced without any detriment to him through speeding up; with the possibility of physical injury or as a prelude to reduction of his wage, why, of course, I believe in it. But if it is merely an entering wedge to effect something else, or as a pretext for effecting something else, no believer in social betterment can approve of it. My own feeling is that there is too much obscurity about it. There is a danger of the word itself casting a spell over the argument.

Commissioner LENNON. Professor, is it ordinarily the view of economists at the present time that wages should be fixed by what is termed the law of supply and demand exactly the same as inanimate objects of a barter and trade.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Not by any means if that involves a resultant wage less than enough to maintain decent existence.

Commissioner LENNON. Does this law—I hate to say law, but that is the way it is used—

Prof. HOLLANDER. There are good laws as well as bad ones.

Commissioner LENNON. Does this law of supply and demand govern in the world of industry and markets even as to the selling and buying price of commodities?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It may. But labor is not a commodity. No economist of position would maintain that.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, is the price of oil, for instance, fixed in the markets of the world because of the supply or lack of supply of oil—

Prof. HOLLANDER (interrupting). Demand and supply operate in the fixing of the price of commodities subject always to the cost of production. Now, if you mean that the cost of production of the laborer is that amount which will enable him to live decently, maintain his family decently, and rear his offspring decently, then I have no objection to saying that demand and supply fix wages.

Commissioner LENNON. Does your study indicate that the price of commodities is fixed by monopolization to some extent of the markets?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Of course, where the supply is not capable of increase to an indefinite amount at a uniform cost, where the supply is controlled to any extent, prices are not subject to the cost of production. We have, then, so-called monopoly prices.

Commissioner LENNON. What would you say as to the situation to-day with regard to the wheat market? Is the price of wheat governed by the fundamental ideas of the laws of supply and demand by the intervention of unnatural conditions through man's action—

Prof. HOLLANDER (interrupting). Through what?

Commissioner LENNON. Through governmental action?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Well, I wish I knew. There are, of course, extraordinary new facts entering into the situation. To what extent they are responsible is a matter that I wish I knew. Of course, we know what these facts are—curtailment of the supply and the extraordinary demand developed by the war. Whether these have jacked up the price to its particular level or whether there is any degree of monopoly of a kind as old as the forestalling and re-grading of the sixteenth century are questions of fact.

Commissioner LENNON. It is not easy, then, you think, to determine in that particular matter how far governmental action has interfered or how far the price is governed actually by the supply and demand?

Prof. HOLLANDER. No; I should say it is a question of fact. We know perfectly well that if peace were declared to-morrow, or if the United States should put an embargo on exports, the price of wheat would drop. On the other hand, we know that if Argentine crops would fail the price would go up. Or if a corner in Chicago was successful that it would go up still higher. In other words, we have the possibility of certain definite economic factors being supplemented by manipulative factors. Whether or not factors of that kind are present I should say is a question of fact.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, that would indicate that in our modern society the natural workings of this law are often set aside by artificial conditions.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Of course that is the characteristics of any scientific law. A law, as I understand it, in economics and in social relations just as in physics is the operation of certain tendencies. The tendencies may be modified or entirely counteracted by counter tendencies. The law still works, but the end effected is qualified by the presence of these other forces.

Commissioner LENNON. Professor, the law under which this commission has been created directs that we study the causes of unrest and the rights of the Government or society to intervene for the remedy of such wrongs as may be observed. What would you say to us as to the rights of society to handle this?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Well, I had hoped that that right had been so securely established that it was not necessary to appoint Government commissions any longer for the purpose. The time has passed, I believe—certainly among the mass of people—where there is any question that society exists for the purpose of achieving the maximum well-being for those who compose it. When any considerable part of it is in a condition capable of betterment society must, as soon as it discovers the reasonably right way of doing it, adopt measures correcting such defect.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Ballard has a question or two to ask you.

Commissioner BALLARD. Prof. Hollander, you have spoken of the matter of insufficient wages to maintain a family?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. Do political economists at all take into consideration the fact that in every factory are large numbers of men employed at the same wages and that some families are able to accumulate and apparently live comfortably and get ahead, and other families do not, probably because the head of the family may be a drinking man, or indifferent, or quite incapable, or something of that kind?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes, sir. Of course, when one speaks in the general terms I have employed one is seeking to describe general tendencies and general conditions. There are cases where lack of thrift or individual misfortune are responsible. But when we find, as we do, that the family income of a large part of the wage earners of the United States are within certain definite limits, and when we know with equally accurate knowledge that the cost of maintaining an average family of five on a basis of physical well-being requires a certain amount, both of which conceptions are not merely made "in the office," but are generalizations based upon definite statistical inquiries, and when we find a marked discrepancy between those two amounts, then the conclusion seems warranted that, for a considerable part of the wage-earning class of the United States, representing roughly about a third, let us say—I have not the exact proportion—that the wage income is less than enough to maintain those, allowance being made for individual cases where lack of thrift or larger family or misfortune of illness or death are responsible.

Commissioner BALLARD. Well, if this standard living wage in America is well established, doesn't it offer very great inducements to the foreign immigrants who have been raised on a standard, perhaps, of a third or one-fourth, to come into our country in very great numbers, as they have within the last year or two, and so that they can not be cared for to bring them up to that standard and keep them from breaking down that standard continually?

Prof. HOLLANDER. That brings up an extremely difficult and involved question, and I shall try to keep clear of the discussion of the actual economic effects of immigration. But, assuming that it is as you have stated, that the United States were menaced with an influx of immigration, and that the effect of that immigration were such as to lower the standard—both of which I state merely as assumptions and not as facts—then it seems to me that it is beyond discussion; that it would be the economic policy and the social policy of the United States to limit such immigration. I ought to state that the attitude of those who oppose any restriction is based upon a denial of those two assumptions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Well, speaking as you did a while ago as to the question of hours, limiting them, for instance, to 8 hours, or some other number of hours, might not some persons prefer to work 10 hours or even 12 hours for short periods or a number of days and then have a complete rest for some number of days, and should not they be allowed to do it? Take, for instance, in agricultural work. We know that in agriculture the hours in the summer time are very long and in the wintertime comparatively short and a time of leisure, and then again as in shipping and railroading and seasonal occupations?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Well, I think that illustrates the unwisdom of making legislation general. Of course, some legislation, some regulative measures, some police measures, must apply to all members of society; but in so far as the end in view can be accomplished by specific regard for particular necessities that is desirable. In the matter of minimum-wage legislation no economists, I think, would favor the fixture of a rate applicable to all as a minimum wage. Such legislation as obtains anything—in England, for example—involves the idea of administration of conditions in the specific industries and specific processes.

Now, so in regard to the legislation affecting hours. It would be obviously desirable to meet the particular requirements of particular industries provided that the result in those industries is not in violation of the general object attained. In so far as that might accomplish individual hardship, I am afraid that is a condition inseparable from any large police regulation.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke of division of occupation as between the wage class and salaried class—you might separate them that way, for instance—the labor unions have so highly specialized some of their trades, particularly, perhaps, the building trade, that it is almost impossible to give men in that trade continuous occupation. It can not be done. In very small towns, and particularly in the South, in olden times if two or three men started to build a house they built the entire house. They would do the carpenter work and the brickwork and probably put the roof on and do the painting. But where it is so highly specialized as it is now under labor-union domination of the building trades the carpenters might have to wait for a week until the roofers put the roof on, and the tanners might have to wait until the painters came, and a great deal of time is lost in that way. Have you thought of any method of regulating that?

Prof. HOLLANDER. That, of course, represents the grave difficulties in dovetailing employments. Some employments do not dovetail. In so far as they are seasonal—that is, the work exists only at certain times—I should say the rate of compensation must be such as to cover a maintenance income for the year or must permit an alternative occupation. But the particular evils growing out of casual employments for which decasualization is proposed as a remedy are somewhat different from that. They grow out of the fact that the occupation exists, but that there are too many claimants for it.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until this afternoon at 2 o'clock. I wish to announce that the meeting of the commission this afternoon will be in the aldermanic chamber immediately across the hall at 2 o'clock sharp. In the aldermanic chamber. You will please be here at that time, Professor.

Prof. HOLLANDER. You want me back?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

(Thereupon at 12.30 a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m. of this Wednesday, January 20, 1915.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Present as before.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will please come to order.

Dr. Hollander, will you please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF PROF. JACOB H. HOLLANDER—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Before we proceed, I have been requested to make an announcement to the ladies and gentlemen present. It is this: That the board of aldermen have given the commission the use of this room, but asked us to request that there shall be no smoking, and secondly, that the ladies and gentlemen present should be very careful not to disturb any documents or papers that lie on the desk. I am sure you will all help us to carry out our agreement with the board of aldermen. Thank you if you do.

Commissioner GARRETSON has a question or two.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Doctor, you were speaking of minimum-wage legislation. Have you any knowledge of any case where legislation, aside from minimum-wage legislation, was ever enacted unless supply and demand had gone against the laborer—the law of supply and demand—as, for instance, the English wage legislation following Edward III, where the supply of labor largely decreased?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Well, Mr. Commissioner, I feel as though you had asked me whether I had beaten my mother-in-law yesterday. I hesitate, not because of any doubt, but because I am not quite sure I understand you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know of any instance where there has been legislation fixing wages except where the legitimate law of supply and demand, as it is recognized, would have enabled the laborer through the scarcity of men, to largely increase the price for his labor?

Prof. HOLLANDER. As a matter of fact, there has been very little legislation, if any, affecting the rate of wages.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Minimum-wage legislation at the present time, which is the social interest.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Of course, for a long while the rate of agricultural labor, for example, was fixed in the English rural district by the county justices. I suppose the motive there was to secure cheap labor for the country squire.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was all as against the laborer?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It at any rate was not in the interest of society.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It had no social reason underlying, but purely one of gain?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I suspect eighteenth-century legislation was not animated much by social consideration.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe, as an economist, that the increasing of wages, if made universal, works any amelioration whatever of the condition of the worker because of the consequent rise of the prices, if they bear the same relation to each other before and after the increase?

Prof. HOLLANDER. The statement is commonly made that after all it would do no good if wages were universally increased, because labor then would be obliged to pay that much more for the product he consumes. It would be a sort of attempt to lift one's self by one's boot straps. There are several considerations that figure here. In the first place, it is not clear by any means that industrial profits are not excessive. To the degree that they are an increase in wages would be at the expense of excessive profits. In the second place, it is very probable that increased wages would result in increased productivity, on the theory that to the degree that underpaid and therefore undervitalized work people receive larger earnings, their industrial efficiency would be enhanced. Finally, the assumption of a universal and a simultaneous rise in wages is fantastic. That is not the way industrial betterment moves. It takes place from one occupation to another and does not, as the question assumes, increase the cost to the laborer as a consumer in the same proportion as his income rises as a producer. I should sum up by saying that, as stated in the bald way in which it is stated, namely, an increase of wages would not benefit the laborer, because it would add to his consumption outlays in the same measure that it adds to his income—that doctrine is not accepted by economists at this day.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The fact that it can not be made universal is the agency that works the most completely to make an increase in wages a palliative, is it not?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I am not sure that I got that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The fact that it can not be made universal—that is, the increase be made simultaneous, as you term it—

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON (continuing). Is the very reason that the efforts of a certain class to better its wage acts as a benefit to them if too many are not benefited thereby?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I presume you wish to know the attitude of economists. Economists are not, as they are sometimes supposed to be, dreamers. They are concerned with the real as a natural problem. Now, that problem is how can an industrial class benefit itself and improve its economic condition? It is not achieved by a wave of the wand whereby all will wake up the next morning with larger pay envelopes. It comes by a struggle extending from one trade to another—from one class to another. And I should not think that this gradual process ought to be arrested or is likely to be arrested. Accordingly, I do not consider that after all when the worker has his greater income it will dissolve in consequence of the fact that his cost of living will have increased correspondingly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The real measure of a wage is its purchasing power, is it not?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You spoke of one or two phases of legislation that you considered legitimate. Would, in your opinion, the measure of difference between the cost of production and selling price be as legitimate a field for legislative control as the wage of men?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Both would be subject to the same criterion, which is social expediency, the effect on society in general. If the encroachment on profit should be to such a degree as to impair the further accumulation, or even the maintenance of productive capital, or discourage motives of thrift, obviously it would react to the detriment of society. It is not necessary to institute comparisons, but it would react to the detriment of society, just as the underpayment of the working force would do. But who will say what amount is the necessary reward of capital?

Commissioner GARRETSON. It would be just as legitimate for a legislative tribunal to fix that measure as it would to fix the measure as to what would be the compensation for a man?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Legitimate, if you construe legitimate in terms of social expediency, yes. The test of that is the interest of society, always checked by having the burden of proof put on any radical change.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does the economist hold that, as a moral question, or as an economic question, there is any difference between the complaint made against labor unions or members of them in regard to the limitation of output of the individual, and the limitation of the manufacturer by the shutting down of his mill? Are they equally economically wrong, or is there a difference between the two in result?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Political economists, I should say, always with the reservation that I am only one of them, would dissent from any restriction of output that was dictated by selfish or sectional class interest of a part of the trade-union world and not by its legitimate and wholesome desire to prevent a speeding up of the worker, threatening physical injury to the worker. In so far as the restriction of output is designed merely to make work, it is, I think, regarded as antisocial.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to the incident that was testified to yesterday, where apples were thrown into the river to keep up the price of apples as a form of restriction of production for the purpose of maintaining the price, is that more moral than the other or more social—antisocial?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It is like the Dutch burning ships in the harbor of Rotterdam to keep up the price of spice, and on the same level with burning the pigsty to supply roast pork.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gathered from what you said, Professor, that you did not know of any one way to minimize industrial unrest—that there are manifold ways—many things must be done. I think you stated workmen's compensation, minimum wage, insurance against sickness, old-age insurance, etc. Are there any other things that might be done and should be done to minimize industrial unrest?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I should say that we must feel our way as we go. Wherein economic science of to-day differs from social philosophy of earlier periods is in perhaps that we have relinquished the idea of an economic panacea or cure-all and have come to realize the complexity of the problem and the inevitable necessity of using various devices, all of which are a part of one general scheme, or which, at any rate, are organically related. There is no disposition to abandon the present industrial system and to try something new until we have exhausted by successive phases of social intervention all possible correctives. If, after that has been done, we find the situation not much improved, then, perhaps, we will resort to that remedy which John Stuart Mill proposed when, after discussing all the possible dangers of socialism, he said that if all the ills of the existing social order were incapable of improvement, then he, for one, was ready to chance socialism with all its dangers. Intervention—social regulation—taken step by step, rather than any outright panacea, is the philosophy of the day.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So, summing up in the fewest possible words, that would be your statement?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I will state it in just a sentence, although a pretty long sentence, I am afraid—social unrest grows out of the existence of the large class of society with insufficient income. That proceeds from the fact that in the adjustment of wages the workingman is ordinarily in a state of competitive inequality. To correct that, collective action in the form of trade-unionism is necessary. To the degree that trade-unionism is not possible, positive State action in the form of measures directed against underpayment, unemployment, and unemployableness are the remedies to be devised. Then, so much tried and accomplished, we shall know what next step to take.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What remedies, if any, professor, would you have to suggest as to the matter of strikes and lockouts? How would you minimize those?

Prof. HOLLANDER. The parallel here, it seems to me, is between industrial warfare and political or international warfare. We might as well recognize the important fact that although the interests of—of employer and employee are harmonious in the sense that their conjoined action results in a larger or smaller product, there is a sharp, inevitable issue in the apportionment of the product. The loaf may be made bigger or smaller, but it has to be divided. Now, until some rules of apportionment are recognized, that division will be accompanied by all the brutality and waste of warfare, strikes and lockouts, representing the incidents of that industrial warfare.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you minimize that, Professor?

Prof. HOLLANDER. As long as the bargaining equality of the two parties is on a plane—rules of the game become recognized. I draw a certain analogy here between industrial partition and litigation. Matters at issue are taken to the courts. The adjudication inevitably works benefit to the one and hardship to the other, in the sense that the other would be better off if the verdict were more favorable. Acquiescence in the verdict is possible because society recognizes that principles of law prevail in adjudication which the experience of society has demonstrated redound in the long run to the advantage of society. Now, when society will have recognized similarly the principle which fixes wages and have recognized it in the form of arbitral determination of wage disputes, then wages in actual adjustment will tend to approximate thereto.

At present we have cases where arbitral disputes are referred to tribunals, but what is the principle of adjustment? It is either splitting the difference or some such evasion as standardization. You will remember that in 1912 in the arbitration case of the locomotive engineers the chagrin of the arbitral board that it was not able to find any principle of wages, and that standardization seemed the only practical solution.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, assuming that when the age of equity has arrived the strike and the lockouts may be a thing of the past, but taking conditions as we find them to-day, with all their inequities existing, how would you minimize the strike and the lockouts?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It seems to me the initiative there must be taken by arbitral boards, in the determination by the board, of the matter in dispute, in accordance with some principle and not in accordance with an empirical splitting of difference; the settlement must be in accordance with some principle.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you believe arbitration is the missing link?

Prof. HOLLANDER. I think the theory of wages is—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the academic attitude toward the question of diminishing output on the part of the workers?

(At this point there was a short pause taken on account of the noise occasioned by a parade passing.)

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You know there is a sentiment—I do not know whether it is a growing sentiment—but there is a sentiment more especially among the socialistic branch of labor which makes for diminishing output, on the theory that the diminishing output creates more labor for more hands.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes; I understand. That I mentioned in answer to Mr. Garretson as the make-work theory.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Prof. HOLLANDER. That is the theory that by the workmen doing less there will be more to go around. That is socially unsound.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Give your reasons why it is unsound.

Prof. HOLLANDER. In so far as the amount produced is less than could be produced by a given group of men working, not under speeding pressure, the product available for society is made that much less. It is socially unsound, even though it redounds to the particular advantage of that particular union. That points, of course, to the fact of the complexity of the problem. Unions of organized workmen are not going to be animated and controlled by the long run when it is the short run that counts.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think, then, that the man, especially the laboring man, who preaches diminished output is preaching a false doctrine?

Prof. HOLLANDER. In so far as the trade-unionist is preaching this is voicing a social policy which is unsound. One of the numerous instances, of course, in which the personal interest and social expediency are not consistent.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean that that would be an instance of conflict between the best interest of society and the seeming best interest of that particular class?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes; growing out of the imperfect distribution of productive force. It means that there is a relative excess of workers in that particular field, and that the workman carries the odium that is thrust upon him in consequence of the employer being allowed to accumulate a surplus of labor. If the employing class had not attracted into the trade an excessive number of workmen which would make it convenient for him in his flush times, there would not be this necessity.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, are we to understand that if a brick mason, for example, who can lay without physical disadvantage 3,000 brick a day slows up and lays only 2,000 brick a day, that while he has gained some advantage, he has made work enough for at least a half time for another man, and while to that degree he has helped a fellow craftsman, society has been the loser?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Stated in terms as general as that, I should say without the slightest question, yes. But that is not the way in which the economist would state the matter. He would say that the fact that the workman was able to place 3,000 brick without physical injury, but only wants or makes it his union policy to place 2,000, is not because he is a lazy slouch, for he is perfectly willing to do what he is able to do, but because there have been attracted into the bricklaying industry such a number of bricklayers as can not under existing conditions of employment find work, and he deems it, therefore, necessary to divide up the work with them, just as at the present time in most industries where business is slack you will find often workers perfectly willing to work on half or fractional time rather than to see an outright discharge of some of their fellow workmen. So that the economist says since society has tolerated these conditions, whether through unrestricted immigration or whether through countenancing this accumulation of labor as an employer's policy, since it has countenanced this drifting into bricklaying of a surplus body who can not be employed working at their maximum efficiency, it must seek to extricate itself from that without any brutal transition. It must without modifying its judgment that restriction of output is a socially unsound policy seek to effect a transition which will redeem the situation without maximum hardship.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I must not have made my meaning clear, Professor, from your answer. That is the point I want to make:

If I am a pieceworker, get so much a thousand for laying brick, and I have the capacity of 3,000 brick a day, but I limit it to 2,000 a day in order to afford some employment to you, for example—

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Society loses nothing, because 3,000 brick will be laid and 3,000 brick will be paid for, but I am the loser; I made a sacrifice, a voluntary sacrifice, to aid you. But if I am getting a flat wage, and the normal day's work will be 3,000 brick, and I lay only 2,000, first to ease my own job, and second to afford you an opportunity of getting a job, then there is a loss, because in that event society pays for laying 3,000 bricks and only gets 2,000 laid.

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes; but society has lost in the first case, also, has it not, because I am laying brick that you ought to have laid; that you could have laid. What was the need of employing me to lay that extra thousand of brick? Society has lost that. I might be out sawing wood.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But has not society paid a double price?

Prof. HOLLANDER. It has lost that much sawed wood.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But in the other case it loses in productive energy as well as in price, because there is an additional cost paid out; that is, I do two thousand when I get paid for three, and you get paid for that extra thousand besides. There is a double cost, a double burden.

Prof. HOLLANDER. I could not quite admit that, because all that society is concerned with is the output of productive energy. If the efficiency is 3,000 brick and you lay 2,000, society has lost the equivalent of 1,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; but is not society very materially concerned in the cost of that production? Isn't it in the cost that society is interested that the cost shall be reduced to the smallest, the smallest amount?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Certainly; provided that cheapened cost is not at the expense—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Of the workers?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Of the worker, exactly. It is the old confusion between weal and wealth, and the object of society is maximum weal and not maximum wealth. It is going back to the philosophy of Carlisle to say that political economy is a study of wealth. It is nothing of the kind. It is philosophy of weal, of well-being, not of things.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And so—

Prof. HOLLANDER (interrupting). So society does not deserve that its energies be augmented if it be at the expense of its well-being. Goods are only means to the end. As a German economist said, man is the beginning and the end of economic endeavor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it, then, that your conclusion substantially is this: That society is interested on the one hand in the fact that I, as a worker, for example, shall earn a decent living wage, and, secondly, it is interested in the fact that, consistent with my earning a decent living wage, society shall get its needs furnished at the lowest possible cost; is not that true?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Those are the two essentials?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes; if you assume, of course, that this not only means amount, but working conditions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Those are the two objectives?

Prof. HOLLANDER. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, if, without reducing the cost, I reduce my output, is not society injured?

Prof. HOLLANDER. If you reduce output and in the process of reduction have saved a degree of suffering which otherwise would have occurred, society is not injured. There is no question as to the social disadvantage of a deliberate restriction of output considered as an absolute proposition. What I do say is this: That restriction is too often dismissed as the ultimate word on the subject and that we lose sight of the fact that trades-unions are not soldiering in the matter, but that they are animated by a very high degree of fraternity; that they are often willing to adopt the same principle in piecework instead of time-work, and that the endeavor of society should be to bring back industry from that unwholesome mess into which it has slumped by correcting this disproportionate allotment of workers to particular fields in excess of the requirements in those fields. We must, without deviating one iota from the proposition which you have stated, that it is socially unsound that workmen should do less than they properly could—we must seek to bring about conditions where they will do what they can without involving displacement and unemployment on the part of their fellow workmen. Of course, there may be cases here and there to the contrary, but I do not believe that this policy of the stint, so-called, of the make-work, is animated by anything more than that intense unwillingness of a workman to see his fellow without even a half loaf.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Professor.

Mr. Belmont.

TESTIMONY OF MR. AUGUST BELMONT.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. BELMONT. New York.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. BELMONT. Banker.

Chairman WALSH. With what company—with what banking concerns are you connected?

Mr. BELMONT. August Belmont & Co.

Chairman WALSH. In what corporations are you a director?

Mr. BELMONT. In the Louisville & Nashville Railroad, the Interborough Rapid Transit Co., and in several banks—the National Park Bank and the Phoenix-Chatlam Bank.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in the Interborough-Metropolitan Co. also?

Mr. BELMONT. Also.

Chairman WALSH. The Long Island Electric Railroad?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The Long Island Railroad Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The New York-Long Island Dry Dock Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The New York & Queens County Railway Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The New York City Railways Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The Rapid Transit Subway Construction Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The Cape Cod Construction Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is the Cape Cod Construction Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. It is the company that has the contract with the canal company—the Cape Cod Canal Co.—for the construction of the canal.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately how many employees has that company?

Mr. BELMONT. Oh, at present I could not tell you, but not over 30.

Chairman WALSH. The Rapid Transit Subway Construction Co., is that engaged in active operations at the present time?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes. It has some contracts for construction of new subways.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately how many employees has that, Mr. Belmont?

Mr. BELMONT. Roughly speaking, about a thousand.

Chairman WALSH. In what other corporations do you own or control any considerable amount of stock aside from being a director?

Mr. BELMONT. Oh, I don't know; I can not give you any list of them. I have various railroad stocks.

Chairman WALSH. You own other properties in the nature of shares of stock in corporations other than those which I have read to you?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Could you state in what large industrial enterprises you own any considerable number of shares?

Mr. BELMONT. In none, practically.

Chairman WALSH. In none. Are you interested in mines in the way of holding shares of stock?

Mr. BELMONT. Very little; negligibly so.

Chairman WALSH. That applies to both metalliferous and bituminous mines?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. In any particular branch of manufacture are you interested as stockholder to any considerable extent?

Mr. BELMONT. No.

Chairman WALSH. You would say, then, that your business activities and stock ownership is largely included in those which we have already mentioned?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes—in transportation.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what connection have you with the Cape Cod Construction Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. I am its president.

Chairman WALSH. The Interborough-Metropolitan Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. I am chairman of the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. And the Interborough Rapid Transit Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Also.

Chairman WALSH. Chairman of the board of directors?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And the Long Island Electric Railroad Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Director.

Chairman WALSH. And the Long Island Railroad Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Director.

Chairman WALSH. And the Louisville & Nashville Railroad Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. Director.

Chairman WALSH. Do you hold any position—I mean executive position, such as president or vice president—in any of the other companies I have mentioned or that you have mentioned?

Mr. BELMONT. No.

Chairman WALSH. Rapid Transit Subway Construction Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. I am chairman of the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. And what is the Wright Co; you say you are no longer connected with that?

Mr. BELMONT. It was for the construction of aeroplanes—the Wright aeroplane.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you, as a director, possess concerning the labor conditions in the corporations in which you are interested, Mr. Belmont? It may be I had better ask you more specifically.

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Unless you care to make a statement.

Mr. BELMONT. I can make this statement, that for some years past I have not taken any very specific and active interest, although I did at the time I was executive officer of the Interborough. I was president of it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive reports from any of the corporations which give you information concerning labor conditions—written reports?

Mr. BELMONT. No; I know of no reports that relate specifically to that particular feature of the management.

Chairman WALSH. As a director or executive officer in any of the corporations I have mentioned—I do not want to go into them specifically—

Mr. BELMONT (interrupting). Well, to say no would be to admit ignorance on the subject. That is not the fact. A director rarely has to do with labor matters in a corporation unless by chance they are brought to his attention for the purpose of a decision as to the merits of something that may bring about a strike or something as serious as that. The reason is that the executive management has built up from time to time, if it is a unionized company, or founded a certain method of dealing with its labor, which has become an entirety and is generally understood; such minor changes as may occur are understood as being part of the routine of management and are not brought to the attention of the directors any more than matters of transportation. They do not direct in the smaller questions of transportation.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any plan or scheme in any of the corporations of which you are a director or executive officer by which the plants and lines of the corporations are inspected and personal inquiries and observations made regarding the labor conditions in them?

Mr. BELMONT. I know of no specific officer, but presume the management has them. I could not answer that question, either yes or no.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, to what extent are the directors of corporations responsible for the labor conditions existing therein?

Mr. BELMONT. That question is altogether too large to answer. I can not answer for directors in general.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what responsibility do you feel for them, Mr. Belmont, in the corporations in which you are interested?

Mr. BELMONT. I feel that the responsibility is imposed upon me to know in general the conditions that exist and to satisfy myself that these conditions are in the main in accordance with my opinions and feelings about the subject.

Chairman WALSH. Before the condition gets to a point, or the dissatisfaction, we might say, gets to a point that results in a strike or a lockout, is there some system, some definite system, by which ascertainment is made of those conditions from time to time, so that the directors themselves and the executive officers may have a voice, if necessary, in averting trouble?

Mr. BELMONT. Do you ask this as to corporations in general?

Chairman WALSH. As to the corporations in which you are interested; you may reply to that.

Mr. BELMONT. Oh, in corporations in which I am interested. It is the duty of the executive officers of the corporations in which I am interested to report to the board anything that is of serious moment in the corporation; and in the event of a possible strike, so far as I have recalled—because nothing of that kind has occurred recently—the conditions, the possibilities, and the questions at issue would be brought to the attention of the board. But, as a rule, the executive officers who are held responsible for the good conduct of the affairs of the company are followed in their recommendations and in what they find it expedient and proper to do.

Chairman WALSH. In the case, particularly, of the Interborough Rapid Transit Co., what is the method used to ascertain accurately whether or not employees are satisfied with their conditions?

Mr. BELMONT. The general manager has a standing rule and custom—that is, as I have it from his own lips—that every employee has the right to come to him personally or to any of the representatives of the corporation who happen to preside over his special department and lay any complaint before him which he may have to make on any subject as to his hours or wages. Each individual, without reference to what his position may be, has access either to him, the general manager, or to his subordinates. If not satisfied with his subordinates, then to him individually.

Chairman WALSH. Has any group of employees the same privilege—that is, of selecting their own spokesman or representative and making complaint as a group?

Mr. BELMONT. Not in the Interborough, as I understand; no.

Chairman WALSH. What are the working hours of the following classes of employees: First, motormen?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not give you that.

Chairman WALSH. Conductors?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not give you those from memory.

Chairman WALSH. Guards?

Mr. BELMONT. I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the motormen, conductors, and guards have a regular working day of 10 hours and ticket sellers, gatemen, and porters have 12 hours?

Mr. BELMONT. I could not give you those from memory. I should have to obtain those from the office. I could not state except approximately, and I would not want to do that.

Chairman WALSH. What increases of wages have been made during the past 10 years on the Interborough?

Mr. BELMONT. I could not give you any such details without preparation.

Chairman WALSH. From whom could those be obtained, Mr. Belmont, best?

Mr. BELMONT. They could be obtained from the president.

Chairman WALSH. What is the attitude of the Interborough Co. toward welfare work, and what systems, if any, of welfare work have been established on the road?

Mr. BELMONT. In that I could not give you much detail excepting that there have been, I think, four—there are four clubrooms furnished with periodicals, and so forth. They were originally a personal gift of mine, which the corporation supplemented with what was necessary to make them properly available. Those are accessible to the men. And then, in addition to that, there is a regular system of furnishing supplies by the corporation—I could not give you the details of that organization, but they are very easily obtainable. The corporation purchases supplies and distributes them at cost—or rather sells them at cost to its employees. These are two of the features of what is done. Whatever the company can do for the individual men and their comfort it does, as each suggestion comes along—whatever presents itself. The men have those two facilities for comfort and for saving, through which they save as much out of their wages as possible. There are other features of personal comfort and entertainment while the men are not at work.

Chairman WALSH. Where are these four clubrooms located?

Mr. BELMONT. Along the line.

Chairman WALSH. Could you state the points?

Mr. BELMONT. No. I can not state the streets where they are.

Chairman WALSH. Was the fee simple title of the property given to the men?

Mr. BELMONT. Oh, no; there is nothing of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. The buildings are furnished?

Mr. BELMONT. Everything belongs to the corporation.

Chairman WALSH. The real estate and the equipment?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; everything. There exists no direct gift of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Does the company have what is called a benefit association?

Mr. BELMONT. It has.

Chairman WALSH. Is it operated by the company, or by a separate corporation?

Mr. BELMONT. I believe the men are represented in the management of a separate corporation, but it was incorporated and organized practically by the company.

Chairman WALSH. Is the membership of the employees compulsory in the benefit association?

Mr. BELMONT. No; it is not.

Chairman WALSH. Is it operated by a board of directors or board of managers?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not give you the details of the operation, but the mere existence of it. I can ascertain for you exactly about that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know generally whether or not the men—the employees—have any voice in the management of the benefit association?

Mr. BELMONT. I believe they have.

Chairman WALSH. They have some representation upon the board of management?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; so I understand.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what the benefits are of the association?

Mr. BELMONT. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. What is payable in case of death?

Mr. BELMONT. No; I do not know the details.

Chairman WALSH. Does it cover sickness, do you know?

Mr. BELMONT. No.

Chairman WALSH. It does not cover sickness?

Mr. BELMONT. Oh—I say, I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not policies are issued in it?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not tell you exactly how it is developed. I have not given it attention for some time.

Chairman WALSH. Or whether or not if an employee resigns or is discharged his policy has any surrender value?

Mr. BELMONT. Well, I think not. I think not, as I recall it. I do not know whether it has been amended in that respect or not.

Chairman WALSH. In the case of the Interborough Rapid Transit Co., what is the policy of the company as regards the right of employees to join labor unions or the recognition of labor unions among your employees?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not answer that, put in that way. I should have to give you the history which led to it, because it was developed during my direct connection with the executive management of the property.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I wish you would, please.

Mr. BELMONT. I could not relate the history for the reason that it would take too much time; but at the time of the strike I was president of the organization and thoroughly familiar with what took place at that time. The policy of the company at that time was to recognize its labor as unionized, and I believed, and so did my associates, in having what is called a trade agreement with the men. We had regular agreements, and I still believe in that method, where it is practicable. But the outcome was this: We had two separate corporations, the elevated system and the subway, and the agreements with these two separate sets of men were not exactly the same. We made the agreements with each of them, but they made in addition to this a secret agreement between themselves which provided that, in the event of any trouble with the corporation, the one organization would support the other. That, in itself, constituted a violation of their respective agreements. They were told that the questions at issue, which involved matters of hours of labor, as well as questions down the whole line of their relations with the corporation—they were told that none of these questions which we usually were in the habit of discussing and would otherwise then have discussed with them could be taken up until they had canceled their secret agreement; and when they had done that then the corporation would take up the alleged differences with them. This they refused to do. The national organization of which they were members decided that our position in this respect was perfectly correct; that the men had constructively broken their agreements with us, and until they restored the conditions preceding the signing of their joint agreement our attitude would be sustained. But they were unwilling to follow, as they should have under the rules of their organization, the dictates of their national board.

Chairman WALSH. What was the name of their national organization, please?

Mr. BELMONT. Let us see; street railway employees, I think it is.

Chairman WALSH. Amalgamated Association—

Mr. BELMONT (interrupting). Yes; the Amalgamated Association.

Chairman WALSH. Amalgamated Association of Street Railway Employees?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes. They refused to obey and were in consequence, I believe, either expelled, or at all events they lost their membership in the national organization. The management after that felt that inasmuch as it was obliged to give continuous and uninterrupted service under its contract with the city, it could not recognize a union of its men until some method could be found to enforce, or, at all events, as long as there was no method by which agreements could be enforced—and they could not at that time be. Inasmuch as we employed some 20,000 men, the number was so great that they could afford to disregard anybody's dictation whose views happened to be in conflict with their own interests. We felt that it was better and was indispensable for the proper conduct of transportation here not to have unionized labor, which might at any time bring the transportation of the city to a standstill to the discomfort and loss of the public.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are the policies of the company toward labor organizations and unionization matters of discussion in the meetings of your board of directors?

Mr. BELMONT. I do not recall any for a long time, because the board has felt the management's method to be acceptable, and a condition existed where no change seemed either desired or expected, principally, I imagine, because it was and is not expected. So that only questions of welfare have arisen; for example, like the one which Mr. Shonts inaugurated of purchasing supplies and selling them at cost. This was willingly authorized by the board of directors when brought to their attention, I think, two years ago—not long ago.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that in the spring of 1912 several hundred employees, chiefly motormen, were discharged by the company?

Mr. BELMONT. I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that in 1912 the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers made an attempt to organize the men on the Interborough?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes. I did not know very much about it, but I understood—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is it true that this attempt on the part of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers to organize the men caused the discharge of several hundred employees at or about the same time?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. You have no personal information—

Mr. BELMONT (interrupting). I have no personal information as to that, but this was the principle underlying the subject: At the time that the subway was put in operation the elevated was still being operated by steam, and the engineers who operated those engines became, in as far as they could be trained—those that desired to, became motormen. We have never admitted that because of that the Brotherhood of Engineers had any real claim upon the men as an organization, although they might have continued their membership for all we knew or cared, for that matter; but that was in our opinion a totally different branch of labor, and naturally such an attitude was both undesirable and unjustifiable in our estimation.

Chairman WALSH. What information do the officers of your companies receive in regard to the activity of employees in the organization or attempted organization?

Mr. BELMONT. Oh, I can not tell you as to that. Those are matters entirely known to the general manager, and unless, as I say, something vital occurred—and nothing recently of that sort that I can recall has occurred nor been brought to the attention of the board for some time. It can not, anyway, have been on a large scale, because otherwise it would have been.

Chairman WALSH. Does the company maintain a special department whose duty it is to collect information with reference to the activities of employees along the line of bettering their condition, or anything of that sort?

Mr. BELMONT. I don't know as to that. I presume they have. I know they have employees—employ men who keep the management informed as to all conditions of any kind on the line. I don't know whether that information is part of their duty.

Chairman WALSH. Does any arrangement exist between the Interborough and any detective agency to secure such information?

Mr. BELMONT. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Does the Interborough Rapid Transit Co. interchange information with reference to the acts of their employees and their activity, and the like of that?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. How many women are employed by the Interborough Rapid Transit Co.?

Mr. BELMONT. I can not tell you that, Mr. Walsh. Those are questions concerning the technical management, and it is not my province as chairman of the board to follow those matters.

Chairman WALSH. Nor the hours that they work?

Mr. BELMONT. No.

Chairman WALSH. Nor the wages that they receive?

Mr. BELMONT. Not unless the management saw fit to bring something concerning the wages before the board for its action.

Chairman WALSH. And you have never made any inquiry along those particular lines?

Mr. BELMONT. Not in recent years; not since I ceased to be an executive in the management. As chairman of the board that is not part of my duty.

Commissioner WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you some questions, please.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From the recital of the facts in relation to the strike on your road, I understood that your company had recognized the union and had dealt with the union and had entered into an agreement with the union?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That the union had deliberately broken their agreement?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that that was realized and appreciated by the national union officers?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that the national union officers ordered the men back, but the men refused to go—

Mr. BELMONT (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). And they therefore lost their charter?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And were practically thrown out of their union?

Mr. BELMONT. Those were the circumstances.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That as the result of that experience your company found that it was unwise and unsafe to longer recognize or deal with the union because they had proven contract breakers?

Mr. BELMONT. In that particular instance, yes. I do not want to answer that question as applying to all unions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; we understand that. We are dealing just with this specific case.

Mr. BELMONT. Just that one.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In this specific case the union had proven itself a contract breaker?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And therefore the whole responsibility for the fact that your company does not now recognize or deal with the unions rests upon the shoulders of the men who at that time broke their contract?

Mr. BELMONT. That is it exactly; yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And at one time, Mr. Belmont, you were the president of the civic federation?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The National Civic Federation?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you tell this commission what does the civic federation preach to employers in this matter of dealing with unions? Does it encourage the recognition of unions?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes—it has. Of course, it does not undertake to refuse to recognize, or the recognition of any condition that exists among its members, because its members are composed of all classes and of all interests in society, as you understand, from an economic sense; and therefore it recognizes, for example, union labor, the question of contracts, and so forth, by the mere fact of having their representatives as members of the organization. But, as you probably know, there are three defined groups represented on what is called the executive council, that is, employers, labor, and the public from any walk of economic life. Unless these three groups agree upon any one particular question, the council does not commit itself to the advocacy or condemnation of that question—not unless the agreement is unanimous. For example, I can illustrate it by an instance in this State.

The civic federation has promoted from the very outset the dissemination of information on the question of compensation for workmen, and laws for preventing accidents. But when a measure in that line is introduced in a legislature, and while it may have had a great deal to do with the formation of opinion which led to that measure and exercised its influence in every way so that a measure should be introduced, on such questions in the case where it could not agree on them in conference with the representatives of the federation of labor, it took no part whatsoever in promoting the passage of such a measure. I mean to say by that, it would feel itself unjustified in going before a committee hearing to advocate any particular feature of a law or to advise the measure as a whole unless absolute agreement of opinion had existed. And inasmuch as it did not agree unanimously at the time the compensation law was being passed in this State, officially the federation did not appear at all. So, too, that would be its attitude on any amendments. But it opens—it not only opens its meetings to general discussion, but on any question which involves the interest of labor and capital, it takes steps to bring them together and to promote discussion and produce out of those discussions as much progress on those questions as it can, always remaining absolutely impartial and neutral unless, as I say, there is unanimous agreement; in that event it stands as positive or negative in its attitude as the case may be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You know, of course, Mr. Belmont, that one of the great issues in the industrial world in this country, if not elsewhere, has been the question of the open and closed shop; that that perhaps had led to more industrial strife and industrial disputes than perhaps any other one thing. Now there are very wide differences of opinion among employers and among workers on the question of the open and the closed shop. That is one of the things that this commission is laboring with—to determine what the wise thing to recommend on the open or closed shop may be; and I am sure the commission would appreciate it if you care to express any opinion about the matter.

Mr. BELMONT. That is so very broad a subject that I am rather—I feel rather disinclined to speak, because my opinion would be wholly personal and not official and would have to be so considered.

There are industries in which, from my observation, the closed shop and spirit and the conduct of that industry with union labor alone has proved very advantageous and seemed to be satisfactory to both employers and employees. There are others where it has not, and questions of personal liberty then arise, which, as a citizen, make me feel hostile to the enforcement of the closed shop. But each instance has to be judged by itself. There are other industries or corporations such as the one I have spoken of, with obligations to the public, which as producers are so closely connected with their welfare that they are practically public servants, and then the question of policy may overshadow what would seem, in theory, to be the right and the privilege of workmen to organize on the closed-shop basis, and yet in the interest of the public they should be denied that privilege. Now, as a rule, I have been in favor personally of union labor. I think that where conditions exist so that absolute confidence exists—I think the steam railroads, for example—all those I have been connected with find it of great advantage. Where they understand themselves thoroughly they operate under specific and agreed rules; for instance, the very brotherhood that we did not feel it advisable to have interfere with our affairs in the subway and on the elevated is a model as a labor organization. It commands not only the respect and admiration but also the best sort of feeling on the part of the railroads. Mr. Stone is a personal friend of mine, and I have every respect for that union. I think a fast agreement is not only possible but very desirable, in the case of that union. Sometimes when it comes to looking at it purely from an economic standpoint, then there is much to be said on both sides. That is too large a question for me to elaborate unless I had time, so that I do not like to put myself on record as expressing a simple opinion for or against in that respect. Each individual case has to stand on its merits so far as my own opinion and experience has shown in the matter. There are some unions whose word is as good as their bond, their organization and their discipline is perfect, and they are able to enforce what they call their laws or regulations; and others where they are unable to do so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You, of course, are familiar with the argument presented by the advocates of the closed shop, that the only hope of perpetuating unionism is through the closed shop. You know, of course, that argument is presented despite the fact that in the railroad unions, as you have pointed out, which are very powerful and very strong and very reliable and where the relationship between the employers and the unions, as a rule, is cordial and friendly, despite the fact that in those unions, so far as I know, the right of what might be called the open shop to any railroad company is such that it is at liberty to employ anybody that it pleases, and it rests with the union to persuade the new employee to enter the union; is that not so?

Mr. BELMONT. You have hit the nail upon the head; it rests with the unions. Now, a union that conducts its affairs so that it treats its employees along that broad line gets the best results. The men naturally are satisfied. It depends upon the character of what they give their men, as to whether they draw men to them or not. If they do not, and a large element does not join, and seeks protection against them, I think common sense is enough to show that there must be something wrong, otherwise they would be able to attract all to their organization.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do not the railways of the country afford an object lesson—an instance where you have collective bargaining—strong unionism going hand in hand with the open shop?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; the open shop is really the right principle; and if, for the best interests of the employees, the union has become the only means through which they deal with their employers, and is the element through which the men have their relations prescribed, why they will join. The proof of the pudding is the eating. The unions will be joined by the men, and if they are not there is a reason for it which can be ascertained. Each case has to be treated by itself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What, in your opinion, Mr. Belmont, is the best way to minimize strikes and lockouts?

Mr. BELMONT. What I have said. Each case has to be treated by itself. I could not give a cure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there not certain underlying principles of law applied substantially to strikes and lockouts?

Mr. BELMONT. You mean as to arbitration or otherwise?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. BELMONT. Sometimes quiet conferences brought about by mutual friends have been very effective. That is the function of the civic federation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In the nature of mediation?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; in the nature of mediation. When it comes to arbitration, why, often in cases where it was provided for in a contract on corporate matters or business matters of any kind I have known of many instances where arbitration was not resorted to, but there was mediation and adjustment without it. And so as to differences that lead to strikes; these are sometimes better adjusted without resort to arbitration; and therefore a compulsory method might not always work satisfactorily.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I presume, Mr. Belmont, you are familiar with the Canadian act?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is known as the "Public inquiry act"?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where it is illegal to strike or lockout—it is illegal to cause a cessation of work until the State has had an opportunity to mediate and investigate—connected with public utilities only, of course?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is your idea of that law?

Mr. BELMONT. It has very good features. My relations were so close with our representatives of labor when I was president of the civic federation—because I was elected at their request and at their instance—that I was called to a council and asked to explain my attitude in connection with the strike situation. I felt and told them that until the Government insisted that when an employee entered the service of either a public-service corporation or a public servant, in the sense of a producer of necessities—until his entrance as an employee became a contract per se without signature, but by reason of the mere fact that he became employed, and until that relationship was treated as a contract—until that was done it would be difficult to persuade employers to trust themselves wholly to the vote of their employees.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, Mr. Belmont, if you had the Canadian law in operation in this country you would then not hesitate to deal with organized labor, because you would know that they could not go on a strike until there had been an opportunity for investigation and inquiry—that they could not apply a sudden strike to you?

Mr. BELMONT. I can answer to that, in theory, yes; but as we have 48 States, all with their different laws, no national law could well be passed to compel that method, excepting with certain corporations—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Interstate?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, sir; interstate corporations. It does not seem to be a perfectly practical method here, although indicating in its theory to be a good one.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, while it is quite true that if any one State, like New York, for example, should enact a public-inquiry act, while for the time being it would only deal with that particular problem, yet is it not possible, in connection with the workmen's compensation act, which was initiated in one State—I think, Wisconsin—and has now spread over 25 States and is likely to spread over the entire country—if such an act was amended in some State and administered, that afterwards all her sister States would profit by the experience, and it would become a common condition?

Mr. BELMONT. That has been the history of every legislation beginning in one State. If it proved successful, it has been adopted by others. There are some instances in which practical uniformity exists to-day that did not exist in the beginning at all. And in the question of these compensation laws—they are being tried out in the various States, and they will probably reach uniformity after the lapse of time—after they have been well tried out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Admitting that a public-inquiry act would be a disadvantage along certain lines of employers, in that they could not declare a lockout legally until there had been a public inquiry, and granting, further, that it would be a disadvantage to organized labor because it could not declare a sudden strike—it could not cease work until there had been an investigation and inquiry; yet in the end would not it be a decided advantage to the employer and the workers, especially in the case of public-utility corporations? Would the result not be along a better degree of industrial peace?

Mr. BELMONT. You put the two together, and I do not see how those two questions operate so closely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Which?

Mr. BELMONT. The compensation and the inquiry acts.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. When I use the word "compensation," Mr. Belmont, I do not mean workmen's compensation. I mean that while the cost, so to speak, on the part of the employers would be that they could not lock out their men, the cost to the union would be that it would have to waive the sudden strike and would the result not be a higher degree of industrial peace?

Mr. BELMONT. To say yes or no to that—it covers so many industries with which I have no familiarity at all—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). Deal with it in your own industries.

Mr. BELMONT. In the question of transportation I think it would.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think it would be advantageous?

Mr. BELMONT. Any protection that the public may receive from an act of that kind safeguards it against great discomfort and interruption of its means of livelihood, because transportation, particularly, if interrupted for any length of time, would result in discomfort to a very large portion of the population—I presume in this city more than any other. This city lives on what is brought to it, you might say almost from day to day. It could not stand a stoppage of this transportation and anything that tends to protect it against the possibility of it and brought about a discussion on the subject at issue before the step leading to a tie-up could be taken, would be good.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, if an effort was made to pass a public inquiry act in the State of New York, for example, then you, having large interests in transportation, would not look upon such an act with disfavor?

Mr. BELMONT. I will not put myself on record officially as saying that, because what I am saying is from my personal opinions, and I do not wish to speak as representing those interests.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I do not ask you the question in that spirit; I want just your individual opinion.

Mr. BELMONT. An answer, as you first put the question, would involve practically my saying that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I just want your individual opinion.

Mr. BELMONT. My individual opinion, with reservations as to how that act should be drawn, because it could not be exactly the same as the Canadian act, as our conditions are different, would be yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You spoke about the Interborough Co.'s having a system whereby its employees were furnished with their supplies at cost. Did I understand that correctly?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; there is a regular department that purchases those things and they are able to buy the necessaries of life at cost.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There is a certain cost for administration in that department, is there not, buying and selling, accounting, etc.?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Upon whom does that burden fall? Is that added to the price of the articles?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, if it costs 10 per cent to distribute you add 10 per cent to the article and the purchaser gets the article at the actual cost plus the actual cost of distribution?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; but the word "distribution" should not be used, because it is not delivered; we have no method of delivery.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Call it operating expense.

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; but for example, when you said no cost to the company, indirectly yes, in this way: When that department was established in order that the necessaries of life could be bought a little cheaper by the employee, the wife of the employee was given a pass so that when she travels to buy at the company's stores she travels without cost; that is for the married man or men when a female member of the family attends to the housekeeping.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If an article costs $1, and it costs 10 cents to handle the article, the employee then pays $1.10 for that article?

Mr. BELMONT. That is illustrative, but the details of it I could not give you. Those can be easily ascertained.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The employee then saves what otherwise would be the middleman's profit?

Mr. BELMONT. Precisely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How has the plan worked out, Mr. Belmont?

Mr. BELMONT. Strange to say, all have not availed themselves of it, but in the main they have.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you tell offhand what volume of business that department has done?

Mr. BELMONT. No, sir; I could not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have how many employees who are at liberty to buy from those stores?

Mr. BELMONT. All of them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That represents how large a number, approximately?

Mr. BELMONT. I think we have 18,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. About 18,000?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes, and perhaps a little more; we have more than that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If a company pursued that policy, would it not antagonize the small tradesmen or middlemen?

Mr. BELMONT. That I could not say; I doubt very much if that matter has been considered at all. Our corporation considers the welfare of its men and does not look outside of that.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman would like to ask a question.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Belmont, you spoke about the benefits to be derived in the event of a disagreement by the parties being brought together; what do you think of a permanent industrial council like the one in England, which provides for an arbitrator in labor disputes, not compulsory arbitration?

Mr. BELMONT. The difficulty here in making a comparison is that such things in England are done by Parliament and for the whole people, and there is no other law that can intervene and in any way embarrass any method that is adopted there; but we have 48 States with their respective legislatures, and it has never appeared to me that a central body of the kind you refer to could be given sufficient power, particularly enough to be effective. There are means constantly found to increase the powers of any Federal board or commission for one reason or another, on the plea of interstate interests, but on that one subject I should not think you could very well parallel our case with the conditions there.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Belmont, in regard to that industrial council, it is, of course, understood under our present status that it could only deal with interstate questions as applied to your line—would you consider it a desirable agency?

Mr. BELMONT. The council?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes; the existence of such a body. I am not localizing it or detailing it. Merely the existence of a body which could be utilized for those purposes, however it might perform?

Mr. BELMONT. Well, it distresses me to say, but the spirit in which those councils and that kind of bodies act abroad—in England—is quite different, I am afraid, from what would actuate them here. Practically there are no politics in what they do of that sort there, but there is always politics in what is done in that way here.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe that politics has ever entered into the application of either the Erdman or the Newlands Act in any degree? I assume you are familiar with both—reasonably so?

Mr. BELMONT. Well, I can not say from my own—I can not assert it. It has had the appearance, sometimes, yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, are you reasonably familiar with the compulsory inquiry act in Canada as to its workings?

Mr. BELMONT. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you aware or not of the fact, then, that it is almost absolutely disregarded?

Mr. BELMONT. That it is what?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Largely disregarded by everybody.

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; that is true.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, in your opinion, would it be open to the same objection here?

Mr. BELMONT. Because it would be disregarded? Well, one of the difficulties would be that nothing of that kind could be made compulsory here.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Could not build jails to hold the violators?

Mr. BELMONT. Could not do what?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Could not build jails enough to hold the violators of it, in other words?

Mr. BELMONT. Well, I think—I am not one of those who believe that it is necessary to have jail sentences to induce men in charge of either our public affairs of our corporations to make them perform their duties; public condemnation is sufficient.

Chairman WALSH. We must have perfect order, ladies and gentlemen.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the laboring men that disregard it? Don't you think there would be as many of them as managers?

Mr. BELMONT. It would apply to them likewise. I do not wish to be understood that any distinction should be made in our law for any one individual, no matter in what walk of life.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I apply the jail proposition to the laborer and not to his employer, largely.

Mr. BELMONT. How is that?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I apply the jail necessity as the lawbreaker, to the worker, largely; that is, in greater numbers than his employer?

Mr. BELMONT. I do not know what your question is. You stated an opinion.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Going back to the necessity for a jail for violators—if 20,000 laboring men disregard the law it would take a large number of jails to hold them. Do you believe laws should be enacted that make lawbreakers—encourages them?

Mr. BELMONT. Every breach of the law does not involve a jail sentence, you know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It does not? It involves the contempt of the law.

Mr. BELMONT. Well, the law can treat it with whatever punishment might seem adequate.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Therefore, do you favor the enactment of the law unless it can be applied?

Mr. BELMONT. No one does, if it can not be effectively applied.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In these clubs that are furnished along the line of your railroad here, Mr. Belmont, was the original purpose of these clubs largely to have the men available when needed on frequent shifts?

Mr. BELMONT. I do not understand the question. It was for the men when they were at leisure.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Certainly. So that if the company needed them they would be readily available?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; they are near by.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is the original purpose, underlying the institution of such clubs as a rule?

Mr. BELMONT. They had no shelter; they had no occupation while they were waiting, and those comforts were supplied to them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. When you had this disagreement on your lines with one of the model organizations, was that not the real disagreement between the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers—and I use the word "you" in the sense of your company—did it not actually arise over the fact that if you classed them as motormen you paid only $2.75 up to $2.87 a day, while if you dealt with the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers it would cost you $3.75 to $4.50?

Mr. BELMONT. Well, I would not go into the details of it because I was not in direct touch with what took place, but—

Commissioner GARRETSON. It was a difference in cost?

Mr. BELMONT. But it also involved a principle; yes. I think anybody will admit that an engineer who received a certain wage, when he became a motorman, and instead of the average wage for that particular employment, he demanded the same as what he had formerly been receiving, he was not justified in asking more than the motormen were getting.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, then, it was really a question of cost?

Mr. BELMONT. When they became motormen, they were motormen, they were no longer engineers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the principle was you did not want to pay motormen the steam-engineer price?

Mr. BELMONT. I presume so. I think it was; I am certain it was.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If I understood you—it is a little difficult to hear down here—you answered in regard to unionism on lines like the public utility lines, that it had been undesirable to unionize them, or to allow the union to dominate the property, and still on the railways, the steam railways, good results came from it?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; because the conditions are wholly different. Our experience has proved in this one case to be advantageous and in the other case it proved the reverse. And in the light of experience one is condemned and the other approved.

Commissioner GARRETSON. A traction property, a public utility, carries the persons of its patrons, and if it stops business there are only two results that follow directly from that—one is discomfort to the public and the other is the disarrangement of the public business in which they are engaged by their absence—and if the steam business stops it stops the movement of the person, the movement of his supplies, food, and fuel, cuts off wholly all methods of supply for that locality or community that depends upon it, and stops the commerce of the section which depends upon it. Why is unionism a less evil on a property of that kind than on a local traction?

Mr. BELMONT. I did not say that. I am not talking about—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). If unionized?

Mr. BELMONT. I was not talking about that. Putting that question you assume that I have called it an evil.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I think you used the word that it was not possible or desirable on a public utility.

Mr. BELMONT. You ask me which of the two is the greater evil practically.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. BELMONT. I have not called either of them evils. I have said in principle that I approve, but in practice and by reason of our experience here in this particular instance in New York I do not—I am not speaking for any other section or any other city, but in New York, and particularly New York because of its peculiar formation, its north and south lines, the distance that people have to travel to their daily destinations, the vital importance of their transportation there, that in this particular instance the risk could not be run. We do not want even to be considered as saying that it might not prove perfectly successful if tried again, but we can not run the risk. We are under contract to keep that transportation going 24 hours out of every 24 for a matter of 50 years, and therefore anything that would tend to endanger the interruption of that traffic would be—either physical or resulting from its labor—any danger of that kind must be avoided, and unionism there seems to threaten that danger, and we are certain it does from our past experience.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is there any obligation, charter, or otherwise, that you are under that these steam railroads are subject to where you believe good results have been produced under unionism?

Mr. BELMONT. How?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are they not subject to the same charter requirements as to continuous operation that you are?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; but the results—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). And in far greater degree, more far-reaching?

Mr. BELMONT. No; I do not think so. I do not think a far greater degree at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Food supplies in addition to personal transportation is no greater?

Mr. BELMONT. Yes; but in the experience the strikes have not been general; we have not had any very general strikes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is railway?

Mr. BELMONT. But most of them have been local. Certain sections of the country have suffered, but as a rule other means, other methods, other lines of transportation have been kept opened. Strikes have been localized. But here in the city interruptions to its transportation as a rule which would take place would be complete. In the event of a strike on the Interboro it would paralyze the entire city.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would not touch its supplies?

Mr. BELMONT. It would paralyze their movements so as to be a discomfort and a very serious matter.

Commissioner GARRETSON. No question of that. That is a truism. In other words, the difference between steam interruption and local interruption would resolve itself into this: The supplies would be here, and it might be difficult for a certain number of the people to get to the supplies, and in steam interruption the supplies would not be here if, as you say, the city lives from day to day?

Mr. BELMONT. Provided it was complete; yes. We have not had any of those conditions in our particular field, but we have had them here in local transportation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The difference between our particular field and the other is that we never, have not got past the verge, while the other people have passed it. Is that it?

Mr. BELMONT. That seems to be it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You take the application of the acceptance of the conditions as applied to the steam traffic—well, I will let that go. That is all, Mr. Belmont.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Belmont.

At this point we will adjourn until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock in the board of estimate's room.

(At 3.50 in the afternoon of this Wednesday, January 20, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Thursday, January 21, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m. in the board of estimate's room.)

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I am.

Chairman WALSH. Are you the president of any other company?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Of those I have mentioned? I gave you the list of five.

Chairman WALSH. That you are president of?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I ask you please to repeat those because I did not get them.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The smelting company—the American Smelting Securities Co., the Guggenheim Exploration Co., and the Chili Copper Co.

Chairman WALSH. What is the business of the American Smelting & Refining Co.?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Smelting and refining and mining of ores.

Chairman WALSH. How many employees are engaged in that industry?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, I don't know offhand.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I should not care to, because I would rather be accurate.

Chairman WALSH. Could you come offhand within several hundred of it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I might not.

Chairman WALSH. Could you state offhand the general number of employees that you have in the industry at its height, so far as the production is concerned?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; I could not do that offhand.

Chairman WALSH. What is the character of the business of the Guggenheim Exploration Co.?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. They are in the mining business.

Chairman WALSH. In any particular part of the country?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. All over the world.

Chairman WALSH. Could you answer the same questions with reference to that company; that is, as to the number of employees it has?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I would be very pleased to give it to you accurate, if you care to have it.

Chairman WALSH. I want to understand how much knowledge of the labor conditions that you have you carry with you?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. It runs into the thousands. I think that will give you the information that you want.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you have, either as a stockholder or as a director or president of these companies, concerning the labor conditions in the industries?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I am generally posted as to the conditions of labor at our various plants.

Chairman WALSH. How do you receive reports; how do you acquire information from those widely scattered plants?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. If you will allow me, I will outline the general policy so that you will know how the matter stands.

Chairman WALSH. We would be very glad to have you do so.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The laborers are under direct control at each plant of the general manager in charge or the superintendent. In addition, it has been my duty, during the last few years, to visit each plant once or twice a year. I have done that for a great many years. These companies also have executive committees. These executive committees are selected from the directors, and nearly all of the directors are on the executive committee. The various members of the executive committees make trips to the plants in the various parts of the country, so that some members of the executive committee get at the plants every 30, 60, or 90 days, and they are in general touch with the labor conditions and with the laborers at all these plants by conference with the foremen, superintendents, and general managers at the plants. The executive committee meets at least once a week, and the subcommittees, composed of members of the executive committee, meet almost daily.

When the directors return from these inspection trips they make a presentation to the general board, which meets weekly, or the general executive committee as to what the conditions are that obtain there. They discuss everything that has a bearing on the success and business and conditions of the plants, and in that way all the directors—I refer to those being on the executive committee—are continually conversant with the conditions that obtain at the various plants owned by the company.

Our business, as regards directors, is somewhat different from almost all other industrial corporations in this regard: Of the many directors—we have over 20—with the exception of two or three they are all men familiar with the business, having been brought up in the business, and are technical and practical smelting men, and those are the directors that naturally would be familiar with every branch of the manufacturing part of our business. That is why they are directors. The way I have outlined is the method in which all directors connected with the company, with the exceptions I have named, are in thorough sympathy and touch with all of the conditions as to labor and otherwise.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive reports in writing from these corporations which set forth specifically the labor conditions in the industry?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We do not get the information that way. It comes to us orally, but if there is anything that is not satisfactory, the superintendent or manager in charge immediately writes to the home office, which is here in New York, to that committee. For instance, if that charge referred to labor, he would write to them just what the labor conditions were, if there was anything not satisfactory.

Chairman WALSH. Please state what factories, mines—what factories, first, you have personally inspected during the past year in the manner you have detailed.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. During the past year I have not been in especially good health. I have not been making those visits. But previous to that, during the last 10 years, I have visited all of our plants, both in the United States and Mexico, up to two years ago, I think it was.

Chairman WALSH. And how was it during the year 1914, after making these inspections?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, I did not make them, but the other members of the executive committee made those tours.

Chairman WALSH. In 1913?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think it was in 1912 I stopped going to these plants and delegated that work to other members of the committee.

Chairman WALSH. Well, during the year 1912, what factories owned by any of these corporations did you visit?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, we will start in in the East. I have been at the Perth Amboy plant.

Chairman WALSH. How often were you there?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I go there a number of times a year, because they are close to our present location. Once or twice in the year I would go to Omaha, and then to our various plants in Colorado, to El Paso, to California, to Washington, and to Mexico and to Missouri, where we have a number of plants—in the State of Missouri. Those are the ones I have at my fingers' ends at the present.

Chairman WALSH. During the year 1912?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That and all previous years. I think it was during 1912, and then that and all previous years for at least 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. Now, since 1912, would you indicate the persons on your executive committee that did visit the plants, mines, and the factories controlled by your corporations, please.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; Mr. Karl Eilers and Mr. Edgar L. Newhouse; those gentlemen, especially, go out frequently.

Chairman WALSH. Do they go out to the same extent you did prior to 1912?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Oh, yes; they go out even more frequently and more conscientiously. They are younger men and have more time to devote to that special branch of the business.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, to what extent are your directors and stockholders responsible for labor conditions in your plants?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. In our case the directors—not the stockholders, but the directors—are absolutely responsible, with the exception of those two or three gentlemen that are not on the executive committee. They are absolutely responsible for the management of the business and for the conditions of the laborers and everything that pertains to the welfare of the business.

Chairman WALSH. They feel their responsibility and hold themselves—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interposing). Absolutely.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). To the discharge of the duties connected with that responsibility?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Absolutely.

Chairman WALSH. How many directors are there of the American Smelting & Refining Co., Mr. Guggenheim?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I believe about 20.

Chairman WALSH. And how many members of the executive committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Seventeen or eighteen.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state what arrangements, if any, you have put into effect in your industries for the improvement of the labor conditions—for the inspection, first, of labor conditions, and the improvement of anything that seems to be wrong.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, until a year and a half ago conditions—when anything arose that was unsatisfactory, in our judgment, from observation or experience or from requests and visits from our workmen, we endeavored to meet that in every way possible, to put in any necessary improvements that we think would benefit them, and we have made quite a number, the details of which I will be very glad to let you have. I haven't got them at my fingers' ends. But we found up to that time or previous to that time a great many more things should be done than what we were doing; and I have suggested to the board of directors and to the executive committee that I believed that we should go much further than we have gone, in order to improve the conditions and the welfare of our people, from the humanitarian standpoint and from the standpoint of good business. We feel that by improving labor conditions—that is, the housing of them better—and providing pension funds and providing benefits in various directions, we would get better results than we had been getting; that we would get a higher efficiency. And it has appealed not only to me, but I think, with very few exceptions, to our executive committee or to our board of directors, and it was suggested that we try and secure some one who was thoroughly in sympathy with that thought and some one that could advise us, having had more experience than we have had, and who had general information from what was going on in other operations similar or even different from ours, and we decided it was advisable to engage Dr. C. P. Neill, former Commissioner of Labor. He came to us about a year and a half ago, and we appointed a committee and Dr. Neill became one of that committee, and they have been making examinations, investigations, and recommendations as to what should be done; and only recently they recommended that we should take over and put our men under a benefit system improving their conditions in that way. And a number of these things are now being considered by our committee. First, it will be recommended by the committee directly in charge of labor and welfare that will be passed up to the general executive committee or board of directors, and they usually adopt the recommendations of these various executive committees. And I believe Dr. Neill has been called as one of the witnesses, and I would rather he would give you the details of it, because he is more familiar with it than I am; but in a general way we are very much in sympathy in improving the labor conditions that exist at our various plants. We have adopted a number of things already, and hope to continue to make more improvements, the details of which we will be very glad to furnish you, but I prefer that you get those from Dr. Neill, because that has been his direct occupation to recommend and find out what was really necessary and advisable for us to do.

Chairman WALSH. Are the reports of Dr. Neill as to labor conditions and suggested improvements made in writing?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; they have been discussed heretofore orally, and he has been telling the committee what he thought was advisable. Whether or not he has made up or sent in his report in writing. I have not seen it yet; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. With regard to the benefit organization for the employees; has the plan for that been put in writing by Dr. Neill or any person who is connected with your organization?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think not. I think they have decided that only within the last few days. There is one thing we have adopted universally, where it is possible to adopt it, and that is in all States where the compensation laws have been passed—the elective compensation laws—we have elected to adopt those compensation laws, because we think very well of them as a whole.

Chairman WALSH. Did your companies take any part in promoting or opposing compensation laws in any of the States of the Union?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We never opposed them. I would not permit that under any circumstances. I don't know to what extent our local managers may have aided or assisted, but we do not oppose any legislation, and our managers have instructions not to do that. That is not their business. Their business is to run the plants, and legislation is another matter. As a company we never do anything of that kind. We would not permit it.

Chairman WALSH. Is the report or suggestion as to the benefit association in written form, Mr. Guggenheim?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I say I do not know. We were only discussing—I don't know whether the report is made up yet or not. I have only been discussing it with some of our directors.

Chairman WALSH. Well, whose duty would it be to make that report?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Dr. Neill's.

Chairman WALSH. And please state again to just what extent that work has gone—the organization of a beneficial association.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, they have made the investigations and they are going to make the report now.

Chairman WALSH. They are going to report or have made a report?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. They have made it orally; whether or not it has been passed up to the committee or not in writing, I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Would you please state the general form of the scheme?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, the general form is to provide in a general way for the improvement of the laborers.

Chairman WALSH. Does it provide a death benefit?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Sickness benefit?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; and an injury benefit, as I understand it, in the case of injury. We have already adopted, as an experiment, at one of our plants, as I understand it, in the case of injury. We have already adopted as an experiment at one of our plants, Perth Amboy, N. J., a scheme whereby the company insures our workmen in the case of death. This has been done at our expense, and we want to see how that works out. That was done a couple of years ago, if I remember rightly, at the suggestion of one of our directors.

Chairman WALSH. What was the plan?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The plan was to allow them $500 to $1,000, as to whether they were married or unmarried, in case of death; a simple proposition of that kind. And then we have considered the improving of our laborers and the housing, etc., and increasing their sanitary arrangements wherever possible to advantage. Now, the details of all those things there will be no difficulty in getting them up and handing them to you, so that you will have them absolutely accurate. You see, my province in the business is the suggestion, as president of the company, of general policies of business; and it does not fall to me to know all these details. Those are divided up among special committees, and each committee has its work; and there is the so-called labor committee, composed of members of the executive committee, and any information in that direction can be furnished you accurately by the party in charge of it; and I should say that Dr. Neill was the man best qualified to do so, because it is under his direct jurisdiction.

Chairman WALSH. Under the plan adopted two years ago is the money paid directly by your company to the beneficiary?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think it is paid by the insurance company. In fact, I have not the details as to how it was done. It was a simple arrangement made whereby in case of the death of a single man or a married man while in the employ of the company he was given a certain sum of money, from $500 to $1,000, and we paid the insurance company a certain amount for doing that for us. Now, whether the insurance company pays the men the money or our company pays the men the money, I don't know; but I will be glad to furnish you the details of that if it is of interest to you.

Chairman WALSH. It is. Does the employee pay anything for the insurance?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; not for that insurance.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you state that you have a labor committee—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interrupting). Yes.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Within the executive committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How many members constitute that committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think three members—four, altogether.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a member of that committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What are the names of the members of the labor committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I can not give you the names offhand, either.

Chairman WALSH. Can you give the names of any of them?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes. I think Mr. Loeb is on it, and Dr. Neill, I think, and Mr. Brush. I can not recall the others. Perhaps Mr. Eilers or Mr. Newhouse.

Chairman WALSH. And is Dr. Neill a director in your company?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. He is.

Chairman WALSH. When was that committee created?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That I can not give you, the date.

Chairman WALSH. Well, was it since Dr. Neill came with your organization?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And when did he come with your organization?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think about a year and a half ago.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to that time did you have a labor committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; there was not any labor committee; but the various members of the executive committee would participate in the discussions and the making of recommendations as to what should be done, and then those recommendations were sent to the superintendent in charge of the plant.

Chairman WALSH. If you, as president or as a director, were convinced that labor conditions in any of the corporations in which you are interested were such that workmen were unable to support their families without putting their wives and their children to work, or if the nature of the employment resulted in industrial disease, or if the accident rate was excessive as compared with other corporations, what action would you take?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I would immediately bring the matter to the notice of the executive committee and would order an investigation, and if the conditions were as you have stated they might be I should order—do everything in my power to see that they were changed or remedied for the benefit of the workmen. And if my corporation would not carry out my ideas in regard to that, I would have nothing to do with it.

Chairman WALSH. In the report of the Bureau of Statistics of the State of New Jersey—you had a strike, I believe, in New Jersey, quite an extended strike, in 1912?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; quite right.

Chairman WALSH. It is stated, we are informed in the statistics of New Jersey in connection with that strike the following alleged facts: That the standard for laborers before the strike was $1.60 per day.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is that correct?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I can not state that. I would not know. That is a detail that I would not have in my mind, naturally.

Chairman WALSH. Wouldn't you have in your mind as to what the rate of common labor was prior to 1912?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; I would not.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any increase after the strike?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That I do not recollect. Those details I would not care to state offhand, but I could let you have the information in case you have not got it; would be only too pleased to give it to you.

Chairman WALSH. At that time did you make any personal inquiries as to the large fact as to how much the common laborers received?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; I did not. I do not go into the details of those things. My duties won't permit of it.

Chairman WALSH. Was it a fact that it—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interrupting). My other duties, I mean—I beg pardon.

Chairman WALSH. There was somebody whose duty it was to go into the details?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who was it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. At that time we selected one of our directors—Mr. Willard S. Morse—in whom we have great confidence, and whom we believe is a man with a humane side as well as a business side. I told him specifically to go over to Perth Amboy and to remain there and study up the conditions and see what the difficulties were, and do everything that was right in order to bring about a proper adjustment as between the laborers and ourselves. And he had that business specifically under his charge, and he cooperated with our managers there and, I believe, with the local authorities; and in addition, if my memory serves me correctly, President Wilson selected some one to go there and see what could be done to bring about an adjustment of the question. And after the trouble was disposed of this gentleman—I forget his name—called me on the telephone and told me that he was highly pleased. He was on the governor's staff. He was a man in the banking business. I can not just recall his name, but I can get it when necessary. He told me that he was highly pleased with what Mr. Morse had done, and also with the spirit of the company in trying to meet the workmen in every way possible. In fact, he complimented me; and I told him I appreciated what he had said in the premises, too.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, as I understand you, prior to the formation of this labor committee in the employment of Dr. Neill, your plan was to have one individual investigate and ascertain labor conditions; is that correct?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; that is not quite correct.

Chairman WALSH. State it again, please.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The general manager in charge of the plant has, of course, naturally all of the information in regard to the laborers and the conditions that obtain. And the executive committee would from time to time—several of the members of the executive committee—would visit various plants and see what was going on and what was happening. And in addition to that they would make, on their return to New York, a report to the general executive committee as to what the conditions were regarding the plant, labor and operations, profits, losses, purchase of ores, and everything pertaining to the business. In that way all the directors were reasonably well informed as to what existed; and in case of trouble at any plant it is the duty of the general manager or the superintendent at the plant to immediately take up the matter with the home office. And then in that event, if it is thought advisable, generally speaking, a director or two directors are sent to the place where the difficulty is—where the trouble is—to confer with the general manager or superintendent in order to be of service to him to bring about proper conditions as between the laborers and the general superintendent, and they would try to adjust matters, and generally succeeded in doing so. They would be in touch with the whole—with the entire board of directors and the executive committee—and would tell them just what the conditions were, and we would advise them from time to time just what they should do, or what we thought was fair, or what we thought was right. If an advance was advisable, or for some other reason, we would take up the question and decide what should be done. So that the entire board of directors in our case are practically responsible for the conditions that obtain at these plants. We do not care to shirk our responsibility. They are willing to assume that responsibility, and they are in sympathy to improve the conditions of labor wherever it is possible. And if they can adopt the measures that they have been asked to and are able to do it, if it is from a business standpoint, it is done.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in discharging this responsibility that you have just mentioned, I will ask you if you did not observe, as president and as a member of the board of directors, and as a member of the executive committee, that the standard rate for laborers in your plant in 1912 was $1.60 per day? That was the question, Mr. Guggenheim.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, I have taken up a lot of time in answering that simple question. I do not recall what the wages were at that time—whether a fair rate or a low rate. I can not remember whether it was $1.60 or whether it was $1.40, or whether it was $1.80; naturally, after two years I would not have that in my mind.

Chairman WALSH. What is the chief factor in the proposition or contention of the men; is it a question of hours between the employer and the employee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. It is, generally speaking, a question of wages.

Chairman WALSH. And, next to that, the question of hours?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The question of hours is a very important matter, naturally.

Chairman WALSH. And then the question of surroundings and conditions?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; quite right.

Chairman WALSH. When these gentlemen made these investigations in your plant, was it the custom for them to talk to the workers themselves—the individual workers?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes. I gave them instructions to do that very specific thing. And I recall an incident of the first day, Mr. Morse told me; he said he sent for three of the men and asked them what they really wanted. He said that each of them wanted something different; they could not reach a conclusion, because they did not really know what they wanted. That was all the difficulty. One man wanted one thing and another man wanted another thing, and the third man wanted something else. I told him that these men—to treat them kindly and do the best that they could with them and try to have them to formulate their demand, so that it would be in shape that they could discuss and be reasonable to them and reasonable to us. They worked on that general principle, to try to get them together and agree what they did want. It was finally settled. I do not remember what the basis of settlement was, but it was finally disposed of. After the minds had met it was disposed of, but I know they went back to work, and we were very well pleased, and I know I got that complimentary message from the gentleman who represented the governor of the State at that time. President Wilson was then governor.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what the standard rate for laborers is at the present time in your New Jersey plant?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; I do not know that detail, and if I did know I would not be able to know whether that is a fair wage or not. It may be $1.60 or $1.80. One plant may pay $3 and another a great deal less. Unless I go into all of the details I would not know whether it was fair or not.

Chairman WALSH. Without regard to whether it is fair or not, do you know of any plant in New Jersey in which the standard wage is $3 a day; the standard rate is $3 a day?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I do not think there are any plants that pay that much, but my information on that subject is general.

Chairman WALSH. I gather from that same report that the majority of your employees at Perth Amboy work 12 hours a day; is that true?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I do not think so.

Chairman WALSH. What hours per day do the majority of your employees at Perth Amboy work a day at the present time?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. My impression is that it is eight hours.

Chairman WALSH. Do any number of them work 12 hours a day?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think not; but I am not positive about that. That is a detail of the business which I have not followed.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall that, from any report made by any subcommittee or anything you heard at any meeting of your executive committee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the plant is operated continuously day and night?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that much of the work is done under such intense heat that an occasional day of rest is a necessity for the men, that even men of the strongest physique require such a day of rest, and that consequently you are required to carry many extra laborers on the pay roll?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. In that case the Sundays have been cut out, and they do get a day of rest where the heat is bad. We do that and are glad to do it, for a man should not be required to work seven days. We have a plant in the West, the United States Zinc Co., where it is difficult work for even eight hours, and there we pay good wages, and do the best we can from a humane standpoint. Our managers there pay attention to that and have instructions from us not to allow the workmen to work under conditions that are derogatory to their health.

Chairman WALSH. The question was, Is your company obliged to carry many extra laborers upon its pay roll to meet that situation?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No.

Chairman WALSH. That is not true?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think that the standard rate of wages for a laborer ought to be in New Jersey at the present time, considering the cost of living and all of the other conditions that you might think of that enter into that question?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is a question that requires a great deal of study, and I must plead ignorance in not being able to pass upon it.

Chairman WALSH. Should the men engaged in labor be required to work 12 hours a day?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; they should not.

Chairman WALSH. Please explain the relative frequency of strikes at the American Smelting & Refining Co.'s plant at Perth Amboy. I believe there was one in 1910?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And another in 1912?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I do not think those are frequent strikes—to have one in a year, or two years, when you consider the difficulties that the laborers have to live under and the high cost of living, and there naturally will be discontent, and there is discontent, and I have a very sympathetic feeling for their troubles, for I know they are living under very difficult conditions at the present time. I mean during the last year or two, during which time the cost of living has gone up so.

Chairman WALSH. Would that be your idea—leaving out the word “frequency”; would that be your idea, that the strikes that have occurred at Perth Amboy were due to the high cost of living?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I should say that would be the main cause of dissatisfaction and unrest in labor, because the cost of living has advanced so much in the last few years.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward the organization of employees for their own protection and for what they deem best to advance their interests?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think they are fully justified, and I fully approve of it.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what information or experience is that attitude of yours based?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The general knowledge I get of what is going on in a general way, and knowing that the capitalists very frequently are very arbitrary men, the same as the laborer when he gets too much power can be very arbitrary, and is very arbitrary, but I fully believe the laborer has a right to organize and should organize to protect himself the same as the capitalist.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward permitting union organizers not connected with your corporation to address your employees and carry on their work?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. They can do anything they please outside of the grounds. That is their business and we do not believe in handicapping the workmen. They are human beings the same as the rest of us. They have the right to do what they please. Our men do not stop them, and they are instructed not to stop them outside of the grounds.

Chairman WALSH. Are instructions given to the managers of your plants in writing?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; those discussions take place orally. The managers frequently visit us, and many of our managers are directors, and when they come on they know the general policy of the company and they are informed in that way just as to what we want them to do. There are frequently letters written covering our wishes. We are not afraid to write letters, and we do so and give them instructions in that way.

Chairman WALSH. As the result of your observation and experience, would you say that industrial discontent in America is increasing or decreasing?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I should say that it is increasing and has been increasing for many years, and I am sorry to say that I fear it will continue to increase unless things are done to prevent it for the benefit of the laboring classes.

Chairman WALSH. What is causing this increase of industrial discontent, in your opinion?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The high cost of living primarily, and next the worst canker the world is suffering from, which is the canker of envy, and when the poor man realizes how much he has to be envious for it is natural that it will create discontent and to a very great extent. That is the unfortunate thing that prevails throughout the entire human race.

Chairman WALSH. You say that will continue to increase unless something is done to remedy it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. From your experience in industry, Mr. Guggenheim, what remedies would you suggest?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. A great many things have been done during the last few years, but more things will be done in the years to come, because, I think, that there has been an awakening, because the laborer and employer, and among the managers of business, they are commencing to realize to a greater extent than ever before that they have obligations toward the workingman beyond that of trying to get only results. The same as I do not think the world believes to-day that, in order to get on in business, you have to ruin your competitor. Formerly it was a question of the survival of the fittest, but I think we have evolved from that policy, as I think the employer of labor has evolved from the policy of grinding his laborers down and paying them the lowest wages possible and utilizing them for his own interests and for nothing beyond that. I hope the capitalist—and I hope I am not mistaken—has become more humane, and I think finally in that way we will get away from a good deal of the discontent that now exists.

And in addition to that, although many people are of the opinion that too much legislation is going on and that we are suffering from too much legislation, I do not agree with that idea at all. I do not think we have begun to legislate to the extent that we shall in the future. I think we are many years behind the advanced countries in that direction, like England and Germany, in providing for the welfare of our workmen. I think the difference between the rich man and the poor man is very much too great; and only if that is done will we be able to get away from the unrest that exists among the workingmen, and surely the men who have been successful can not be very happy when they realize how much unrest there is and realize what is taking place. A great deal can be done in a legislative way. I am a great believer in the legislation that is being discussed and thought of, where the Federal Government and the State—the employer and the laborer get together, and laws being enacted where they all participate, covering the laborer's time of working life and after his injury and after he dies. A great deal can be done in that way, in my judgment, but it is too big a job for the State to tackle alone, or labor to tackle alone. I do not know that that will satisfy labor, because they want something more, beyond that, or those that think want more than that. They want more of the comforts and necessities of life and more of the luxuries, and they are entitled to them and ought to get them. I think the appointment of such a commission as this will lead up to some legislation along the line it should, and I do not say this because I am beyond the question of want, but I have a humane feeling for my fellow man and have always had it and I feel that way.

Chairman WALSH. Aside from the feelings of humanity, or even of benevolence on the part of the employers, do you believe that just and fair conditions can be brought about between employer and employee unless the employee has a compelling voice in the fixing of his own conditions of labor, wages, hours, and the conditions which surround him while he is at work?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No. I do not think you could bring it about universally. You might do so in some instances.

Chairman WALSH. So that industry must be democratized as a social society from a political standpoint if justice is to be worked out?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. And should all efforts of employers and employees and humanitarians and the Government be pressed in that direction?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You have no doubt about that in your experience?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Absolutely none.

Chairman WALSH. Has any man in a political democracy such as suggested justified in refusing the extension of that idea?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; he has not.

Chairman WALSH. I am putting that, now, both generally and locally.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I agree with that fully and unequivocally.

Chairman WALSH. And in democratizing industry, as a political society or society from a political standpoint, you must deal with the material at hand?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The employer, for instance, could not say that he would refuse to deal with another man—an employee—for any defect he might claim existed in the man's character any more than an employee could refuse to deal with the employer because of the same reason?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. You are quite right. I believe that legislation that will benefit the many is justifiable under all circumstances, no matter what they are. That which will make the most people of the country happy.

Chairman WALSH. In what philanthropic activities are you interested, either as a contributor or director?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I do not think I care to advertise that.

Chairman WALSH. It is not a matter of advertising, Mr. Guggenheim, I may assure you, at all.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I appreciate the sentiment that prompts you to ask that question, Mr. Chairman; but I do not think I care to go into that, and I do not think it is necessary. I am trying to do my duty as a philanthropist and charitable man; but I do not think any of us give up enough. We do not give enough at any time, generally speaking. I am not specific now.

Chairman WALSH. Appreciating your feeling of delicacy in referring to the amount, I will ask you to state along what line your philanthropic activities go into?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. In every direction, whether looking after the unemployed at the present time, or providing hospitals for them or homes for them, or homes for the injured, the old people, and the orphans. I am participating in various directions, and none of them fail to appeal to me or to Mrs. Guggenheim, who cooperates with me to a great extent in work of this kind; but I do not care to be more specific.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, have philanthropic activities generally had any effect toward reducing industrial discontent?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; only to a limited extent, and that extent is very, very limited. In other words, the cases that most people deal with are cases of necessity that have come up from time to time, and the necessity seems to grow; but those are big matters, and, in my judgment, those are matters—that no man should be refused a job in case he is fit to take one, and if he can not be employed it is up to the State to see that he gets work; and I think it is up to the State or Federal Government to see that every man physically unfit, if he is sick, gets a berth at the hospital. Every man that is sick or can not work should be looked after. You may call that a socialistic tendency, but those are my views.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think has been accomplished by the philanthropic activities of the country in reducing suffering and want among the people?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. There has a great deal been done. If it were not for what has been done and what is being done we would have revolution in this country. The people could not live that are out of employment if it were not for the philanthropic work that is being done; but no matter how much is done, enough is never done, because the people themselves do not realize what the situation is, and there are so many thousands of people that do not like to part with the money they have made that they do not need and which is of no advantage to them. They have not learned to give up. It is a habit you have to acquire in early life, and it is a good habit to get into.

Chairman WALSH. You have mentioned what might be called general socializing of this form of activity—social insurance against sickness, and things like that.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider, from your experience in philanthropic work, that any substantial gain can be made in social betterment except through the democratizing of those interests as well, putting them in the hands of the Government and allowing it to raise the money by a system of taxation and allowing it to do the work itself?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think it should be finally handled by the Government. We are taking care of the necessities, but they are growing continuously, and I think that is the work of the State or of the United States, to look after those people. The State must raise its money by taxation—by taxing the fortunes of the people when they die in a sufficient amount to enable it to do those things. Those are my personal views, of course. Many do not believe as I do in that regard.

Chairman WALSH. What do you consider might be called the fundamental evil of allowing such things to be done by private benefactions entirely?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The result is that you pauperize the people; and then you often come in contact with the people of finer feelings who do not want to accept charity. I come in contact with that every day in the week, almost every hour of the day. I know of people who would rather starve and have starved before accepting help from others; they won't accept charity, and there are hundreds of them. They are men and women, not dogs and animals, that absolutely refuse to accept assistance in a charitable way, and that condition can only be handled by the State.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed a growing protest upon the part of men and women who work in these industries against any of the profits of those industries being conferred by private benefactions?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I will ask you to repeat that question please.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed a discontent on the part of the individual workers in industry toward a portion of the product of that industry being conferred by private benefactions?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. They would rather become participants in that product, and they are entitled to become participants, than accept help in a charitable way, and it is much better because it means the uplift of the men by allowing them to participate in the profits. The great difficulty at the present time is that it is very difficult for these men who work to save anything. They do not know what saving is. Therefore, I am a believer in participation in profits by the laborers in industry, and then not only letting them participate, but it should be so formulated and arranged that their money is given to them in bulk at the end of a certain period and deposited in some bank or savings institution, because the laborer usually does not know the way to save his money; if he gets it by the week he spends his money, his expenses grow with his receipts. A few men learn how to save, and it is a difficult matter for a poor man to learn to save. Therefore, if he had an extra bonus at the end of a certain period, no matter how small it was, and that were deposited for him in some savings bank, that would develop hundreds and thousands of poor people who would be much better off because they would have money where now they spend it; and that is one of the reasons for so many poor people not getting on in the world. That is not saying that we do not have hundreds and thousands of people in this country who do save money, because the savings banks are full of it, but the plan which I have outlined would enable others to save money and that would improve the condition of unrest that now exists. Assume a man has something of his own which he has put aside he feels differently. You must educate the people to do those things as you educate a boy to read and write. People must be educated in every walk and phase of life, and to educate them to save money is one of the most difficult things to do.

Chairman WALSH. Do you put the ideas which you have expressed here, of giving them a fair share of the profit—do you put that on the ground of benefactions or charity, or on the ground of elemental justice?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. On the ground of their rights.

Chairman WALSH. That is, elemental justice?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; elemental justice.

Chairman WALSH. Now, that being true, what is the logical foundation for withholding that from the man for any length of time or making any terms to him as to that?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is a difficult problem. The man is human and says that he wants his wages, but you can put it on the same ground you do in paying the investor his dividend. He does not get his dividend every week or every day, but at the end of six months or a year. And when they get it in bulk they could have instructors at the plants, or from the State or county or city to teach the men what to do with those dividends and devising ways and means for the investment of that money, instead of allowing them to put it into speculations where they lose it. If they put it into savings banks protected by the State their money is safe from loss there, and this plan would result in benefit to the people at large.

Chairman WALSH. Theoretically the stockholder in industry indicates those conditions for himself, as to when he shall receive his dividends.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; as the usual method is regulated, it is a question of expediency.

Chairman WALSH. But theoretically, the stockholder regulates that because he has a right to vote on it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And there is no holding of the dividend, or advice given to the stockholder, as to how he shall use his money?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No.

Chairman WALSH. Some stockholders are thrifty, and others are shiftless and lose their money?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And some workmen are thrifty and some otherwise?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; but I think you will find that the greater proportion of them are thriftless than otherwise, and if you could find some one to help them in that direction it would be a good thing.

Chairman WALSH. Your experience shows a greater number of working people who are improvident than among those who are the possessors of wealth?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is natural; those men and women have become wealthy because they have been thrifty.

Chairman WALSH. All of them?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; but in America I think we can assume that the most of those who have become wealthy in the last 10 or 15 years have been thrifty. But if you go back 40 or 50 years you will find there are some who have inherited their wealth from their worthy or unworthy sires, and I sympathize with them, for the rich men's sons deserve some sympathy, not to the extent that the laboring man does, but often he does not know how to take care of himself.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Guggenheim, speaking of the reports that are made by your superintendents or managers in the event that labor troubles arise, do you accept the reports of such superintendents or managers as conclusive or do you use means of your own to determine whether or not a course pursued by the superintendents or managers has been conducive of the trouble?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You use your own methods or take his as conclusive?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; we usually send a director or two out to the place to ascertain, men that are without prejudice and unbiased, to go into the thing thoroughly and find out who is responsible for the trouble and to make a thorough investigation. Those directors then report by telegraph or letter, or they come back after they are through and report to the general board of directors what has happened and the causes of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If their report was to the effect that the manager himself was at fault, that it had been his methods which had brought about the trouble, there would be no hesitancy on the part of the corporation in reversing his action?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Absolutely no hesitancy.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is not the idea underlying pensions, sickness insurance, unemployment insurance, and all that class of so-called social insurance—is not the underlying idea the protection of society really instead of the protection of the individual in a very large degree?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Oh, I couldn't say that; I wouldn't say that; I could not agree to that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What does actually underlie it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I think what really underlies—there are two things underlie. I know one case I can speak of from experience. I think there is a great human side to many of the people which appeals to them, and then when it is discussed, as we so frequently discuss it, around the table, we eliminate, for argument sake, the humane side; and those men are progressive and understand the situation, and they discuss it from the standpoint of getting better results. I do not think my own people, from my own particular experience—but what it is to the interest of the employer to improve the conditions of his workmen, to give him these things, so that he is not worrying and bothered about what is going to happen if he gets sick and leaves and goes to some other place to try to improve his condition. We get better efficiency and we get better results in a business that will adopt those methods. I am satisfied, and I am satisfied that 95 per cent of our directors are satisfied, that it brings about that result. If you wish to eliminate the humane side of it entirely, they will agree, of course, within reason, as to what the size of the pension should be, how to look after these men, and how to get a better efficiency. It is the workman who comes and works three months and then goes some place else and works another three months, even the unskilled laborer—it takes him some time to get acquainted with things and know how they should be done.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Eliminate the humanitarianism and good business. Take an interest like the railways.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Crippling 500,000 men a year.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the absence of humane legislation, social legislation, insurance, are not those men thrown onto the public to support if the employer who crippled them fails to take up the burden?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. There is no doubt about it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Therefore, is not the underlying idea of all such social legislation the guarding against the exploiting of the public by the employer in the pursuit of his business unconscious exploitation?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; quite right; yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then it is really the protection of the social body? Do you believe that they can ever attain their full measure of value, either to the social body or to the individual or to the employer until they have become universally under Government control and domination?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, I am a believer in Government control—

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I am a firm believer in that. Therefore those must be—that must be the conclusion of mind.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you noticed, or have you not, that a large part of the distrust of the laboring man of those measures, once put in by the employer alone, grows out of the thought you just mentioned, the three-month's man and the tenure of service, of their being applied as things, it is only done by the individual employer?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I do not quite grasp what you mean.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The man working 10 years for you gets the benefits, if at that time his period of service altogether ceases from any cause?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Gets the benefit?

Commissioner GARRETSON. The pension or insurance?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And so on.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. While the casualist who works the 10 years for 10 different employers gets none of the continuous benefits because his service has not been continuous?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is practically correct, yes.
 Commissioner GARRETSON. But he is exactly the same form of charge on the public, if he is crippled, as if he had all those things?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is very true.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I gather from one of your statements that you consider the charities and philanthropies really only deal with effects, while we should go to the cause that creates the necessity?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You spoke of the envy that was a large element?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In the creation of industrial unrest?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you ever differentiated between what might be termed legitimate and illegitimate envy—that is, justified and that that is not justified?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Oh, there is a great deal of it justified; only too much, unquestionably.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Take a time like the present, for instance, and bear in mind I am not using numbers that are in any way meant to approximate, I am only using round numbers, when a million men possibly are unable to buy bread for their wives on account of unemployment?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Can anything create more industrial unrest than the exploiting of the fact that the representative of a great interest, of a great industry, who had squandered a million dollars in unwise gifts on his family?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, that is a justifiable cause for envy.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Could that be anything else than starting an anarchy factory?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; it would, in part.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Guggenheim, from your liberal views you have expressed in dealing in the matter of labor, I gather that among other things you are in favor of industrial democracy?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, will you explain to the commission, Mr. Guggenheim, how you would go about to establish industrial democracy? What would be the first thing to do and what would be the second thing to do, and so on, that industrial democracy may be realized?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is a question I could not answer here offhand. That is a subject that requires a great deal of thought and study. Generally speaking, Commissioner Weinstock, I am in favor of that being brought about by cooperation of the Federal Government, of the State government, the employer, and the employee. In that way I think if the laws were properly enacted, I think we would very much improve the conditions of the people by legislation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, let us make sure that you and I understand alike. What is meant by industrial democracy?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. What is your view?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you be good enough to tell me what your definition is of industrial democracy?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, my understanding of that in the broad sense is the man that performs the labor has got something to say.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Has a voice?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Has a voice in the matter, and it has been very fortunate that he has had a voice in the matter, otherwise we would not have had these compensation laws which are now being enacted throughout the Nation. If there had never been any unrest, there would never have been much of that brought about for the worker. In no instance have we refused where it is elective to go under the elective compensation laws. And that is one thing. It is simply a beginning. We have only started, in my judgment, to do these things, because if that awakening occurs among our people as it has been taking place in other countries, like England and Germany many years ago, I think we have been very much behind the times, but, fortunately, it is coming. It is never too late to do good, and so, fortunately, it is coming.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, under a common condition of industrial democracy, then, the worker would have a voice in the fixing of his wage, the fixing of his working hours, and in the determination of his working conditions?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; he should have that voice.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, with that end in view, with that as the objective—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What ought the employers of to-day to do?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, I am a firm believer—if the employee has a voice and can dictate to the employer, both parties are going to strive to get the best bargain that they can make, and it is only natural. Now, I prefer the conciliator as the better method than that of the compulsory arbitration. But they will never get together if both parties are equally powerful, which is a matter of course, and the result is disastrous and brings on more misfortunes to both parties to the affair. Therefore I believe that we will have to find some way of settling the question than either—I have always felt that the conciliator could do a great deal better work than what the compulsory arbitrator could do. But if nothing else could be found, I know of nothing then, but it would have to be compulsory arbitration.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can the worker, so far as you know, Mr. Guggenheim, as an individual, pure and simple, hope by his individual efforts to establish industrial democracy?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; I don't think he can as an individual.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It has got to be done collectively?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Collectively, and then through legislation, because if it is done through legislation, then it is prescribed and you can do away with the conciliator, you can do away with the arbitrator, the compulsory arbitrator. That is why I favor legislation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Does that lead us, then, to the point where it is made plain if the worker hopes to see industrial democracy established that his first step must be along the lines of organization in order to get collective action?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Absolutely; he has got to organize.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He has got to organize?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Otherwise he can not accomplish his object.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, on the other hand, what do you think, Mr. Guggenheim, should be the attitude of the employer, say the large employer, how should he recognize and deal with these collective bodies; do you think he should?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Absolutely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He should?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Of course, you must not overlook the fact there are bound to be good organizations and bad organizations, the same as we have good trusts, so called, and bad trusts. But a good trust with people at the head, and also a good organization of labor, we have a great many in this country, and any public-spirited man or any citizen is proud of a good many of our labor organizations, and they have reason to be proud of them. They can always get together, in my judgment, and solve their difficulties and discuss their troubles and can dispose of them. But the difficulty is that there are a number of bad organizations or so-called bad trusts and bad employers at the same time. The superintendent at the plant takes an arbitrary position just the same as the workman may take an arbitrary position. There is no one over him, and he does not have to refer to his board of directors; he simply goes to work and does as he pleases. And in the case of that kind it may be very disastrous—the result—and it becomes a question of the survival of the fittest. I do not believe in the survival of the fittest. That is something I do not approve of. There are others that do—numbers do approve of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May I ask what has been the policy of the corporation that you are connected with, Mr. Guggenheim; do you recognize bargaining with organized labor?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We have the so-called open shop. Anybody, any body of men can come to us, for we look upon our men and want to be fair and reasonable. Of course, we have to use some discretion in the organization to protect our operations. We have got to take care of our shareholders as well as our laborers. We have to view it from the broad standpoint.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do your companies engage in collective bargaining?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We do not object to dealing with anybody. We do not discriminate in any manner, shape, or form. The men may come and treat with us as an organization or as individuals, or two or three, or as a body, or representing the organization.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do the companies that you are connected with enter into agreements, into written agreements, with labor bodies?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, we agree—oh, yes; we have done that; we agree to do that. Of course, very often these labor organizations have representatives.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are any of those companies operating under labor agreements at this time?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; not that I know of.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have none?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, at this time you are practicing practically individual bargaining?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We agree what we will do and live up to it, and if the laborer becomes dissatisfied he makes a kick.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At this time you are practically engaged in what would be called individual bargaining?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You make a bargain with each individual worker?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. It is not usually done that way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the way?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. They come in in groups, three or four, in case of trouble, for instance; and, of course, the individual worker can come in, if he happens to be a carpenter or a bricklayer, and say, "I would like to have more wages," and it is looked into.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you deal with him as an individual?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We deal with him as an individual.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you don't deal with them as an organization or organized body whatever? You do not have a committee who comes to see you in behalf of the men?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. If they do come we receive them and give them every consideration.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you deal with them collectively, or how?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We deal with them collectively, or if they come individually, or take them any way they want to come. There is absolutely no restriction in any way in our business that I am aware of. I would not permit it. I believe that the other fellow has got to be heard. I give our men such instructions. I believe it is very rarely that they do not live up to those instructions. It sometimes happens a man may be hot-headed, and, of course, when we find that out he is called down at once. We try to keep ourselves in touch with what is going on.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You say, Mr. Guggenheim, that your corporations are what are known as the open shop?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; they are worked under that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that is, that there are different definitions by different people of what the open shop is. What is your idea—I wish you would tell what is your conception of it?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. What I mean by the open shop is that we do not care whether a man belongs to a labor union or whether he does not. He comes to us for employment and we give it to him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not bar the unionist?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. We do not bar out anybody. We do not care. They may come and belong to the organization or not. They come for work. They are not discriminated against. I do not believe we have got a right to control a man any more than we have got to control what he eats or what he drinks. When he leaves our works that is his business.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask a question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Guggenheim, has your company ever dealt with any particular organization of labor, made contracts with them?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I do not think we have, Mr. Commissioner. I am not aware of it. Of course, as I say, those are details which I personally would not be as familiar with as Dr. Neill, for instance, who has been in charge of that branch of the business for about a year and a half.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you any knowledge as to whether there are any of your employees organized at the present time, Mr. Guggenheim?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Oh, yes; I am satisfied that a great many of them belong to unions. I know that, generally speaking.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have the employees taken any part in the settling of the present rate of wages or the hours of labor in your company?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The employees?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, I think—I presume we have. I know when we settled this trouble in New Jersey and at various plants, they say what they want and we consider it. If it is fair we give it to them. If we think we can afford to give them that wage we give it to them; and if we think we can not we bargain with them and tell them the best we can do. They have had a good deal to say as to that. Of course, at the present time the labor condition is not good because there is a surplus of labor; and just as soon as conditions improve and it is justified and the more labor to be performed, then he makes his demand and will get more for his labor if the conditions justify.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The so-called open shop that Commissioner Weinstock just made inquiry about—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). Under the condition of the open shop the employee seeks employment regardless of whether he is a member of a union or not.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And he accepts employment from you on the conditions prevailing when he makes application for that employment?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And nobody prior to his employment, for him at least, has any part in the settling or making of the hours or the wage, but he simply walks into the plant under the conditions prevailing there that he had no part in whatever?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is what we find in the so-called open shop?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes. Well, he would find that in any business for that matter—no, in the open shop. Yes, if it was unionized, there would be some conditions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then he would be somewhat prepared for.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Under contract with somebody?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And would know just exactly the thing he was going into—the conditions that had been in operation in that institution?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As you stated in reference to the organizations in the railway service?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There are contracts made with the various organizations by practically all the railroads in the country?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And a man who seeks employment knows exactly the conditions prevailing under the contractual relations existing between the employer and employee?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That does not exist with us. We have no such arrangements.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The point I am trying to make is your explanation of the open shop—in that the employee has had no part as to having any say in so far as the wage or the hours or the conditions of employment are concerned which he is going to be employed under. Your firm have done that, have they not?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; we have set the price.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Set the price and the hours and the conditions under which he shall work?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The job is there, and if he wants it he can have it, and if he don't want it he don't take it.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is the way of the open shop?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir. That is the way it operates. Of course he can refuse to work if it does not suit him; and if we need more workmen, as is very often the case, we get them and we have to pay them higher wages. That regulates itself.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, Mr. Guggenheim, the part I want to get at is, you spoke of the right of the workmen to organize and the benefits that have come in various ways from organization and association and all that?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose I, as an individual workman, was employed in your plant?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And I got the idea in my head that I wanted the hours reduced an hour per day?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How would I be able to bring that reduction of hours of labor about, where there were several thousand workmen employed, in my individual capacity?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Mr. Commissioner, it would be very difficult as an individual.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What would I have to do to succeed?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. You would have to depend entirely upon the justice of the corporation that you started to work for, of their acceding to your terms after listening to your argument and considering whether they wanted to give to you and the balance of the men what you asked, and if they did not see fit they simply would not do it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, in turn, if I still wanted to secure that, what would be the best policy to pursue?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The best policy would be to take the men working there and get together and say, here, we want so much. Then it becomes a question of supply and demand. Then the capitalist says we will not accede to it or we will accede to it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If I hoped to succeed, I would have to try and induce my fellow shopmen to act collectively?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Without a doubt. A single individual would not likely, unless the men who listened to him felt that his request was fair, and they would endeavor to make a just decision if it looked reasonable to them after the presentation of the facts.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, we come down to the point that the so-called open shop is a matter of individual dealing—the employer dealing with the individual—and the right of the individual to make his own contract with the employer?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. What we do is this: We decide what is a fair return for the workmen and anybody can apply for that position upon those terms, and whether he is a member of an organization or not a member of an organization we have nothing to do with that. That is his individual affair. But we set the wage; what we think is reasonable and right and fair and just; and we say now we will be glad to have you work for us upon those terms and conditions, and if there are enough workmen that want the job they will go to work, and if we can not get enough workmen we will say, "Here, we have got to raise our wages, otherwise we won't get enough men to do this work." Other people are paying more, or we would have to bring them from other places, or we would have to go about it the best way we could to fill up our plant with workmen if we need the workmen.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you had the experience or information of the result of investigation of any kind as to the effect that the operation of a so-called open shop has upon the organizations of the men, whether it leads to disorganization of them or furthers and strengthens organization, or what its effect is?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. No; I have not studied that from that viewpoint. I have never studied that from that viewpoint at all; that would be my answer to that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If an individual workman in your plant was discharged for any alleged cause—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). There are thousands of reasons why men are discharged—as an individual working a great distance away from your New York office—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL (continuing). What is his personal opportunity of getting an adjustment of his grievance, whether it be real or imaginary, to the extent of going up to you, for instance, in New York?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, he would have a great deal of difficulty, because he naturally would come under the superintendent or foreman who employed him.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But isn't he restricted very materially, Mr. Guggenheim, probably by his financial affairs?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. You are absolutely correct in assuming that, Mr. Commissioner. But this is what happens: We find if our superintendent or our foreman happens to be a man of no tact, or happens to be unfair, as sometimes we will happen to have unfair men in our various ramifications, because they are very extensive. We find in the course of time if that is an unfair man or an unreasonable man; we find it out in some way, either at the visitation of the plants by the executive committee somebody comes and tells them about this and tells them about that, and finally we learn that we have got an incompetent man at the head of that business. In other words, truth is mighty and will prevail. That is a proverb we can believe in, I think. And if our manager or the man in charge or the foreman happens to be unreasonable and treats the men badly, finally it will get out. Some one in the town or place tells us. But he has no opportunity and he couldn't get to the president or the board of directors and go over that man; that is, the workman can not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But, in the meantime, the men who have been discharged and lost positions have suffered?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir; that is right; that is right. And then the company suffers also by the reason that it has got a bad manager and can not get the best men and is handicapped. And that will finally lead to the change and somebody else is put in. Now, these men, in answer to that, if they are so handicapped that they can not leave there, suffer; but in the course of time that would adjust itself. I know it does. I frequently get letters myself—but that is a very great exception—where I am asked to intercede and do this and do that; that a man has been unjustly discharged; and invariably I look into it and make thorough investigation and do not depend upon the man he complains of entirely, because I could not do him justice if I did that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, in our present highly developed industrial situation and the continued getting together of employers in the industrial world, larger and larger, I take it from what you say that the workman, if he desires that protection, he can not bring it to himself as quickly outside of the union as the union could, or legislative matters when brought up in the legislative way. His economic relief must be by his association, together with his fellow workman.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. I believe that is correct. He will get quicker results. He will get undoubtedly quicker results, unless he is protected legislatively, or he will get quicker results by being a member of his organization.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He will need the organization, from past experience, to see that the legislation enacted is put into effect.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. That is why I believe in organization.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. He will need his economic organization either way?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; he will get quicker results and better results with it; and I do not oppose organization, and neither do any men in our employ oppose them with our consent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Your company would be, as I understand, from an answer you made to Commissioner Weinstock, be favorable to meeting with an organization of your employees?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I think you qualified that in your statement by saying good—

Mr. GUGGENHEIM (interrupting). I say—yes; I think it has got to be a good organization.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I just want to get what you consider a good organization.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Well, a bad organization is a bad organization of men that are arbitrary and unreasonable, and men who make extraordinary demands upon you that you can not concede, and men who want things that are not fair and right, and men at the head of those organizations that will accomplish their object, no matter what the consequences are.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; but men come and go, like they do in the corporations.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes, sir; and I claim that the corporations are just as bad. We have a great many corporation heads, the heads of local plants and corporations, who are arbitrary and do those things. Therefore, I believe we have gotten or will get better results from these big combinations and big organizations than we get from the smaller ones.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, as I understand, it is the men at the head of the organizations rather than the organization that you speak of when you mean good?

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Yes; the men at the head of the organizations, the same as there are leaders of the labor organizations, and the men at the head of the industrial enterprises. It all depends on which men run the business.

Commissioner WALSH. That is all, thank you, Mr. Guggenheim, unless there is something you desire to explain and amplify, or some voluntary statement that you would like to make.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. The only thing I care to say, gentlemen, is that I am very much obliged by your courtesy, and any other information that you want I will be pleased to give it to you if it is within my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. We will submit a written questionnaire to Dr. Neill later on.

Mr. GUGGENHEIM. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will take a recess for 10 minutes at this point.

(After a short recess the proceedings were resumed as follows:)

Mr. Berwind will please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD J. BERWIND.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. BERWIND. Edward J. Berwind.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please?

Mr. BERWIND. I am president of various coal companies and a director in a great many railroad corporations.

Chairman WALSH. Where is your place of residence?

Mr. BERWIND. 2 East Fifty-fourth Street, New York City.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in New York?

Mr. BERWIND. About 39 years.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you, first, Mr. Berwind, to please indicate in the record the companies in which you are a director, that are engaged in the mining of coal alone.

Mr. BERWIND. I am president and director in—shall I mention the companies?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, please—the coal companies?

Mr. BERWIND. The Berwind-White Coal Mining Co., the Wilmore Coal Co., the Ocean Coal Co., the New River & Pocahontas Coal & Coke Co., and the Kentland Coal Co.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please indicate at what points the companies in which you are connected as a director operate coal mines?

Mr. BERWIND. They operate in Pennsylvania and in West Virginia, and the property of which I am the owner in Kentucky are not now operating. That is more of a land operation, but still the property is there—not developed.

Chairman WALSH. Then you are operating in no States of the Union now except Pennsylvania and West Virginia?

Mr. BERWIND. Pennsylvania and West Virginia.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any property in Colorado?

Mr. BERWIND. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever had?

Mr. BERWIND. I was president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in 1880 to 1890, and have not been since.

Chairman WALSH. And you have not been there since?

Mr. BERWIND. I have no interests there whatever.

Chairman WALSH. How many employees would you say you have ordinarily in your coal industries in the places you have indicated?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I should think from 10,000 to 12,000.

Chairman WALSH. Is that the maximum?

Mr. BERWIND. I should think so; yes. I could not tell you exactly, but approximately.

Chairman WALSH. How many mines have you in the States of West Virginia and Pennsylvania?

Mr. BERWIND. I could not state it accurately, but I could state it approximately.

Chairman WALSH. Well, approximately?

Mr. BERWIND. I should think about 35.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I will ask you first how many directors in your coal company—in each company?

Mr. BERWIND. There are about five in each—four to five. Some cases four and some five.

Chairman WALSH. And do the directors in your companies keep in touch with the labor conditions in the various mines?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; because the directors are the officers, and the officers and directors are the owners of the company. It is a close corporation—all of them.

Chairman WALSH. You have no executive committee?

Mr. BERWIND. No executive committee. The owners of the property are the managers of the enterprises.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what is the attitude of the coal companies, or the policy of your coal companies, with reference to dealing with the men employed in the industry collectively?

Mr. BERWIND. Our policy is to adhere strictly to the mining laws of the States in which we operate, to commence with—to carry out fully and liberally all arrangements with the men, and to give them the greatest amount of consideration in the way of welfare and in other directions that is consistent with the competition we have to meet.

Chairman WALSH. How do you deal with the men generally? Do you deal with them collectively or individually?

Mr. BERWIND. I think—that is a question that I can not answer absolutely, but approximately. The men—we have very efficient officers. In other words, we select the best managers we can find, men who are not only accustomed to the handling of labor, but men who understand the conditions of mining, understand the relations of labor with capital in this particular way—in the way of coal mining. Now, the men have access, through their superintendents and bosses to the managers at the mines of which there is a manager in each mine. If they have any grievance, that grievance is immediately looked into, and if that grievance has a basis it is carried to a conclusion and rectified. If it has no basis, it is dropped.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make contracts with any labor organizations in your industry?

Mr. BERWIND. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever made contracts with any labor organization, say, during the past 10 years?

Mr. BERWIND. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Does any labor organization have locals in your field—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). I don't understand the question.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). I will put the question in another form. Any mines in which considerable numbers of your employees belong to labor organizations?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, we have reason to believe there are more or less of those men among our men.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any discrimination made in the employment of men?

Mr. BERWIND. None at all.

Chairman WALSH. With reference to the fact as to whether or not they belong to labor organizations?

Mr. BERWIND. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in companies other than the ones you have mentioned?

Mr. BERWIND. In coal companies?

Chairman WALSH. In other businesses. I have left that for the moment.

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; I am a director in the Erie Railway. I am a director in the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway. I am a director in the Interborough, and a director in various banks here—bank and trust companies.

Chairman WALSH. And steamship lines?

Mr. BERWIND. And a director in steamship lines.

Chairman WALSH. The Atlantic Gulf & West India Steamship Lines?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir; and in the International Mercantile Marine.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with the Berwind National Bank, of Berwind, Pa.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir; I have an ownership in that.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in it?

Mr. BERWIND. A director; yes.

Chairman WALSH. The Clyde Steamship Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. A director?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The Cuba Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You have mentioned the Erie. The Habana Coal Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir. But those companies you have just mentioned, the Cuba Co. and the Habana Co., do not operate in this country. So I hardly judge—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Yes; I judge that is so from the names. What is the International Coal Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. The International Coal Co. is a concern we organized to have dealings with the West Indies particularly and Mexico.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a director in that?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And the International Mercantile Marine Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The New River & Pocahontas Coal Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where does that operate?

Mr. BERWIND. That operates in West Virginia on—all our properties in West Virginia are on the Chesapeake & Ohio or the Norfolk & Western.

Chairman WALSH. You are also president of the company?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The New York & Long Island Traction Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. A director?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The New York & Queens County Railway?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The New York Railways Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The Ocean Coal Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is that company?

Mr. BERWIND. The Ocean Coal Co. is a company which own properties in Westmoreland County, Pa.—miners of gas coal.

Chairman WALSH. The Rapid Transit Subway Construction Co. Is that a New York company?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The Republic Iron & Steel Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The Santa Fe, Prescott & Phoenix Railway Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir. That is a branch of the Atchison; that is a subsidiary company—the Atchison, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway Co., to be more clear.

Chairman WALSH. The Subway Realty Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. The Subway Realty Co., yes.

Chairman WALSH. The St. Louis, Toledo & Western Railroad?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, a director.

Chairman WALSH. What is the Wilmore Coal Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. That is a company owning a large body of land in Cambria and Somerset Counties, Pa., and not operating, but a company which leases these lands and is a realty company—more of a realty company. It leases the lands to the operating companies and builds the houses and advances money, those purposes.

Chairman WALSH. In what corporations do you own or represent any considerable amount of stock other than those which I have mentioned to you?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I do not—in all these companies you have mentioned?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BERWIND. I don't think I have very much outside of those in the way of the ownership of stocks, I mean in smaller concerns not of much importance, or not a very large holding of stock.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you possess concerning labor conditions in the coal corporation; first, how is that information acquired?

Mr. BERWIND. In the which?

Chairman WALSH. In the coal corporation, in the actual operating.

Mr. BERWIND. You mean my own companies?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; your own companies.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, our organization is this: The coal companies are all owned by four individuals, and hence we, the owners of that corporation, and its officers, and its directors, and the operating department, keep in touch daily by telegraph, telephone, and by mail with its properties, and all information comes through the general managers of the properties to the main offices—to the operating offices in Philadelphia, and then there are frequent visits by the officers of the corporations to these various properties.

Chairman WALSH. Are reports from time to time as to the condition of labor in the industry made in writing to the corporation?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, not made perhaps in the report form that it would be in a corporation where we had miscellaneous stockholders; but it is all in the form of correspondence from day to day. It is constant.

Chairman WALSH. I repeat. What is the extent of the practice you say you have of visiting the plants of the corporation in which you are interested?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, our officers visit the plants, I should say, 6, 7, or 8, or 10 times a year, as often as may be necessary; sometimes oftener and sometimes less.

Chairman WALSH. What is your practice?

Mr. BERWIND. My own practice is not as often as I ought to go.

Chairman WALSH. How frequently would you say you had visited them within the past year?

Mr. BERWIND. I have not visited any in the last year.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, who did that sort of work for your company in the past year, what individual?

Mr. BERWIND. The vice president of the company and the general manager in Philadelphia.

Chairman WALSH. What are their names?

Mr. BERWIND. Mr. Henry Berwind and Mr. Thomas Fisher.

Chairman WALSH. How long has it been, Mr. Berwind, since you did make such an inspection, if you have done that part of the work yourself at any time?

Mr. BERWIND. I made those inspections within two years. I suppose I have made those inspections, going out to most of the properties, within, say, two years, and before that at intervals, not so large, but the last two years I have been away a good deal.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, to what extent are the directors of the corporation responsible for the laboring conditions in them, regardless of the residence of the director?

Mr. BERWIND. How far are they responsible?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; for the labor conditions in the industries in which they are directors.

Mr. BERWIND. My view is this: That the general directors of companies are not, as a rule, familiar with the labor operations; that is, men who invest money in corporations generally, and stockholders are not generally familiar with labor operations. Those directors who are most likely to look into the labor operations of the corporations of which they are directors, but the man who is ignorant of it, I think, rather refrains from expressing any views about it, trusting to the efficiency of the personnel, the official personnel of the railroads and the reports of the president to the board in general. That varies to some extent, in my—personally I do look into labor conditions, more or less, in all the corporations I am in, because I have been more or less associated with labor matters the last 30 or 40 years. But I do not think that is general with directors.

Chairman WALSH. Is it desirable that the directors should have a sense of responsibility and should have an organization within the industry to keep in constant touch with labor conditions?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not think—I think it would produce confusion.

Chairman WALSH. So that it should be done in what manner, according to your ideas?

Mr. BERWIND. I think it ought to be done; I think reports, full reports, should be given, or collected, by the managers of the railroads or of the corporations who employ labor. Those reports are then put together and brought to the executive officers of the concern. They are discussed in detail by them, in full detail. Then, when they are brought before the board, if anything is brought up with regard to labor, the board can decide anything that is of importance enough for them to make a change from what has been the practice, from the complete details. Details are concretely stated, with the reasons for and against, as a rule, and the board then pass their opinion. It is generally left to the executive officer of the concern; that is, the president and the manager.

Chairman WALSH. So that the logic might be that the board of directors would lay out the general plan and establish standards of labor conditions as they do with all other things, and the details should be left to the officers in charge of the particular industry?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not think the directors are competent to lay out the general plan. I think that rests with the staff to lay out the general plan and submit that to the board of directors for their consideration.

Chairman WALSH. And the directors—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). Would know what—

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Would have the last say on the plan, and decide that.

Mr. BERWIND. That is true.

Chairman WALSH. They would have to, of course, obtain information just according to their own conscience before they would pass upon it, of course?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; but I think the majority of men who are directors in concerns are not so educated and have not had the experience to pass upon the details of labor, the employment of labor, either upon railroads or in large industrial corporations, only on the general plan.

Chairman WALSH. Well, from that standard, then, and according to your own standards, I am going to ask you a few questions covering specific points as to what you deem proper labor conditions. First, what should be the length of the working day?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, that would depend a good deal on the kind of enterprise that the people were engaged in.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will confine it to yours. I would like you to say it freely without regard to any condition that may exist in any particular place, of course.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I will preambule my answer by making an explanation—

Chairman WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. BERWIND (continuing). That in my own business we pay by the ton, and therefore the number of hours that the men work is very largely dependent upon their wishes in the matters. So that the question of the length of the laboring day does not enter into it.

Chairman WALSH. That is from the money standpoint?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, yes; from the money standpoint; yes; it continues into that. They get paid exactly for what they do. In other words, they choose their own length of hours.

Chairman WALSH. My suggestion was, it makes no difference to the workman as to the piecework, but what I was asking and directing your attention to was to the proposition generally regardless of the economic advantage of the worker, or of the employer, what should be the length of a working day for a laborer or a worker engaged in the coal-mining industry?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I think—I should think nine hours a day.

Chairman WALSH. What should the yearly income be, under present conditions, for an unskilled workman?

Mr. BERWIND. I will answer that by saying—I will answer that by telling you what they are in my concern. I would not like to pass on what they ought to be in other concerns; that depends very much on conditions.

Chairman WALSH. The yearly income, then, in your concern for unskilled labor?

Mr. BERWIND. Men laboring in our concerns can earn from $3 to $5 a day every day of their lives and not work over eight hours.

Chairman WALSH. Unskilled labor?

Mr. BERWIND. Ordinary mining labor.

Chairman WALSH. That is, the coal digger?

Mr. BERWIND. The coal digger.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are there other forms of manual labor than coal diggers in your industry?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; of course, the collateral men that haul the coal, you know, and the electricians and the drivers and the dumpers, and so forth.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think the yearly income for unskilled workmen should be, I mean other than coal diggers, the minimum, I will say, the minimum yearly income?

Mr. BERWIND. That would be a pretty hard question for me to answer, sir; I could not do that.

Chairman WALSH. What is the minimum yearly income in your industry?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. For unskilled labor other than the coal digger?

Mr. BERWIND. I have not those figures before me, but I will be very glad to put them before you if I have them. I know they are very satisfactory.

Chairman WALSH. Will you submit them to us?

Mr. BERWIND. I will be very glad to give you the general average of them. (See Berwind exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. You could not approximate it here at this time?

Mr. BERWIND. I could not at this time, but I will tell you this, in connection with it, which may interest you, that for 25 years we have been unable to work our mine at capacity because the men would not work the hours. In other words, we had 26 days work in the month and we rarely could get over 19 days from the men, between various holidays and funerals and pay days and the day after pay day, cut us down in our work. [Laughter.]

Chairman WALSH. Please do not give expression to your feelings. We can not allow that.

Mr. BERWIND. And the result of that has been that our operations under those conditions do not get the maximum result, as you can see. So that we do not intend—I am saying this with nothing derogatory to the men, it is perfectly right if they want to work 19 days, that is their affair; but it shows that the earnings from those 19 days are sufficient and satisfactory to those men, or they would have worked 26 days, because they were not restrained by us from working 26 days. That is not true at the present time, I understand, but that has been true until within the last six months, for many years.

Chairman WALSH. With regard to compensation for industrial accidents, what would be the proper compensation under the present form in your industry to a workman who was to lose an arm, we will say?

Mr. BERWIND. I couldn't say anything in regard to that, because I have not gone into it. That is in the operating department in Philadelphia. They attend to all those matters.

Chairman WALSH. It has never been passed up to you?

Mr. BERWIND. Never been passed to me. We have our standard arrangements; we comply with the price—advanced ideas of compensation generally and recompensation for accidents.

Chairman WALSH. I have a number of details, as to the loss of an eye, the loss of life, and so forth. Would your answer be the same as to that, that you did not have the details?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I am not posted. I might do injustice to the subject and myself by making the statement.

Chairman WALSH. You say you have a very definite standard of compensation for accidents?

Mr. BERWIND. I did not say very definite. I said it was a very broad, fair one.

Chairman WALSH. A broad, fair one?

Mr. BERWIND. The policy of our company is to deal absolutely fairly with the men in everything, and I think you will—I was going to say that we hold that reputation.

Chairman WALSH. And how is that—is that with reference to legal liability or not?

Mr. BERWIND. With reference to everything, everything in our dealings, in our relations with our people; our relations with our people are very satisfactory.

Chairman WALSH. At the present time I am confining it to the question of compensation for industrial accidents.

Mr. BERWIND. And I am not well posted about that and I would rather not pass any opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Could you submit a statement to the commission that would give it some information on the broad policy of the company with reference to the amount of compensation, for instance, for the loss of an arm, or the loss of both eyes, or the loss of a life, or permanent disability?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not know whether I could do that, but I will see whether I can do it, with great pleasure.

Chairman WALSH. If you would, I wish you would do so, Mr. Berwind.

Mr. BERWIND. All right.

(See Berwind exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion as to the age and condition under which children should be employed in your industry?

Mr. BERWIND. I have no opinion on that. We do not employ them.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion as to the discharge of workmen who have become inefficient after long service in any industry?

Mr. BERWIND. My own view is that people who have been long in the service and have rendered good service, they should be taken care of in some way. I do not know that we have paid any special attention, but I think we have under the mining laws and under the compensation law of the State, that has all been provided for—the States we are operating in.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion as to the alleged policy of refusing to employ unskilled workmen who are over 35 years of age or skilled workmen who are over 45 years of age?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I do not think we have ever established any policy. We take any man that is competent to work, who does his work, without regard to his age.

Chairman WALSH. What should be done, if you have any opinion on the subject, with reference to the care of persons who have passed the real productive point in age?

Mr. BERWIND. I think that varies with conditions and with the kind of labor that is done and a good many other considerations.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that machinery could be established in any industry or by cooperation of industry with the governmental agencies, or any other way to take care of such things as that, or is it advisable to do so, in your opinion?

Mr. BERWIND. I think anything is advisable to do that has an element of fairness in it, whatever that may be; if there is an element of fairness in this compensation, it seems to me there is, I think, a way could be found that might be the solution of it. But I have never given any study to it and I would not like to express an opinion on something I have not looked into myself.

Chairman WALSH. You have not looked into the question of social insurance, what might be called betterment insurance?

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Chairman WALSH. What is the Berwind-White Coal Co.?

Mr. BERWIND. The Berwind-White Coal Mining Co. is a company that operates in Cambria, Somerset, and Clearfield Counties, Pa.

Chairman WALSH. What is the number of men employed by that company?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, offhand, I should say six or eight thousand men—between those figures.

Chairman WALSH. What is your scale of wages, monthly or annually, in that company?

Mr. BERWIND. The wages are established by the—there is a rate per ton for mining.

Chairman WALSH. How much per ton?

Mr. BERWIND. I think it is 60 cents a ton, is the flat rate. I think so. I did not come prepared with those statistics or I would have had them in mind.

Chairman WALSH. Those that you are not prepared with, I will ask you to kindly furnish to the commission.

Mr. BERWIND. We will give you any of that information, because it is all open to you.

(See Berwind exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. Who establishes the price per ton to be paid to the employee?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, just where that is established is in this way: In the first place, the miners' union in a great measure in this country have made the scale uniform throughout the various States, and although we do not work with the union, we take their scale of wages as our basis of operation. That is brought about by the laws of supply and demand. They change. They have not changed now for some years. They have advanced; that is, they have been advanced in the last 10 years very considerably, but there has been no recession in them. Of course, the cost of mining is a very important factor in the markets for coal. That depends on what you can get for your coal in the first place; and in the second place, very largely on the supply of labor. We do not change our labor from day to day, from week to week, from month to month. These changes in the rate of labor come along at intervals of some distance apart. Those are brought about generally by trouble in some district bringing the matter up before all the different managements for their consideration, and they decide whether or not they can pay the wages.

Chairman WALSH. What are the hours of labor in the Berwind White Coal Co. plant?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, as I say, they are largely dependent on the operators themselves. They are paid by the ton. They can work as many hours in the day as they see fit. The thing we try to secure is the men that will work the greatest number of hours. And if a man will not work a certain number of hours we try to find men who will.

Chairman WALSH. What is that minimum?

Mr. BERWIND. We have no minimum fixed that I know.

Chairman WALSH. What is the certain number of hours you think proper for the men to work.

Mr. BERWIND. I think all men should work six or seven hours, and the miner ought to work at least eight hours a day, seven or eight hours. It is about the average day's work in the mining.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have laborers who do not work by the piece?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes. I have been saying the drivers, the dumpers, and the unskilled labor.

Chairman WALSH. What are the working hours of those?

Mr. BERWIND. I think, if I recollect right, their working hours are nine hours. I think so. But I will be more definite if you will just give me a memorandum of what information you want.

(See Berwind exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. I will. We will call upon you for that information definitely. I wish you would describe the living conditions of your employees, whether they own their own homes, whether they rent them, and if they rent them who they rent them from, etc.

Mr. BERWIND. Yes. The living conditions of the miners in our district are very good, and it may be said to be rather better than the average throughout any mining region. The miners very often, in many cases, own their properties, are always at liberty to buy their properties, and the company builds the houses and tries to build them in a way which would be of advantage for the general good of the men in the mining regions. They are charged a minimum rent on a very small percentage, and as a rule these houses are open to them to purchase either by installment or any plan which is mutually satisfactory.

Chairman WALSH. What is the minimum rent and what is the percentage that it is figured upon?

Mr. BERWIND. That is another technical question I would have to ask you to put it in your list.

(See Berwind exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. Could you tell, for instance, how much per room is charged where a house is rented?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I could not do that.

Chairman WALSH. Are the charges uniform for different parts of the country?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, they are where we operate.

Chairman WALSH. I mean where you are personally acquainted with it.

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you operate companies' stores?

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Chairman WALSH. Does any subsidiary company in which you are interested operate companies' stores?

Mr. BERWIND. No. When you say I am interested, I have got some interest in—when we open our properties you will bear in mind that this is a very rough and unpopulated country generally where we operate, and it becomes necessary for a company to start a store or something to facilitate the putting up of their plants; but as soon as they have obtained to a magnitude of any amount those are disposed of, and we exercise no influence on them in any way. The men are absolutely at liberty to buy anywhere or everywhere they want, and nobody is restricted from going in and selling anything they please. They have the fullest access to obtain property and to have their homes and everything else of that kind. We, in fact, only look upon the stores as a convenience for our men, and where we do anything in that regard we exercise our influence to keep the prices down and not advance.

Chairman WALSH. You have no such stores now at any of your properties?

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Chairman WALSH. Or no other company?

Mr. BERWIND. None of those companies.

Chairman WALSH. And no company stores or anything of that sort?

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had any strikes in your industry during the past five years?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; we had a strike in our Westmoreland property some three or four years ago, and we had a temporary holdup, I think, about three years ago in our Cambria County mines, but it was nothing of any importance—nothing of any length.

Chairman WALSH. Are those the only two in the past five years?

Mr. BERWIND. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. You have been present at many meetings, I suppose, of your board of directors where labor policies to be pursued by the corporation have been discussed?

Mr. BERWIND. I was going to say we are together very constantly, because, as I say, the officers are the board of directors, so that you may say my company is constantly at a meeting, and those questions come up.

Chairman WALSH. Would the minutes of your board of directors indicate any established policy on the part of the directors in regard to labor policies?

Mr. BERWIND. No. That is all in our general correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. And information as to conditions, how they were determined, would be as you have already stated?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you decide labor policies in your industry upon the same basis as you decide other financial policies?

Mr. BERWIND. Will you ask that question again?

Chairman WALSH. Do you decide labor policies in your industry the same as you decide financial policies?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, no, no; financial policies are very changeable commodities, you know, and vary from time to time; but labor policy is fixed with us, because it must be. We can not vary a labor policy from day to day. We must have a certain general outline for conducting our business. That is arrived at in the way I explained to you earlier. The bosses plus the managers of the properties—that is, the superintendents—report to the general manager, and the general manager is on the spot, he knows immediately what is going on, and goes immediately and attends to all the difficulties that are involved and settles them on the spot. If there is any change of wage about to take place, that of course comes to us immediately, as officers of the company; and as the officers are the directors, too, of course, then, in that way that question comes up.

Chairman WALSH. At this point, Mr. Berwind, we will take an adjournment until 2.30 this afternoon. Will you please return at that time?

(At 12.30 of this Thursday, January 21, 1915, a recess was taken until 2.30 in the afternoon of the same day at the same place.)

AFTER RECESS—2.30 P. M.

Present as before.

Chairman WALSH. Will the house please come to order, and preserve perfect order; we are about to resume.

TESTIMONY OF MR. EDWARD J. BERWIND—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Are there any corporations, Mr. Berwind, in which you are director—in any of the corporations of which you are a director is there an organization of the employees?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not know whether there are any local organizations among them or not; we never inquire into that at all.

Chairman WALSH. Have there ever been to your knowledge?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; I know there were a great many years ago—they were in the general organizations of labor, you know.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. BERWIND. But not of late years; not for 10 or 12 years or more.

Chairman WALSH. What were the effects of such organizations, in so far as you were informed? Did you form any opinion as to the desirability or undesirability of dealing with employes in organizations?

Mr. BERWIND. No—our experience has taught us that we dealt better with our employes direct.

Chairman WALSH. What is your opinion as to the effect upon the employes well-being? Is he better off organized so that he may deal collectively, or otherwise?

Mr. BERWIND. I can only say that a rigid inquiry into the situation will show that our men—our mining situation in our own properties is considered the best in the State of Pennsylvania. That is my answer to it, and we are not organized.

Chairman WALSH. How as to the general effect, such as the suggestion which you made prior to lunch, for instance, that the standard of wages was fixed by those industries in which there was organization; is that correct?

Mr. BERWIND. The organizations approve of certain rates of wages. Those are generally promulgated and they become the working rates throughout the districts where they are in operation.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever made a study of that condition to determine how it happens that when the union sets a price for mining coal that the organizations in which there are no union mines, or in which they are divided among union or nonunion, always adopt the same price?

Mr. BERWIND. It has been the practice of my company to pay the highest wages paid; that has been its practice, to pay the highest regular wage paid. I can not possibly comment in any other way than that. We are willing to pay the highest wage, but we do not want to be dominated by any outside influence in our business.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose the wage dropped to quite a low level under the competitive conditions you have—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You would be required to drop yours?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir; competition has always a ruling effect in our wages.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be your idea that the fixing of wages by the unions in those industries in which organization does exist would fix the price in all industry?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not say it fixes the price.

Chairman WALSH. In all plants in that industry, I should say?

Mr. BERWIND. It is a potent factor in it. They do not fix it, but the contention raised is a fair wage, and they arrive at a conclusion and that is always satisfactory to us and we pay it.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward allowing representatives of labor unions to visit your employes and carry on their work among them?

Mr. BERWIND. Personally I am opposed to it, for the reason that they stimulate trouble among people who are satisfied, and I do not see why they should be stimulated to trouble.

Chairman WALSH. Does that go all through industry?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not say all industry, but in our industry where we pay the largest wages and the welfare of our men is the best—while we do not oppose it, I do not think it is a good thing to have the advocates of labor come in there to stimulate trouble.

Chairman WALSH. As a result of your experience in industry, Mr. Berwind, do you believe that industrial discontent in America is increasing or decreasing?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I will tell you—industrial discontent increases as to—it is a question of supply and demand. Of course, discontent arises when there is a large amount of idle labor and when there is no place to employ enough of the people, but in times of prosperity I can not say that is exactly the same. In times of prosperity labor knows that it is able to command a higher price and it tries to get it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you observe any movements in either direction, so far as social discontent is concerned, of its increasing or decreasing?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I can not say I have observed any great difference in past years.

Chairman WALSH. You have in your employ coal dockmen, do you, Mr. Berwind?

Mr. BERWIND. No. We have a pier on which we employ pier laborers.

Chairman WALSH. How many employes do you have on that pier?

Mr. BERWIND. I could not tell you off-hand; I should not think over 100 or 125, if that.

Chairman WALSH. How many barge captains have you in the employ of your company?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, roundly, I should say 125 or 150.

Chairman WALSH. What salaries do they receive?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not know what their wages are now.

Chairman WALSH. Is it $50 per month?

Mr. BERWIND. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Do their families live on the boats?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do they have children on the boats?

Mr. BERWIND. I think so; I am not sure of that.

Chairman WALSH. What educational facilities have the children of the barge captains?

Mr. BERWIND. They lay up every night at piers, and they have access to the land a great deal of the time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you received any protests or complaints from the captains of these barges as to the rate of wage paid them?

Mr. BERWIND. Not emanating from the men, but emanating from people outside of the men, we have.

Chairman WALSH. The captains are perfectly satisfied with their rate?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; we found them to be so until these outside agitations came on about a year ago.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a committee of barge captains in the employ of the Berwind-White Coal Co. appointed to take up the matter of increase in their pay, in the spring of 1913?

Mr. BERWIND. I think there was.

Chairman WALSH. What were they being paid?

Mr. BERWIND. I think $45 or $50 a month. We pay two rates of wages. I think the older captains get a little higher wage than the junior ones.

Chairman WALSH. Did they organize to present their demands or requests?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; I think they organized and sent a committee to us.

Chairman WALSH. Did they organize in the form of some particular union?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I don't know that they did.

Chairman WALSH. What is the union to which the barge captains would naturally belong, if they joined an organization, if you know?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not know—I think they have a boatmen's union. That is my own judgment, I am not sure about that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you deal with organizations of your employees, Mr. Berwind, when they make demands?

Mr. BERWIND. We always receive them and hear what they have to say—yes. That is, of our own employees, always.

Chairman WALSH. Who is Mr. Vanwie?

Mr. BERWIND. He is at present in charge of the delivery department of our business.

Chairman WALSH. Would that take in the part of your industry where the barge captains are employed?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; he has that directly under his control.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Vanwie call your attention to a request that had been made upon him by the barge captains, for an increase of pay in the spring of 1913?

Mr. BERWIND. He did not call it to my attention, but called it to the attention of the management of the office, who brought it to my attention.

Chairman WALSH. What action was taken by your company, was the request in writing?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not remember whether it was in writing or not, but I think the result was that we fixed the wage of the captains—all of them—at $50 a month, an increase of some 10 or 12 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. You increased it from $45 to $50 a month?

Mr. BERWIND. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Have you received complaints from your laborers as to the shortage in their pay at different times, Mr. Berwind?

Mr. BERWIND. We have had—we received, I think, on one or two occasions, statements that the people who distributed the money to our employees—that they have retained certain amounts out of that money—they were not paid over, in other words. That is to say, the office delivered the money to the men in charge of the dock, and he did not pass it over, but we could never trace the slightest foundation for that story. In other words, we are not engaged in any enterprise to do men out of their labor or earnings and won't be a party to it, and any man who does it will be discharged; we do not do that sort of business.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of investigation did you make?

Mr. BERWIND. We made a very, very complete investigation, as far as we could possibly make it, and we could not get any trace of any such thing having happened.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of a report was made to the men who made the charge on that?

Mr. BERWIND. We told them simply we knew it could not happen again, and we told them we knew it never had happened.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had strikes in your industry within the past few years?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not think within two years.

Chairman WALSH. In the transportation part of your industry, Mr. Berwind?

Mr. BERWIND. The transportation part?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir. The water transportation?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That was the 1913 incident you spoke of the time that that happened?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is what happened at that time, as I recollect, that that strike occurred?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, yes; they had quite a lot of men that left and we put in new men and the others came back afterwards.

Chairman WALSH. Is this incident you refer to the incident where outsiders intervened?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes. In fact, they abandoned our property, left it floating in the river without giving us notice that they were going; just left the boats there run wild.

Chairman WALSH. Was that after the organization was perfected or was it before?

Mr. BERWIND. No; that was—they did that overnight.

Chairman WALSH. What I was trying to get at was, Mr. Berwind, whether or not they did that before or after the demand was made, before or after the strike?

Mr. BERWIND. I probably think they had formulated—the demand was made in a hurry overnight. They wanted this thing and they were not willing to wait, and if we were not going to do it right away they would stop, and they abandoned everything where it stood. This property was all perishable property, floating in the city of New York in barges and alongside of steamers in the river and in other places.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a collision in that instance between the strikers and the nonunion men?

Mr. BERWIND. I think not. I mean as far as I know. Yes—not a collision between the strikers and nonunion men, but the strikers did interfere with the discharge of the coal, and the new men that were put in there, and did interfere, I think, in every way.

Chairman WALSH. Were there lives lost in the controversy?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I think not. There was some violence, but not of any very great character.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any person who attempted to intervene directly in the matter with you, any person or persons from the outside?

Mr. BERWIND. Not that I recall, except a labor-organization man, I think, came to see us once or twice.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have some questions, Mr. Weinstock, that you would like to ask?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock desires to ask some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Mr. Berwind, from your observation, what advantage, if any, has organization been to labor?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, properly conducted organization is an advantage. The trouble is that our experience has been with organization that it is not always carefully conducted or, as a rule, especially in those industries such as those I am engaged in, which takes in a rather ignorant class of the community, and is not very skilled labor. A great many of them are foreigners, and they are misled as to the situation, and it is very difficult to communicate, so that I am not convinced; I do not think that I can answer anything better than to say that under certain conditions organized labor has had an improving tendency and in other conditions it has produced great harm.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, taking the conditions as we find them, with all the weaknesses and all the fallings and all the shortcomings of human nature—

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). As they are, and then taking the country as a unit, do you think that labor, on the whole, would be better or worse off if organization was wiped out?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I think organization under limitations, I will put it that way, would be of benefit. That is to say, I think—I do not think the entire wiping out of all organizations produces a good effect unless you can produce laws which are more rigid. Now, in my industry, if I could make the laws and enforce them, I would make the most rigid laws for the operator and the employer of labor that could possibly be made, and hold the employee to an equal responsibility. And I would make those laws so that it would be impossible to do anything unfair. There is no doubt about it amongst the employers of labor there are those who take advantage of their position at times. But the labor organization can not correct that. It will do that anyway, whether there are labor organizations or not. But I say that if we could pass mining laws—we have very good mining laws in Pennsylvania, but not so good in West Virginia—if we could pass mining laws of the most rigid character and make offenses criminal where an operator or employer did not treat his men right, as well as holding the men to it, I would be the most cheerful advocate of it, because we, the concerns that try to do well by our men, are punished by the irregularities where they are practiced in other directions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Are we to understand that you would substitute legislation for organization?

Mr. BERWIND. I would suggest certain legislation—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). For organization?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, in my particular industry. Of course, I have not studied the positions of any other industries. I am speaking of our own industry and of the people we have to deal with.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you would substitute legislation that would control and regulate not only the worker but also the employer?

Mr. BERWIND. Protect the worker absolutely and protect the employer and carry it out. That is the point.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you would substitute legislation that would protect the worker against the unfair employer?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And protect the employer against the unfair worker?

Mr. BERWIND. The unfair worker; fair play, in other words.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What legislation, for example, would you suggest along those lines as to protect—

Mr. BERWIND. That is a long story in our business.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). Against the unfair employer?

Mr. BERWIND. The laws must be rigidly enforced. The mining laws in Pennsylvania are in pretty good shape at this time. In West Virginia I think there should be modifications there. But the trouble is not so much in the law as it is in the enforcement.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Do you have in Pennsylvania, for example, the initiative, referendum, and recall?

Mr. BERWIND. I think not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not?

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then what protection has the worker against bad laws being enacted or against the enforcing of good laws that are on the statute books?

Mr. BERWIND. The men who go to the legislature—they are very numerous, the workers, and they look out for their laws, and I think any fair-minded operator would welcome such a law and help to pass it himself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How about the unfair mine operator?

Mr. BERWIND. That is the way to reach them. Certainly all the labor ought to be for it, and certainly all the fair-minded operators ought to be for it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I suppose in Pennsylvania to-day you have some laws on the statute books that are good for the employer and for the worker?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, the laws in Pennsylvania are pretty well carried out; that is, they are well enforced.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Did I understand you to say that they were not being enforced, Mr. Berwind?

Mr. BERWIND. I say—I did not say they were not in Pennsylvania. Pennsylvania laws are not only very good, but they are pretty well enforced, generally enforced, and the exceptions to that are not very great. But in the Virginias it is not so, in Kentucky, and in those newer States where mining is not as well developed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, I should judge from the statements that you have just made that if you were a worker, for example, that you would advocate legislation rather than organization. That is, you would say to your fellow workers, "Let us get the proper legislation on the statute books so that we may be protected and relieved," in place of attempting to organize labor unions?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; I think so. I think you will effect much more in that particular industry.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How could you and I, as individual workers, get such protective laws on the statute books unless we did organize and did it collectively?

Mr. BERWIND. My dear sir, they have just as much access to the legislature as you and I have, and they are very much more numerous, and they are very well represented. They send their representative people there. In fact, their strength is so great that very often they are disposed to lean backward in favor of laws which are not altogether fair to the employer; so the employer has no advantage there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Taking the history of organized labor in this country as a whole, do you think that trades-unionism, for example, has been helpful or harmful to the American wage earner?

Mr. BERWIND. I think that that is a very mixed question. I think, as I told you before, in certain classes of work that organization was helpful. In other classes it is harmful, especially where the classes of people are not such as to be intelligent and understand your languages altogether and are not educated up to a higher standard it is very hard to communicate with them and to make them see what their best interest is. The interest of any employer of labor who wishes to succeed and is successful is to have his employees satisfied. To that end in our particular business we give them—we contribute to all their churches; we pay for all the schoolhouses. I built hospitals. We have given them over to the men to manage; given them right over to them. We provide them with playgrounds and such things as will bring these people into a state of mind where they will be satisfied with the lives they live. They are often in very remote districts at times—not all of them—Pennsylvania not so much as in Virginia, and their opportunities for pleasure are limited, and I think it becomes of every employer of labor to ameliorate their condition as much as possible.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there any of your people that are organized?

Mr. BERWIND. I do not know. We do not recognize—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not deal with them?

Mr. BERWIND (continuing). At all as organizations.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So that you have not entered into any agreement with them?

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You just deal with each individual as a separate unit?

Mr. BERWIND. We deal with our situation, and the thing is taken up with our managers, the different managers, and after they have taken it up and disposed of it it is then brought to our executive committee and we then finally dispose of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In common with the rest of us, Mr. Berwind, you know, of course, know there has been a great deal of industrial unrest in this country?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That has been growing in more recent years?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, you have been an employer on a scale, I take it, and that you have been a student of these problems. I am sure that your opinions will be valued by the commission. What remedial suggestions can you make to the commission along the lines of bringing about a higher degree of industrial peace, and lessening of the underlying causes for unrest, for industrial unrest?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, the efficiency of all organizations is dependent upon the men that are in control of them, where these unions have been guided by hands, conservative leaders who were fair and mean to be fair, I think they have made very considerable progress. Under another form it irritates and antagonizes. I do not think you can lay down any very general rule for that organization, because it must be admitted by them, by the labor unions themselves, they must admit that all of their unions have not been very conservatively managed. Our own experience is what I have told you. We do not recognize the unions. We do not ask any man who comes to work for us whether he belongs to a union; we give him the best we have to give and we expect him to treat us fairly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, in passing, I take it from what you have said, Mr. Berwind, that you believe that the burden and responsibility rests upon the shoulders of organized labor to select as their leaders representative men whose characters are above reproach and who have intelligence—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). I think that would very much help matters.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And if they selected crooks or men that are incompetent or unfair it would lead to trouble?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; that is right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that was not exactly my point. I evidently did not make my meaning clear. I was not referring particularly to your individual industry, but I was putting the question to you as a citizen. We have been appointed by Congress to investigate into the causes underlying unrest, and to make to Congress recommendations for remedial legislation. Now, we can't dig these remedies out of our own inner consciousness. We must invite the aid of employers and workers the country over, men of experience, men of judgment, and men of thought. And we come to you as a commission, so to speak, asking you to help us, asking you to give us the benefit of whatever suggestion you may have to make along these lines.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I do not know that I am competent to pass on the general labor proposition of the country. I would like to do that, and I am perfectly willing to pass on anything with which I have been connected. I do not think the results of labor unions have been happy in our particular industries for the reasons I assigned. And I believe that the best results in all those regions would be obtained in the mining regions in the way that I suggested, that if the mining laws are properly drawn and enforced there is no occasion for complaint from the men. If they are enforced the unscrupulous operator would be checked at once, even more so if I had my way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, summing up, I take it that your position is this—that your answer to my question would be this: That you believe the way to get a higher degree of industrial peace, a way to minimize the underlying causes of unrest, is along the lines of wise and intelligent legislation?

Mr. BERWIND. I think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you are not prepared to suggest what that legislation should be?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; and along the lines of supply and demand and the fixed wage. We always must be—that must be regulated that way. I am speaking of all other regulations outside of the wage.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Berwind, in speaking of the alleged mismanagement of labor organizations, do you think that they are more blamable in that respect than the managers of corporations?

Mr. BERWIND. In a general way, you mean, Mr. Commissioner?

Commissioner LENNON. Yes. I mean in a general way; yes; and its effect upon the citizenship of the United States.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I would say this: That the employers of labor, in many instances—I can not mention the individual ones—but I think there are instances occurring constantly where employers are inconsiderate; no doubt about that; and that exists. On the other hand, I do know that very often labor leaders, whether mistaken or not, stimulate trouble where it is not necessary and where the grievance does not exist. Now, those two things exist on both sides of the fence to a certain extent.

Commissioner LENNON. Is it possible that the viewpoint of the wageworker and the employer or the head of the great corporation in summing up these situations see the thing differently; what you see as being wrong or inconsistent or harmful that the workman sees the opposite—that is, to his benefit?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I think that labor unions are very arbitrary and I do not think that the employers are as arbitrary as labor. I do not.

Commissioner LENNON. You mentioned something with regard to your scale for mining?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner LENNON. You have been in the business, according to your testimony, as I remember, some twenty-odd years or thirty?

Mr. BERWIND. More than that.

Commissioner LENNON. Thirty years. What force has been the most effective force in bettering the condition of miners in the United States during the last 30 years, that of the organized operators or that of the organized miners?

Mr. BERWIND. I think the demand for coal has made the operation better, because the operator could pay more to his employees than he could under other circumstances. As to bettering the conditions, I think the conditions are due to the laws, the improvement of the laws and the enforcement of the laws. I don't think it has been brought about by organization.

Commissioner LENNON. You do not?

Mr. BERWIND. No; not in our industry. I am speaking particularly of our industry, Mr. Commissioner.

Commissioner LENNON. Yes. I live in a country where they mine coal myself; I am not a coal miner, though.

Mr. BERWIND. No.

Commissioner LENNON. The rate that is now paid by you, 60 cents a ton—was not that a rate that was agreed upon by the miners' organizations and the operators?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, I think so; yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Then, so far as the payment of that rate is concerned, the miners' organization were one party to the making of that rate?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I will tell you how much they were. When the rate was advanced we voluntarily advanced that rate and forced the entire mining community to put it in. The fact is that we did it. We put the notices on the drift mouth ourselves that the rate of wages was advanced so much.

Commissioner LENNON. Before the agreement had been made?

Mr. BERWIND. Before there had been any agreement made.

Commissioner LENNON. I wanted to ask you one or two questions regarding children on these boats. What opportunity would those children have for education if they were on shore only of nights?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, Mr. Commissioner, you are getting me on a proposition I have not looked very closely into. The boating proposition is an old one here, and has existed so long and has become a question of custom for these men to live on their boats. It might be better if they would have their families live on shore; I don't know whether it would or not. But we give them the best that can be given them on those boats—give them the best facilities possible and give them constant labor; that is to say, we never lay them off.

Commissioner LENNON. Does that fact of giving them constant labor, does that mitigate any evil that may be perpetrated against the children by depriving them of opportunities of education?

Mr. BERWIND. I have never taken up that proposition. It is a new proposition to me, about the children; I have not thought much on that score.

Commissioner LENNON. I have been asked to submit a question to you, Mr. Berwind, as follows: How would the wages of miners be fixed if there were no unions?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, they would be fixed then by the larger companies, I suppose—the larger concerns that have influence upon the trade of the country would establish the rate of wages which would be followed by others.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman desires to ask you some questions, Mr. Berwind.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Now to get back, Mr. Berwind, to the boating question, I have not heard your former testimony, but I would like to know if you ever have heard of the alleged horrible moral conditions existing according to the evidence of witnesses that came before us last spring and told us of the very bad conditions which they said were existing there.

Mr. BERWIND. I was going to say this, that of course you know that the boatmen—they are made up of a class of people that are a good deal on the wharves and not a very highly cultivated or educated set of people. Now, these people—of course there may be abuses can happen on these boats, because they are hired at so much a day or so much a month—that is, these men are. Now, in different companies they have different sorts of labor to perform. In the anthracite companies they keep them lying up 30 days, 20, 10, 30 days at a place. With us, our boats are moving a great deal more. We keep them constantly going, and therefore we can not tell—I could not tell—you exactly about these irregularities that you speak of.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. No; I meant had you heard of them at all?

Mr. BERWIND. Not on our own boats, I have not. We have had no complaints to us; none whatever.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Thank you, Mr. Berwind.

Chairman WALSH. Just one question in that connection. You say your boats are constantly moving, and the men, women, and children go with them.

Mr. BERWIND. I don't know whether the women and children are on the boats all the time or not; but we have facilities on these boats to take care of their families, and we assume they move about a good deal.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever gone on any of the boats yourself—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). No—

Chairman WALSH (continuing). To look at the living conditions?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, yes; I have seen their cabins.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of your own knowledge whether or not there are men, women, and children on these boats that are constantly moving?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I say I think they live on the boats and probably move from place to place.

Chairman WALSH. What place to what place?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, from the dock, for instance, to the point of delivery.

Chairman WALSH. How far do they run?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, not very far—across the river or perhaps a mile or two. They are all within what are called the ferrying circuit here. They are not sent long distances on our boats.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any plan in your organization for observing the conditions of family life on these boats—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). No.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Or the moral conditions?

Mr. BERWIND. But we keep as much of a survey so that there are no immoralities on the boat, as nearly as we can.

Chairman WALSH. What is that?

Mr. BERWIND. We have superintendents and men all over the harbor to look after the property and see to deliveries, and their duties also are to see after the boats.

Chairman WALSH. Do you give them instructions about looking after the moral conditions on the boats?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, they are given general instructions to see that there are no abuses of any kind, and they correct them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there any laws under which these boats are investigated or policed in any way?

Mr. BERWIND. You mean local laws?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. State laws or city laws?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, they operate under licenses, I think, under the State, and I think they have a right to go aboard and inspect them any time they want to; but I don't know that they are particularly operated under any specific law except that license. They pay so much for the use of the boats.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there any reports made as to the investigations by authorized officials?

Mr. BERWIND. I don't know that any organized reports are made. I don't know—I have never seen any if they have one. You mean to the State, do you?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; to some authorized official.

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For instance, do births and deaths occur on these boats?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I can not answer that from absolute knowledge; but I assume it must be the case if these people live on board.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who would be supposed to have that record?

Mr. BERWIND. That record would be known by the superintendent. Our superintendent would know that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Are there any arrangements whereby medical attendance is provided?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I think not. We have accessible at our pier always a medical person—a medical attendant—who can be reached, and these boats go to the pier every day or two. Remember, these boats are not long away from the pier. They are only gone two or three days, and then from one to another pier in New York, so medical advice is always accessible to these people.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you had any reports as to moral or immoral conditions that might exist?

Mr. BERWIND. No. I just answered that question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, then, just one other question. In the mining industry, if the miners had not been organized in some form or to some extent during the past 30 years, would your companies be paying as high a rate of wages to-day if there had been no organization at all among the miners?

Mr. BERWIND. That is a pretty hard question to answer.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to get after what has been the force that has raised the wages.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I will tell you the force. The scarcity of labor raises wages more than anything else. When there is a great demand for labor and there is not sufficient labor to be had labor sees that it gets all that belongs to it and as much more as it can get.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That must be in an organized capacity, then?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, no; that does not follow. They can command it, because we have been short of labor for the last six or eight years, and, as I stated here a little while ago, you were talking about labor organizations—my concern, which has been unable, with all the diligence possible, to get labor to work more than 19 days a month in the State of Pennsylvania, so that our capital—that same capital would produce—is losing 7 days' time every month because labor had made enough in 19 days to satisfy themselves and because they are paid on the ton basis.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, am I to understand—I do not want to put words in your mouth—but is it your opinion that conditions of employment as to wage and hours would have been as good as they are now, regardless of whether there were organizations or not?

Mr. BERWIND. I think so. I think the law of supply and demand of labor and men—of course, the law of supply and demand makes the necessity for labor, doesn't it? And if that labor is very excessive, of course they do not get as high a wage as if it was short of the amount required. In other words, there has been a shortage of labor, and certainly the labor unions have struggled very hard to keep that shortage going all the time; and that has stimulated the rise in wages in a very high degree—very great degree. That is the reason I make that answer to your statement. I think if we had had a great abundance of labor in this country, more than we required, I have no doubt the wages would have been lower than they are to-day.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If there had been no organization of labor at all?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; it wouldn't make any difference whether you had an organization or had not an organization. I think that would have been the case.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, as to legislation. You say you believe that in all things, except possibly wages, conditions of employment might be legislated on?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, would you feel that it should legislate for a minimum wage?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I did not particularly refer to the question of compensation in that. There are abuses in all businesses, and there are abuses in the mining business which unscrupulous people, whether employers or employees, practice. They are not all confined to the employees, by any means; and, I say, mining laws requiring certain—mining laws for the safety of the men and the operation of the property, and for their protection in every way, and also covering the operator, is the way to force honesty on both sides; but it has got to be enforced. You can not have the law and have it lay a dead letter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You believe in laws for compensation—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). In other words, I believe in absolute fair play.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You believe there should be a law of compensation to provide for men when maimed and injured?

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, that we have. Yes; we believe in that, and it is going in our State.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is not going in Pennsylvania?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, they are getting it. It is in process of being gotten. I believe that law, when it is whipped into proper shape, is all very good. I am not opposed to it at all. It depends on the form they put it in.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Berwind, referring once more to these boats and the conditions of life on the boats, have those conditions existed for a long time, and your company inherited the same method of handling the boats? Has that been going on for years? You did not initiate these methods?

Mr. BERWIND. Not at all. They have been with us ever since we have been in business, and we have had no complaints from the boats except on these two occasions, and they were both stimulated from the outside by men totally dissociated with us, and had nothing to do with us. They came to our men and got them into this state of mind, and these charges of irregularities made by some of our officials who are supposed to have taken something out of the pay envelope which belong to the men were promulgated. Now, that investigation fell down, as I told you.

Commissioner BALLARD. The relation of a man to his family always in seafaring life is a little different from what it is on land.

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, yes; has to be, from necessity.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. On your interpretation of the law of supply and demand, as you just gave it, without restrictions on immigration, would the large employer always be able to depress the market by oversupply?

Mr. BERWIND. I don't think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. He would, in case the supply didn't run out—

Mr. BERWIND (interrupting). Oh, that is quite true if you had such an abundance of labor that everybody was seeking it and there would be competition of labor and it would be cheap; but that thing does not arise here, and has not in my time.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you consulted the figures on arrivals in the past 10 years—immigration?

Mr. BERWIND. Yes; but I know one thing—that there has never been a day in this 10 years, until this war broke out, that we could get the men to man our works.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Not a day?

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). How about 1907?

Mr. BERWIND. 1907 was all right for us. We were just as short that year.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock says he has another question to ask you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Were you present yesterday, Mr. Berwind, when Prof. Hollander testified?

Mr. BERWIND. No; I was not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, in common with yourself, as a trained political economist, he expressed the opinion that legislation could do much, very much, along the lines of establishing a higher degree of industrial opportunity and would make way with some of the causes for industrial unrest and he specifically named these various legislative measures as being remedial in character.

Mr. BERWIND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And I would like to know, from your standpoint as an employer, how far such measures meet with your support. First, the workmen's compensation?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, the workmen's compensation act, properly worked out, I should approve of.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Second, a minimum wage?

Mr. BERWIND. That I do not think—I do not see how you can establish that. That I am doubtful about, because I have never studied that; never thought of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, I might say for your information, Mr. Berwind, that it has been successfully established in Australasia for men and for women, and is being successfully established in this country in several States for women and minors pure and simple.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I have not studied that question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, take the old-age pension act, such an old-age pension act as they have in England or in Germany?

Mr. BERWIND. You mean compensation?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; that is separate and distinct piece of legislation from workmen's compensation. Workmen's compensation deals only with workers who have been injured industrially, and has nothing to do with old age. But, as you doubtless know, in England and in Germany and in some other European countries they have established old-age pensions.

Mr. BERWIND. Oh, I think it is probably a proper thing if it is done on a broad scale. I don't know but that is fair if it is being done reasonably.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next suggestion that was made was sickness insurance, on the ground that the greatest cause for human poverty is sickness, and that society, as a matter of just protection should, from its point of view, establish sickness insurance so as to minimize sickness.

Mr. BERWIND. Well, in our operations we overcome that—for instance, I personally built a hospital which supplies four counties, ours and others than my own, and this was equipped and fitted up and then turned over to the little town which is the headquarters of our people, and they jointly manage it; so we provide for our sick by having our hospitals and looking after them. But whether a general law—I don't know whether that is feasible or not, sir. I couldn't tell you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next suggestion was unemployment insurance?

Mr. BERWIND. Well, I am not prepared to pass on that either.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the next was State labor exchanges to take the place of practically private employment bureaus?

Mr. BERWIND. I have not given those questions any consideration at all. I would like to give them more thought than I can give them here to pass upon them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is all; thank you, Mr. Berwind.

Mr. George W. Perkins.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GEORGE WALBRIDGE PERKINS.

Chairman WALSH. Take a seat, Mr. Perkins, and state your name, please.

Mr. PERKINS. George Walbridge Perkins.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. In New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please?

Mr. PERKINS. I am afraid I will have to get you to name it.

Chairman WALSH. In what corporations are you a director?

Mr. PERKINS. The United States Steel Corporation and the International Harvester Co. are the two industrial ones.

Chairman WALSH. Any railroad and transportation companies?

Mr. PERKINS. The Erie Railroad, the Florida & East Coast Railroad, the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Railroad.

Chairman WALSH. And the International—

Mr. PERKINS. And the International Mercantile Marine. Mr. Chairman, you addressed a letter to me in which you asked me a number of questions and asked me to be prepared to answer them. I have prepared the answer to those and I wonder if I might read that into the record as perhaps a preliminary statement.

Chairman WALSH. I think perhaps it would be very well and might shorten the matter.

Mr. PERKINS. And then I shall be very glad to answer any questions you may ask.

(Mr. Perkins read as follows:)

As to industrial relations in this country, perhaps I can best answer your questions by stating my beliefs, which, briefly, are as follows:

I do not believe that competition is any longer the life of trade. I have long believed that cooperation is the life of trade. I believe this because it is clear that competition, driven to its logical end, gave us the sweatshop, child labor, long hours of labor, insanitary labor conditions, and bred strife and discord between employer and employee. I have long believed that cooperation through large industrial units, properly supervised and regulated by the Federal Government, is the only method of eliminating the abuses from which labor has suffered under the competitive method. I believe in cooperation and organization in industry. I believe in this for both labor and capital; but as in both cases the result places large power in the hands of a few men, I believe that such organizations should be under the strict regulation and control of the Federal Government in order that they may give the public the maximum amount of good and the minimum amount of evil.

I do not believe that the tariff has been any appreciable factor in maintaining our so-called trusts. I believe that improved intercommunication, such as the telephone, the telegraph, steam, and electricity generally, is almost solely responsible for the centralization of power in industry, just as they have been responsible for the centralization of population in cities. I do not believe that it is possible to change this situation, unless the Federal Government is prepared to make it a penal offense to use steam and electricity in industry.

The corporation question and the tariff question are fundamental in our industrial fabric, and until they are properly settled all other questions growing out of them can not be properly settled.

I do not take any stock at all in the idea that our present industrial difficulties are due to absentee ownership. So long as there is the telephone and the telegraph people are going to do business of all kinds and have social relations of all kinds on the absentee basis. Our Federal Government is based on the theory that the President of the United States, in Washington, represents absentee ownership. He gets his information from representatives who come to him from all parts of the country, with information as to conditions in those parts. It can not be otherwise under modern methods of life.

You ask me whether the large resources of endowed foundations constitute a possible menace. In my judgment no concern whatever need be felt on that score, provided the Government will but require that all their transactions, in the minutest detail, be made public once or twice a year. I mean by this a statement showing in detail what their money is invested in, what their income is spent for, and how the fund generally is administered. If in the course of events, under such a system, the money is used for improper purposes, it will not take public opinion long to correct such a condition. I am an absolute believer in the efficiency of public opinion; I believe that nine times out of ten it is not only right but all powerful.

I believe you threw out the suggestion last Sunday evening that the Government should take these foundations over and administer them. This, of course, would mean for them the same kind of efficiency in administration that we have in other branches of the Government, which would be a distinct loss to the people, for I take it that no one questions the high efficiency with which these foundation endowments are being managed any more than any one questions the low order of efficiency with which in many instances the public's money is managed by public servants in this country. The function of Government should not be to manage, but to regulate and control management.

You ask me to what extent stockholders and directors of corporations are responsible for labor conditions. The policy differs so largely in different concerns that a specific answer is impossible. In the corporations with which I have been connected the directors have felt a very real and keen responsibility for these matters, and the actual practices of these companies, year by year for a number of years, show an exhaustive study of these subjects and an intelligent and fair treatment of them, with the result that the relations between capital and labor have constantly improved year by year.

Personally I believe in small boards of directors, that directors should be held strictly responsible for the discharge of their duties, and that they should be required at certain periods to attest to the fact that they have discharged their duties. But I believe in the short ballot in business, just as I believe in the short ballot in politics. I believe in placing power and responsibility with executives and holding them to a strict accountability.

I have long believed that we can never solve the problem of properly compensating labor through the wage system alone. I have for many years believed that we can come much nearer a fair solution by coupling profit sharing with wages. One of the reasons why I believe in large corporations is that, the ownership being impersonal, you can have profit sharing, welfare work, pensions, accident, and benefit plans, which can not so well be had in small units of businesses where the ownership is personal. I have not only preached all the above, but I have practiced it for a number of years.

You ask to what extent industrial warfare, unemployment, poverty, and delinquency are the result of defects and maladjustments of American industry. My answer is that 10 years ago such defects and maladjustments were responsible to quite a considerable extent; but a great change has taken place in this respect in recent years, and it is my deliberate judgment that at the present moment our industrial depression, unemployment, etc., are almost wholly due to the defects and maladjustments of Federal laws and administration. In the enormous railroad and industrial development that followed the War of 1862, improper business methods unquestionably grew up and have been practiced, to the detriment of business, to the detriment of labor, and to the detriment of consumer. There have doubtless been many faults and much maladjustment in the business methods of our country, but this is due to many causes. I personally believe that some of these causes—the most fundamental ones—have not received anything like the sober, serious, earnest thought that should have been given to them long ago by our men in public life. For instance, our laws, both Federal and State, have been drawn, and the attempt has been made to constantly enforce them, on the theory that we were doing business under the same conditions as did our forefathers; whereas our business men, in their actual business lives, have been forced to do business under conditions that have been entirely different from those under which their forefathers did business, or those existing at the time said laws were enacted.

Doing business is not a theory; it is a fact. You have got to do business according to the customs and conditions in vogue among your fellow men on the very day on which you are transacting business. One of the causes of maladjustment has been the maladjustment between actual business conditions confronting business men and our Federal and State laws. I believe that the economics that our political leaders have been trying to force American business men to accept are altogether antiquated and unsound in this day of universal intercommunication of steam, electricity, and the wireless. Germany has long since discarded them and won out commercially. In our struggle to retain them we have been losing out. There could be no more useful inquiry at this moment on the part of our Federal Government than a commission on economics. It is high time that we went to the root of our troubles and stopped scratching around on the surface.

Our political leaders tell us that competition is still the life of trade; that through it we will find a great new freedom. They tell us that cooperation through corporations is a great menace to our people and must be stopped. Germany takes exactly the opposite view. Twenty-five years ago Germany was the land of the small unit in business and her people were leaving the country every year in large numbers, seeking some other land, where they hoped for better industrial conditions. Germany gradually changed her system from the old destructive, competitive system, with small units of business, to the system of large business units, with cooperation on every hand. Her people gradually stopped leaving Germany until, during the two years preceding the outbreak of the war, practically none of her people left their homes, in order to look for better conditions elsewhere.

Is this not a startling contrast? Is it not worthy of deep, sober thought and an exhaustive investigation by our Federal Government? May it not be just possible that our business leaders have been nearer right than our political leaders?

For every ounce of trouble brought about in industry through the selfishness and cupidity of business men, a pound of trouble has been brought about through half-backed laws and muttonhead legislation on the part of our legislators. Our legislators have not even possessed hindsight, and they have been veritable babes in foresight.

How vastly different and better industrial conditions and relations would have been during the past 20 years if at the time of enacting the Sherman law two other laws had been passed. One that would have prevented stock watering and overcapitalization in railroad and industrial organizations, and one that would have required full publicity for railroad and industrial organizations that became interstate and international. Two such laws would have been of the greatest benefit and protection to investor, consumer, and labor; would have prevented much of the serious maladjustment that has existed; and would have permitted trade to go on and expand in conformity with the economics of steam and electricity.

The Sherman law has done nothing whatever to eradicate the evils that have existed in business, and has done much to seriously hinder the industrial development of this country. I can recall scarcely a piece of national legislation that has had as its honest purpose the promotion of business and the protection of investor, labor, and consumer, or that has been based on sound twentieth-century economics and morals.

For many years I have been a strong advocate of Federal regulation of our large industrial units. In this day of almost universal intercommunication, whether we like it or not, business must be done on a large scale, by large companies, with large capital and large bodies of employees, which means absentee ownership and absentee employers.

I have long believed and often publicly said that when an industrial corporation wishes to reach out beyond the State in which it is created, it should be obliged to do so under Federal regulation; that all its affairs should be made public, including its treatment of labor.

I have long believed and often publicly said that the larger an enterprise becomes the more semipublic it becomes, and the more important are its responsibilities to the public generally.

I believe that under Federal regulation and complete publicity large business units, in place of being a detriment to labor or trade, can be of great benefit to both.

Our touchstone should be conduct, not size.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please outline briefly the character of the connection you have with the corporations in which you are interested, Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. They have been very varied. Do you refer particularly to industrial corporations?

Chairman WALSH. I will confine you, if you please, to industrial corporations, beginning with industrial corporations at any rate.

Mr. PERKINS. I have been connected with the harvester company since the very beginning of the company, and became connected with the Steel Corporation a few months after its organization.

Chairman WALSH. How many directors has the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the harvester company has 15, or something like that. I really do not know the exact number, but approximately that number.

Chairman WALSH. Has it an executive committee?

Mr. PERKINS. It has a finance committee.

Chairman WALSH. That is the same thing?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir; it is the same thing.

Chairman WALSH. What is the size of the finance committee?

Mr. PERKINS. Five.

Chairman WALSH. Are they selected from the board of directors?

Mr. PERKINS. They are selected by the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. Are they all directors also?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How many directors has the steel company?

Mr. PERKINS. It has many more, perhaps 35 or something of that sort. It has been a long while since I looked that up, but it has a much larger number.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a member of the executive committee of the International Harvester Co.?

Mr. PERKINS. Of the finance committee.

Chairman WALSH. Has the steel company an executive committee also?

Mr. PERKINS. It has a finance committee, which is both a finance and executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. How many members are there on that committee?

Mr. PERKINS. Nine.

Chairman WALSH. Are they selected from among the directors of the company?

Mr. PERKINS. They are appointed by the board from its own members.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a member of the executive committee of the steel company?

Mr. PERKINS. I am a member of the finance committee, which is the same thing.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you, as a director and member of the executive committee of those corporations, possess concerning the labor conditions in the corporations, beginning first with the harvester company?

Mr. PERKINS. It is almost the same in both companies. That is, the officers are required to report pretty strictly as to general conditions. I might perhaps more properly put it as the policy. The committee fixes the policy and the officers execute it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive reports from the corporations in writing in regard to the condition of labor in the different plants?

Mr. PERKINS. Not often; mostly verbally.

Chairman WALSH. Do you keep minutes of the executive committee?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir; finance committee minutes.

Chairman WALSH. Do the minutes of the finance committee contain any records of action taken with relation to labor conditions during the past five years?

Mr. PERKINS. I doubt if they do very much, because that is pretty much an executive matter and somewhat in the nature of administrative work. The president of the company and the chairman of the board would be present and the matters would be gone over pretty thoroughly. It is not in the nature of a specific action, such as a man would take in buying a piece of land where it is necessary that a record be kept.

Chairman WALSH. So you recall no record in the minute books of the International Harvester Co. of any labor policy or labor action?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I do not recall any, but I do not doubt that we have had some.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been a director of the steel company?

Mr. PERKINS. Eleven or twelve years—since a few months after its organization.

Chairman WALSH. Have they a definite written policy with reference to organized labor in the steel company?

Mr. PERKINS. No definite written policy, but they have a definite policy as to labor in that respect.

Chairman WALSH. Do you personally visit the plants of the corporations and make personal inquiry and observation with regard to the condition of their employees?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What plants of the International Harvester Co. have you visited during the past year?

Mr. PERKINS. I have visited none of them during the past year, but before that I visited them quite frequently, and particularly when the company was organized, in a desire to find out the conditions at that time and what we could do to better them.

Chairman WALSH. When was that?

Mr. PERKINS. My first visit was when the company was first organized—12 years ago.

Chairman WALSH. How many of the plants of the steel company have you visited during the past year?

Mr. PERKINS. I think the last steel plant I visited was at Birmingham, Ala., which was perhaps a little over a year ago.

Chairman WALSH. You say that prior to that time you visited them oftener?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; in the early days we thought—some of us—that there were some changes that should be made, and we wished to see the situation ourselves, and we visited the plants.

Chairman WALSH. Is the labor policy the same in both institutions—the policy of the companies toward labor and its organizations or lack of organization?

Mr. PERKINS. I would not say just the same in the sense that the actions are the same, but I think, practically speaking, it is about the same.

Chairman WALSH. You stated you had a very definite policy in the steel company a few minutes ago?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Please state what that policy is?

Mr. PERKINS. As to labor?

Chairman WALSH. As to labor generally. I would like you to make the statement in the broadest way that comes to your mind.

Mr. PERKINS. Our policy toward organized labor is the policy of the open shop, and our policy generally toward labor has been to interest it as far as we could in ownership in the company and to promote as far as possible what in later years has come to be taken up by the States, such as workmen's compensation and pensions and welfare work and things of that sort.

Chairman WALSH. Did your company as such take any action in the promotion of opposition to such laws so far as State legislatures were concerned?

Mr. PERKINS. Not to my knowledge. We have always been very much in favor of that and have felt much gratified that things we took up years ago have since been taken up by legislatures, which I think should be the case.

Chairman WALSH. In what way did you take up those matters prior to the suggestion of them in the State legislatures?

Mr. PERKINS. We took up—oh, I should say 10 or 11 years ago—in the steel company the question of profit-sharing and took that up in quite an elaborate way. I thought you might be interested in that, and I brought along the circulars which we issued at that time, which I would be glad to file if you wish.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please do so and state as concisely as you can what that plan is.

(Mr. Perkins submitted the following in printed form: Circular letters of the United States Steel Corporation, dated New York, December 31, 1902; January 7, 1910; January 3, 1911; and January 2, 1913. Also pamphlets entitled "Statement as to wages, hours, and other conditions of labor among employees of the United States Steel Corporation and subsidiary companies," April, 1914; and "Report of committee of stockholders of the United States Steel Corporation," dated New York, April 15, 1912.)

Mr. PERKINS. When the steel company was organized individual ownership was, of course, largely eliminated, and those of us who were intrusted with forming an organization to administer the corporation found ourselves confronted with a vary large number of plants at many different points, minus what had been regarded before as the efficiency which comes from individual ownership and the immediate presence on the ground of the individual owners. The problem was, could such a large organization succeed permanently and efficiently under those conditions? After giving it considerable study, we adopted a profit-sharing plan, and in December, 1902, issued a notification of the plan to all the employees and stockholders of the company. That was about 12 years ago, you see. The plan is somewhat complicated, but I will state it as briefly as I can.

Our object was to substitute for a few individual owners a very large number of owners, and we divided the plan into two parts. We said to the organized men everywhere that it took approximately $75,000,000 a year to pay the interest on the corporation's bonds and the dividends on its preferred stock and to take care of replacement; we got up a circular and sent it to the men—I will not give the details, just the principle of it; it stated that we would distribute each year to the organization a certain percentage of any profits made over and above that amount, increasing the amount as the profits increased; that we would distribute that percentage each year, on recommendation by superintendents at the various plants, to those of the organization who had helped earn the money. Under that part of the plan we have distributed something over $20,000,000 during the years that the plan has been in operation. Then, in addition to the foregoing, each year we offer to the men of the organization stock of the company at a price we arbitrarily fix in January, and usually a point or two under the market price at the time we make the offer. We buy the stock and offer it, regardless of the market, usually a little under, so that the men may feel that in the month of January they can always count on buying stock as cheaply from the corporation as they could buy it anywhere else.

Chairman WALSH. How much has been distributed in that way?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know how many shares, but nearly 60,000 men in the mills are now stockholders. For instance, in January of last year something over 27,000 men applied to buy one share of stock apiece. Each year has shown an increase over the previous year.

A man who applies to buy stock pays for it out of his pay envelope monthly, but is only allowed to pay a certain percentage per month, and it takes about three years to pay for the stock.

Then we put a certain sum per share into a fund; for instance, on the 30,000 shares of stock taken in January of last year we agreed to put in a fund each year for five years $3 a share on the whole 30,000 shares. At the end of five years all those who have paid for their stock and still have it receive this fund. It is divided among those who pay for their stock and have it at the end of that time. Of course all of these men get dividends, as in the case of any other stockholder. Our experience has shown that this is a good thing for the men in every way. The men who can only afford to buy one share of stock a year are the laborers, and the greatest thing they can render is their best efforts every day in their work, wherever they may be. It is a very difficult thing to know how to share profits with the laborers based on any ordinary profit-sharing plan, so we feel that to interest him in stock ownership and then arbitrarily distribute profits to him rewards him for the best interest he could give, whatever his job might be.

This has proven very attractive to the men. Each year more and more have subscribed to this plan and become stockholders, and we have had very satisfactory results.

We had a letter a while ago from a man, who was evidently a foreigner, for we could hardly make out his letter, and he wrote to this effect: "I notice some mornings in going to my work that the cook in the superintendent's kitchen takes wood from the company's woodpile. I own two shares of stock in this company, and I want to ask if that is right?" So we had a pretty helpful partner in that man, although he had but two shares of stock.

While I was in Birmingham on my last trip there I was going along looking over the work, and the superintendent said, "Do you see that man working over there?" pointing to a man who looked rather shabby and dirty. And I said, "Yes." The superintendent said, "He delivers oil around the works. He nearly had a fight the other day. He was delivering oil, and a man receiving the oil had a little left in the cup and threw it out on the road. This man said, 'You want to quit that.' The man to whom he spoke said, 'What business is it of yours?' and this man said, 'It is a good deal of my business; I am a stockholder in the company and I don't want any oil wasted.'"

We did not get up our plan from the standpoint of philanthropy, but we got it up because we thought it would be a good thing for the company and the employees, and we have been very well satisfied with the results we have had. I hope I have not been too long in stating the plan.

Chairman WALSH. No; it has been very interesting. Commissioner O'Connell wants to ask a question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is some difference between us, Mr. Perkins, in regard to the stock, given by the steel company to the employees. Has common stock been sold to the employees?

Mr. PERKINS. For the last three or four years. For a number of years we only offered preferred stock; then we had many demands from the men for common stock and offered that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was there not recently some of the common stock sold to employees at a price somewhere around 80?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; not the common stock; the preferred stock has been sold for about that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the result if the stock sold to them falls in price?

Mr. PERKINS. That is perhaps one of the most interesting features of our plan. A man buys a share we will say of common stock at $50 a share. It takes him three or four years to pay for that. While he is paying for it we charge him with a rate of interest on his money equal to the dividend he receives and credit him with the dividends. This fund I spoke of, where we put $3 a share a year into a separate fund, is in addition to the dividend, so that at the end of five years he is sure to receive $15 in addition to his dividend. So if he paid $50 a share for his stock in 1895, in 1900 when he took his stock down, when he had paid for it and it was his, it would have cost him only $35 a share, and as much less than $35 as is represented by his interest in the sum of $3 a share left in the fund by those who did not continue payments and forfeited to the fund their $3 a share. So, I might say, in answer to your question, that the fund is an insurance fund against depreciation in value.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you guarantee to take the stock off his hands at the price he paid for it?

Mr. PERKINS. No; but this fund is a very large insurance against any depreciation. We did do that once. When we put out this profit-sharing plan in 1902, depression came on almost immediately and the market price of the stock became much lower than the price at which we had offered it and at which the men had taken it, and it being a new thing, and some suspicion arising about it, even in the mind of the most moral paper of New York, which had commented on it editorially, we thought we ought to take some action and the finance committee brought the matter to the board, and the result was that a resolution was passed to the effect that if at the end of five years the stock was selling at a price less than the price at which the men took it, the company would protect the men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. One point I want to get clear: The company has sold common stock to its employees?

Mr. PERKINS. It has.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And it does not guarantee to return the price, the company does not guarantee the price paid?

Mr. PERKINS. No; but I want to make it clear that we have a heavy insurance fund which we set aside for the protection of the men. Mr. Commissioner, when I speak of profit sharing, I want to make it very clear that I do not believe in bonus giving or gratuities. I believe in profit sharing through which the man becomes a real partner, whether a partner to the extent of one-dollar or a million dollars. I think every self-respecting man wants to do business on a business basis, and he does not want any gratuity.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Perkins, how many employees are there in the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. PERKINS. From one hundred and sixty thousand to two hundred thousand or odd.

Chairman WALSH. The maximum is what?

Mr. PERKINS. Something around 225,000 or 240,000.

Chairman WALSH. Could you make an approximate classification of them, as to skilled laborers, unskilled laborers, executive men, administrative men, and salesmen?

Mr. PERKINS. No; you would have to get that from the executive department.

Chairman WALSH. Do you include in the amount of stock taken the stock taken by the officers of the corporation.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. By the executive heads?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir; this plan is open to every one from the chairman of the board down to the men doing common labor.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion of the $20,000,000 is or has been taken by the officers of the company?

Mr. PERKINS. A very small part in proportion to the whole, because when we make these offers we allow the workmen—the men who receive $1,200 a year or less, the first chance at purchasing the stock. We offer $25,000 a year and we allow the $1,200 men and under to subscribe first, and the higher-priced men are the last ones allowed to subscribe, so that the low-salaried men get the first choice.

Chairman WALSH. In point of numbers, how is this stock held by unskilled labor?

Mr. PERKINS. The largest percentage of it is held by unskilled laborers.

Chairman WALSH. How much is held by unskilled laborers?

Mr. PERKINS. It would be a rough guess, but from my general touch, I would say there would be by this time probably 25,000 or perhaps more.

Chairman WALSH. Twenty-five thousand?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; but understand that is a guess on my part—simply my feeling from what I know about the organization.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what is the attitude, first, of the International Harvester Co., toward organized labor?

Mr. PERKINS. Toward organized labor? They have the open shop.

Chairman WALSH. Does it favor or oppose collective bargaining?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, the company, as far as I know, never has taken any action. And as far as I know most of the directors are in favor of organized labor; I am.

Chairman WALSH. Now, as to the United States Steel Corporation?

Mr. PERKINS. Practically the same.

Chairman WALSH. Attention was called to a resolution said to have been passed by the board of directors of the Steel Corporation on June 25, 1901; the report from which this is submitted seems to call this the executive committee.

Mr. PERKINS. During the first few months of the existence of the Steel Corporation there was an executive committee and a finance committee.

Chairman WALSH. I see.

Mr. PERKINS. But we found that did not work very well, so the executive committee was discontinued and one committee left, and that has been the administrative committee.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention been called to the resolution passed by the executive committee on June 17, 1901, as follows:

"That we are unalterably opposed to any expansion of union labor, and advise subsidiary companies to take a firm position when these questions come up, and say that they are not going to recognize it; that is, any extension of the unions in mills where they do not now exist; that great care should be used to prevent trouble and that they promptly report and confer with the corporation."

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir, never; if I ever knew that, I don't remember it. I never was a member of the executive committee. But I have called your attention to the fact that the executive committee was done away with.

Chairman WALSH. Your attention was never called, as I take it, to that resolution, if it was passed?

Mr. PERKINS. No. Mr. Chairman, I want to say this: I doubt if the people in our country generally realize the enormous change that has come about in the years that have intervened between that resolution and to-day on such points as that. For instance, you see when that was passed, as you read it, the Steel Corporation was perhaps 5 or 6 months old and men then representing still had the old notions toward labor. It was before the Steel Corporation policy was thought out and formed and put into execution. And I would not be surprised if that were the attitude of the men who were then looking after those questions which was the function of the executive committee. As I think back now and realize how a good many of the men that came into the corporation from the old companies felt toward labor, I can see how they would have felt that way about it; but it does not by any means represent the policy of the corporation.

Chairman WALSH. And the policy of the corporation at the present date?

Mr. PERKINS. Absolutely open shop, without the slightest prejudice one way or the other, I believe, toward the man, whether he is a member of the union or not.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you stated you were in favor of labor organizing?

Mr. PERKINS. I am. I believe labor, as I have said in my paper, should organize. They should have just the same right, I think, as business men should have. And when you come to great labor organizations the administrative power is, of course, placed in the hands of a few men, and I think therefore that they should be under Federal regulation just as the large business concerns should be.

Chairman WALSH. Well, under the present system of organization prior to the nationalization, if it ever comes, of big business, what form do you think the labor organization should take in dealing with the situation?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, there is no form they can take other than their present form until there is Federal regulation.

Chairman WALSH. What is the basis for your opinion, if you please, Mr. Perkins? What are the principles underlying collective bargaining that you believe make it a good business or a social agency or both?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, in the first place, I believe that every man should have the right to so exercise his freedom as to render the most good to the most people. I think collective bargaining comes nearer representing that notion than individual management. I think we have got to have large business units because of our modern methods of intercommunication, and I believe that as the large business unit is more constantly in the limelight, you can get better control of it through publicity and the natural exhibition of its affairs than you can of the small unit. For instance, for the sake of comparison, I think we have very little control of the Chief Executive of this country except as we get it through the searchlight of publicity, and I consider that all powerful for that purpose. The result is we have had very little difficulty with any of our principal Federal officers through their doing anything that was morally wrong, but we have had many instances where Government officials, smaller officials, State officials, have done wrong. The more light you get on a question the more safety you have. I think that in the large corporations another very important advantage of collective bargaining is that you minimize the selfishness and self-interest that always exists in man.

Take the Steel Corporation. As I have just said, we have paid out for this profit sharing over $20,000,000 in a few years. The company is so large and its earnings are so enormous that it would be very difficult for any of us directors, who are stockholders, to figure how such a payment was affecting our individual pocketbooks; whereas you will find that a man who personally owns a concern is very loath to put in a profit-sharing plan, old-age pensions, and such like, because he figures it right back to his pocketbook. Perhaps I can illustrate that by citing an incident which comes to my mind. A man in a large industrial concern came to me four or five years ago and said: "You have got a surprising organization in the harvester company, the men seem very much attached to the company. I am told your profit-sharing and pension plan is what accounts for it. I am thinking of adopting something of the sort, and want to talk with you about it." I told him all about it. He practically owned his business. He came to see me once or twice, but I heard nothing more about it. I met him on the train some time after and asked him what had become of it. He said: "I had to give that up; I could not do it. Why, it would cost me too much."

It came right back to his pocket, and he did not do it. I think, where you have a large aggregate of money and of men in a corporation, you can get a public-service atmosphere established that is much more advantageous to capital and labor than you can in the smaller units of business.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any contracts with labor organizations in any department of either one of your companies?

Mr. PERKINS. They may have; I am not sure about that.

Chairman WALSH. Does it discriminate in any way against men who belong to labor organizations or who advocate that plan of action?

Mr. PERKINS. Not to my knowledge; no, sir; that is not the policy.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any policy in any department or in any field of either one of these industries to keep out what they call outside agitators or organizers of labor unions?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; I have never heard that discussed in either company, and we have practically had no committees wait upon us for several years. We have had a very satisfactory condition as to labor.

Chairman WALSH. In your studies of profit sharing, how many different corporations have you studied, Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I studied a great many prior to 10 years ago. I have not studied many since because, as a matter of fact, speaking from my own knowledge of many of our American corporations that have adopted the profit sharing that we started in the Steel Corporation, the plan seems to have given very good satisfaction. The difficulty with most of the English plans and many of our American plans, has been that the profit sharing is profit sharing in name but far from it in fact. Most of the plans always contained something that tried to gouge the men or some little joker that was not fair to labor.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any department of either one of the two organizations that we have been speaking of where statistics have been kept on the question of profit sharing to cover other experiences?

Mr. PERKINS. In other companies?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. No; we have been too well satisfied with our own. Our own plan has been so vastly different from any other that we have not thought statistics would be of any advantage.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any important changes made in the plan of profit sharing within, say, the past five years?

Mr. PERKINS. Not in principle. There has been some minor adjustment, but nothing to speak of.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed any tendency among companies, which have profit sharing, to give less attention to sanitary work than after the introduction of profit sharing?

Mr. PERKINS. On the contrary, exactly the opposite has been my observation.

Chairman WALSH. Are employees who share in the profits less apt to be critical of insanitary working conditions than the other employees?

Mr. PERKINS. On the contrary—now, may I just take a minute on that?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; surely. Take all the time you wish on any of these questions.

Mr. PERKINS. A very interesting change has occurred in connection with that, namely, the men have come and said that now they had better conditions they would give better work. They used to feel that perhaps it was not proper to make suggestions. The barrier has been broken down and there has been more friendly intercourse. In fact, much that has been done in the way of improved sanitary conditions has been done at the suggestion of the men themselves who pointed out that it was good business to do it.

I remember—perhaps it is a good illustration—that we discussed for a long while in the harvester company the question of a minimum wage for the girls in the factories, and some time ago we adopted a minimum wage. We had had a long experience in the harvester company of constant changing in the twine mills; the girls would come and learn the business and then go somewhere else. We did everything we could to change that condition, but it did not seem to work. Then we introduced the minimum wage and almost immediately found that the percentage of girls remaining was higher, and it was only a short time until the managers came to believe that the extra efficiency obtained on that account more than made up for the increase in the wage we had established. And yet in all the different things that had been up for argument, pro and con, that particular thing had never occurred as a factor.

Chairman WALSH. Was the number of girls who remained steadily much appreciably higher?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate how much higher?

Mr. PERKINS. Why, I don't remember now. It was some little time ago; it was perhaps 10 or 15 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. The logic of that would be that the establishment of the minimum wage in any industry would help to minimize the evils of the casual employment?

Mr. PERKINS. I would not feel competent to say that any industry that adopted it would experience that; but broadly speaking I should think that that would be true.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that it would be feasible for a large corporation such as either one of yours to have a condensed report as to living conditions, labor conditions made to stockholders along with the financial reports?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir; I think that is going to be the next thing that will be required.

Chairman WALSH. Has it ever been done by any corporation that you know of?

Mr. PERKINS. No. We have made condensed reports of that sort in the steel company; in our annual meetings of stockholders, such statements have been made.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it would be feasible to have condensed, clear, logical reports made as to labor conditions, conditions of living of the employees made to the general officers of the company and transmitted regularly with the financial reports to the stockholders?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. One reason why we should have Federal incorporation is that just such reports should be required by the Government regularly.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any laws as to health, safety, comfort, wages, and all of those matters that affect the industry which have been worked out by any corporation and required by it?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. There have been no standards of that kind, no general standards of that kind that you know of?

Mr. PERKINS. No. I think that there has been no scientific standard worked out. I wish very much that we had a department at Washington, a national commission, a bureau of industrial relations that would collect such information and serve to bring the employer and employee together on these very questions; I think it would be greatly to the advantage of capital and labor.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion of men in the furnaces of the steel mills of the corporation at the present time are working 12 hours per day?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, very few; but some are working 12 hours a day; that is, they are not working, but they are on duty. I think that should be very carefully looked into. There is a very great difference between men being on duty and a man doing hard manual labor for 12 hours a day.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion of the employees in the steel mills proper, or what percentage of them are on duty 12 hours per day?

Mr. PERKINS. I could not tell you; a small percentage only, and a constantly decreasing percentage.

Chairman WALSH. Well, it appeared here that perhaps there were 50 per cent in 1912 in that department alone.

Chairman WALSH. Working 12 hours per day.

Mr. PERKINS. That could not be so. I would be glad to send you those figures if you would like to have them.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would, please.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

(Mr. Perkins subsequently submitted the Printed Statement as to Wages, Hours, and Other Conditions of Labor Among Employees of the United States Steel Corporation and Subsidiary Companies, dated April 20, 1914, in which the statement is made that on that date only 22.5 per cent of the employees work 12 hours a day and that further effort is being made to improve conditions.)

Chairman WALSH. How about last month?

Mr. PERKINS. Last month was not quite as large as it has been in some other months.

Chairman WALSH. But the proportion of them to the whole employment in the mill last month that were working 12 hours per day?

Mr. PERKINS. Would you like that prior to March 4, 1912—before and after?

Chairman WALSH. That would be all right. What I was really asking for was last month to compare with the report that we have—the percentage.

I have been asked to ask you a question here: Does the rule on profit sharing state that the bonus is paid on each share of stock during the first five years only to loyal employees?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. The word "loyal" is not used?

Mr. PERKINS. Please do not use that word "bonus"; I have been having much trouble with that during all these years I have been lecturing around the country on profit sharing; it is the most pernicious word that can be used. A bonus is a gift. And these men do not want gifts and the corporation ought not to want to make gifts. A profit-sharing plan is a profit-sharing plan or it is not.

Now, we saying nothing about "royal"; all that is required under our plan is that the men pay for their stock and remain in the employ of the company and have the stock at the end of that time—the five-year period.

Chairman WALSH. The gist of this question, however, is, regardless of its wording, whether or not, in your opinion, the payment of these shares of profit sharing, if that is what you would call it, has a tendency to keep employees from protesting these onerous conditions such as I have enumerated?

Mr. PERKINS. That question has been following me for more than 20 years. The first time I experimented with this principle was when I was with the New York Life Insurance Co., when I organized many years ago there what was known as the Nyllic Association, for which I was indicted after the insurance investigation. I was held up as a horrible example because, through the Nyllic Association, the agents were tied up to the New York Life in such a way that they could not speak and could not live independently. That charge was never, however, made by a single man in the New York Life Insurance Co. It resulted in very great benefit, both to the agents and to the policyholders; in fact, two or three years afterwards, when things had quieted down, the insurance commissioner reported that the plan was of great value to the company.

Now, the same charge has been made from some quarters against this plan in the Steel Corporation, viz, that it is a nefarious device to make a slave of the man; to so bind him to the company that he can not say his soul is his own; but it will be impossible to prove that by the men themselves, and I should say that would be competent evidence.

Chairman WALSH. You have observed no such a tendency?

Mr. PERKINS. Not the slightest. As I said a few minutes ago, quite the opposite. Those men become interested. Let me tell you why we are anxious to have the workmen get their stock and pay for it slowly and then deliver it to them. The man who acquires something quickly, who goes out on the spur of the moment and buys something is naturally not so apt to regard that as highly as something that he has been a long while acquiring. Under our plan the man takes 10 cents a month or 50 cents a month out of his pay envelope and pays for this stock; he knows about it; his wife knows about it; some of the neighbors know about it; and after he has paid from month to month for three or four years and finally is handed that stock certificate he is not going to get rid of it quickly; he is not going right out and part with it.

Chairman WALSH. Not going to do what?

Mr. PERKINS. To part with it. And again, when a man wants to borrow $25 he does not go out and hock his furniture, but he takes his certificate out of his pocket and goes into the bank and borrows the $25 like any business man would and gets it at the same rate of interest. The men come to feel an interest in a certificate bought in that way. They do not part with it unless some unforeseen circumstance comes along.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any corporation, Mr. Perkins, who are working, directly working, through health, Federal Labor Department, and such Government agencies to better working conditions for their employees?

Mr. PERKINS. Do you mean through Government agency?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; through the Government to establish laws having that tendency?

Mr. PERKINS. I did not know there was any Government agency. There are the State agencies; just in the last two or three years State organizations have sprung up; but I do not know whether there has been any work—

Chairman WALSH. By State and Government agencies I mean all sorts of State as well as Government?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I do not. I personally feel that it is a pretty poor industry that will not support all that sort of thing out of itself. I believe that they should come out of the profits of industry, rather than through State provision, such as they have in Europe. I hope we will never have to do it altogether that way.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning. We will have to ask you to return to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. And I also wish to make the announcement that the session will be held in the aldermanic chamber.

(At 4.30 of this Thursday, January 21, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Friday, January 22, 1915, at 10 o'clock in the aldermanic chamber.)

NEW YORK CITY, January 22, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, and Garetson.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will please be in order.

You may resume the stand, please, Mr. Perkins.

TESTIMONY OF MR. GEORGE W. PERKINS—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. I have just one other question, Mr. Perkins, and then some of the commissioners desire to ask you some questions.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, you asked me for some information last evening as to the number of employees, wages, rates, and so on.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. I find I have that now, if you wish it.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. I will be glad if you will furnish that first.

Mr. PERKINS. I will just read this, if you will allow me to, because I believe it covers directly what you asked me yesterday.

Chairman WALSH. Very well.

Mr. PERKINS. This is a report. I remembered, after you asked about written reports, and so on, yesterday, that we had had reports made to the board and stockholders on labor conditions, and so on; and one was made about a year ago, which, when I got home last night, I found among my papers. And I think it covers the points that you asked. Now, this was the report made just about a year ago on the conditions of 1913.

(Mr. Perkins then read as follows:)

"The rate of wages now being paid to our employees is the highest which has been paid in the iron and steel industry since that industry reached anything like its present proportions. There has been no reduction in wages since the advance made on February 1, 1913, which involved an increased expenditure of $12,000,000 a year. During 1913 the average number of employees in the service of the corporation and its subsidiary companies was 228,906. The total salaries and wages paid to such employees was $207,206,176. The average salary or wage per employee per day, exclusive of the general administrative and selling forces, was $2.85; and the average salary or wage per employee per day for all employees, including the general administrative and selling force, was $2.92. It is believed that during 1913, as in previous years, the average wage scale of the corporation was the highest in the industry. This wage scale has been maintained notwithstanding unsatisfactory business conditions and a steadily narrowing margin between prices and cost of production.

"In a communication hertofore addressed to the stockholders, you have been informed that the 12-hour day is confined almost entirely to these departments, such as the blast furnaces and rolling mills, where operations must be continuous throughout the 24 hours, although the hours of labor of the workmen employed in them are intermittent, because of intervals during the operations. The nature of these operations is such that the workmen are actually employed less than two-thirds of the time. Owing to the peculiar conditions controlling these operations, it is the practice in the industry to divide the day into two turns of 12 hours each, and the only change which could be made would be to divide the day into three turns of 8 hours each, but in that case the hours of labor would be so much reduced that remuneration to the workmen would necessarily be diminished. Our experience in eliminating seven-day labor shows that any plan under which the men earn less results in the loss of many of the best workmen, who seek and find employment where such restrictions are not enforced. Through the discontinuance of seven-day labor, upward of 4,000 men left our employment within a very short period of time during 1913 and found employment where they could earn their accustomed seven days' wages per week: notwithstanding this, we have adhered to the six-day schedule.

"From our investigations of the subject, it is believed that the 12-hour day is not physically detrimental to the men, because the work is intermittent, and for the further reason that the introduction of machinery has eliminated most of the arduous physical labor. In fact, those departments in which the 8-hour day prevails are probably more exhausting in their demands upon the men physically than the 12-hour shifts, owing to the continuous nature of the employment. We are not unmindful of the opinion expressed by the Fish committee—that the 12-hour day is detrimental to the social welfare of the men—because of the claim that 12 hours away from work is insufficient for rest and recreation and leisure at their homes with their families, and studies are being made to provide, wherever possible, suitable facilities to enable the workmen to enjoy as much leisure and recreation as the economic conditions of the industry will permit; but these conditions are not under the control of any one employer, however large, or of all the employers in any one industry."

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to emphasize that that difficulty comes from the State laws and regulations and practices in the different States; and if we had a Federal regulation it would be much easier to have hours of labor and that sort of thing enforced.

"Steady employment is a matter of vital importance to the workmen in any industry, and is of even greater benefit to them than shorter hours or higher wages. The welfare of the workmen and of the corporation is dependent upon the prosperity of the iron and steel industry in this country, which in turn depends upon good general business conditions. The general average of prices for iron and steel products, which has prevailed for nearly a year past, has been on a very low level and the margin between selling prices and cost of production is much smaller than has prevailed at any time during the past 15 years, with the exception of a short period in 1911, and affords a low rate of return on the actual value of the capital employed. The large tariff reductions have brought many of our largest markets, into strong competition with foreign iron and steel makers whose employees work 12 hours a day at wages averaging 50 per cent or less of the rates paid in this country. Under all these circumstances it seems clear to the committee that such a radical change as the one suggested can not be made at present. Leaving out of consideration employees engaged on railroad trains, ships, and in general administrative work, only 22.5 per cent of our employees work 12 hours a day; and we are making efforts to further improve conditions."

Mr. PERKINS. You said yesterday you thought it was 50 per cent, and I said I was sure it was not that. These are the figures.

Chairman WALSH. Does that percentage apply to those in the steel mills proper or—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). Yes; this leaves out of consideration the employees engaged on railroad trains and general administrative work—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). What is general administrative work?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, the president of the company, for one. I do not think he confines himself to any hours per day.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and railroads?

Mr. PERKINS. Of course they are all regulated by law.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what else besides administrative work and railroads?

Mr. PERKINS. Ships.

Chairman WALSH. Ships?

Mr. PERKINS. Ships—shipping.

Chairman WALSH. How about the mines?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, including everything except railroad trains, ships, and general administrative work—only 22.5 per cent of the employees work 12 hours a day.

"The voluntary accident relief plan, established by the corporation before workmen's compensation laws had become operative anywhere in this country, has been successfully continued in all those States where it has not been superseded by such statutes. In those States where workmen's compensation laws have been passed our subsidiary companies have accepted such laws and endeavor to cooperate with the State authorities in their successful application.

"The amount paid in 1913 to and for our injured workmen, including expenditures both under our plan and under workmen's compensation laws was $2,564,839. Thus 85 per cent of the total amount expended by reason of work accidents was paid out to the injured men and their families or in taking care of them.

"Our accident-prevention work has reached a high point of efficiency. Nevertheless experience and careful observation suggest improvements from time to time and they are promptly made. Effort is now being directed toward teaching the workmen habits of caution, making watchfulness against dangers to themselves and their fellows a matter of constant attention. It has been necessary to overcome recklessness and disregard of dangers, which had come to be treated as customary risks of the trade, against which the men would not take any precautions; to teach them that taking risks will not be permitted.

"The cost of safety work in 1913 was $660,593.

"Serious accidents per 1,000 employees are now 33½ per cent less than in 1906, when this work was first taken up by the corporation. This means that 2,273 men, who might have been injured under earlier conditions, were saved from serious injury during the year.

"The pension fund has proved so satisfactory that no changes of any moment have been required. The number of pensioners continues to increase with a corresponding increase in expenditure. This plan has been made to work more smoothly in some of its details and in its relation to the accident relief plan. Total number of pensioners December 31, 1913, 2,092; number of pensions granted during 1913, 425; total amount paid in pensions during 1913, $422,815.14; average age at which pensions were granted, 63.73; average service of pensioners (years), 28.82; average pension granted (monthly), $20.85.

"Employees' stock subscription plan: On December 31, 1913, more than 35,026 employees were stockholders under this plan. Their aggregate holdings amounted to more than 146,462 shares of stock. It is impossible to ascertain how many employees, in addition to those yet receiving the special benefits that continue for five years, hold stock upon which these special benefits have ceased to be paid, but it is believed that the numbers would greatly increase the figures here given. The subscriptions for 1914 show that 46,498 employees subscribed for a total of 90,606 shares of stock.

"In sanitation many improvements have been made in the proper investigation and observation of water supply and distribution to the men. All sources of drinking water are analyzed periodically. Great care is taken against possible pollution. The most modern and sanitary methods are used in the proper cooling and distribution of water, including the sanitary drinking fountain. The common drinking cup has been practically eliminated. The investigation of water supplies and the installation of drinking water systems alone cost $130,000 during 1913. The common or roller towel has been abolished. Wash rooms, shower baths, and lockers, started in earlier years, have been extended. During 1913 there were installed 1,193 washbasins, 210 showers, and 15,471 lockers. Two additional swimming pools for general use in the mining towns were built during the year. The cost of providing washing facilities for 1913 was $141,000. The total cost of sanitary work during the year was $564,977.

"In welfare work of a character not covered by the plans already mentioned for benefiting the workmen, our companies have tried many interesting things. They now maintain in the populous districts around their plants 101 children's playgrounds, with an average daily attendance during last summer of 8,688 children. At a number of the plants visiting nurses are available.

"The aggregate expenditures during 1913 for improving conditions among workmen of the United States Steel Corporation were as follows:

Relief for men injured and the families of men killed which is paid in all cases, regardless of legal liability-----	$3, 013, 638. 12
Accident prevention-----	660, 593. 84
Sanitation and welfare work-----	1, 600, 242. 69
Pension fund, which provides support for superannuated employees:
(a) For pension payments-----	422, 815. 14
(b) Additional benefit payments and administration cost-----	43, 379. 54
(c) For the creation of a permanent fund, to be completed in 13 years-----	500, 000. 00
Employees' stock-subscription plan, approximately-----	1, 000, 000. 00
Total expenditures for improving the condition of workmen-----	7, 240, 669. 33

Mr. PERKINS. I think those figures substantially cover your question.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard asked me to suggest if it would be possible to send one of those printed documents to each of the commissioners?

Mr. PERKINS. With pleasure. I would be very glad to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider it necessary to the success—to the permanent success of a large industrial organization, and to the welfare of the people engaged in it, when it becomes highly organized or centralized, that a definite and businesslike survey should be constantly kept, covering labor conditions and the conditions of the working people in the industry, which information should be kept at the constant command and under the notice of the management or directors of the corporation?

Mr. PERKINS. I think that is highly necessary; I would go further than that and say that it should be at the command of all public authorities, and that there ought to be some law requiring the filing of such information, just as there is a law requiring the filing of a financial statement.

Chairman WALSH. From your experience as a director and manager of these large concerns, is it perfectly feasible to do so, if one is willing and desirous to do so?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir; and I think it is far more important than to keep up a constant inspection of the machinery of the plant. If the machinery of a plant is worth inspection and keeping in repair and in proper condition, certainly the men are.

Chairman WALSH. Could reports be made as definitely and in as businesslike way in regard to those conditions as in regard to the other conditions?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. I think the report which I have just read is an illustration of that.

Chairman WALSH. Shortly before adjourning, I was handed a question to ask you, the gist of which is, does the opportunity to share in the profits of your concern, by taking stock, depend upon what might be called the loyalty of the employees to the organization—to their work?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; except possibly if you regard loyalty as interest. The fund which I spoke of yesterday that we contract to put aside, $3 on certain stock and $5 a year on other stock, is dependent on a man going on and paying up in full for his stock and obtaining it at the end of the five years, the idea being to get him to continue with the business. As to using the word "loyalty" in the sense that his freedom of speech or freedom to criticize is affected, there is nothing of that kind involved.

Chairman WALSH. There seemed to be some difference, and it might be well to have this thoroughly understood. The gist of the suggestion was this: You having spoken of the right of the employee in industry to share in its product in this way, and that it was not a benefaction.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I think the kernel of the suggestion was, was it optional on the part of the employer to give that right to the employee only if he considered the employee deserving and loyal?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; when the plan of the corporation was formulated, it was made perfectly clear how each man should share. There was nothing left to discretion. These men buy their stock, and all that is required of them is that they remain in the employ of the company in general good standing.

Chairman WALSH. These further suggestions were made to me this morning, following that inquiry, and you may answer them in your own way. From the circular of 1902, December 31, 1902, signed by yourself, upon this subject, is the following [reads]:

"If he will not sell or part with the stock, but will keep it, and in January of each year, for five years, commencing with January, 1904, will exhibit the certificate to the treasurer of his company, together with a letter from a proper official, to the effect that he has been continuously in the employ of the corporation or of one or the other of its subsidiary companies during the preceding year, and has shown a proper interest in its welfare and progress, he will during each of such five years received checks at the rate of $5 a share a year. For example: If a man buys one share of this stock in January, 1903, he will undertake to pay $82.50 for it. If after paying for it he keeps it for five years he will in each year have received dividends at the rate of 7 per cent on the par value of the stock, and also will have received each year an extra dividend, so to speak, of $5; this latter sum being paid him as special compensation for rendering continuous faithful service to the corporation or to one or another of its subsidiary companies, as shown by the exhibition of his certificate together with a letter from a proper official showing that he has worked to promote the best interest of the company in which he has thus become practically a partner."

Chairman WALSH. That appears in that circular?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And in the same circular is the following [reads]:

"This fund"—I am omitting a portion of it, Mr. Perkins, and if you deem it necessary I will go back and put that in.

Mr. PERKINS. No. I know what that is.

Chairman WALSH. It continues [reading]:

"This fund shall be credited with 5 per cent annual interest, and at the end of the five-year period the total amount thus accumulated will be divided into as many parts as shall be equal to the number of shares then remaining in the hands of men who shall have continued in such employ for the whole five years, and the corporation will then by its own final determination award to each man whom it shall find deserving thereof as many parts of such accumulated fund as shall be equal to the number of shares then held by him under this plan."

Mr. PERKINS. That is right. I devised that plan and drew the circular. It was discussed for a long while and adopted as you have it there. There are two points, I take it, which you wish to bring out?

Chairman WALSH. The question is whether the power is not absolutely in the manager of the company in regard to setting aside this award, to do so at his option, and if he can not withhold this from the employee if he considers him undeserving, and, of course, if he has full power, it is dependent upon his mind vision as to whether the employee is deserving and whether he has been devoted to his work or wandered away from it, or whether complaint has been made that he is an agitator or something like that, or that he is unfit for other reasons.

Mr. PERKINS. There is another point. A man who has his certificate for four or five years—he only gets that allotment of money if he has a certificate to show. The two points we wished to guard against were these: As explained in that circular the first offering was of preferred stock at $82 a share.

Chairman WALSH. Eighty-two dollars and fifty cents.

Mr. PERKINS. That stock was taken by a good many men and they were credited with the 7 per cent dividends at par on the stock and charged 5 per cent interest on the deferred payments. Then we put into the fund each year $5 a share, and at the end of five years the men who still had their stock and were paid up on it were entitled to those five payments on their stock. We did not give the stock to the men, but held it for five years. Everyone knows how many people are always hanging around mills, trying to inveigle the men into doing something that is not to the interest of the men, but to the interest of those who are trying to get them to do it. We knew that if we let the men take their stock and paid this $5 each year the price of the stock at the end of the first year would be $77.50, at the end of the next year $72.50, and at the end of the next year $67.50; and if that stock was then selling at $90 a share there would be some shark who would come around and get the man to sell his stock. That is the reason why that was put in. The reason we put in those careful restrictions as to why he would get this $5 at all was because there was some questions as to whether legally the directors had the right to pay what is practically an extra dividend to a certain group of stockholders. No one outside of the corporation was getting over 7 per cent on the stock, and the question might arise as to why these stockholders were getting an extra dividend of $5 a share on the stock. We could not legally do that—that is, there might have been some question about it, at any rate—without some equivalent, and that equivalent was that the men would remain in the service of the company, and so forth.

I have never known of a case where a man raised the point that we were unjustly depriving him of any of these payments, and I think investigation among the thousands of our men would not disclose such a case. So you understand why we did it was because we were possibly making a class of preferred stockholders in that way.

Chairman WALSH. From the circular of 1909, dated January 5 of that year, signed Richard Trimble, secretary, the following language, this suggestion, is also found—I might omit the first part of it and come down to the second, as follows [reads]: "Has shown a proper interest in the progress and welfare of the company," and also in the circular of 1910, issued in January of that year, also signed by Mr. Trimble, this is made conditional upon the fact that he has shown a proper interest in the welfare and progress of the company. I assume, unless you desire to add to it, that that question is answered the same as the others?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes. And I would like to make the additional answer that we also desire to make these men partners in the company. We want them to feel that they have an ownership advantage from their financial status in life, and that may mean as much to them as a thousand or more shares would to a man more fortunately situated.

Chairman WALSH. Could there be any way devised by which the employees could get the stock without any restrictions of that character? Could they have the legal right to do it under certain circumstances?

Mr. PERKINS. At what time? He has a legal right, of course, at the end of this period.

Chairman WALSH. But I mean to get all the benefits of it, leaving out, without passing upon the question by the employer as to whether he was a deserving man or not; as to whether he had shown a proper interest in the welfare and progress of the company. Would that be possible legally?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, as I say, that question is open to debate. But we did not want to take any chance of having it said a little later on that we could not carry out this arrangement with the men, and being criticized for it; and we tried the best way we could to issue the circular so that under no circumstances could we fail to be able to carry out our promise to the men.

Chairman WALSH. If it was legal, do you think it would be more advisable to do it that way?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it would be if some such arrangement as that could be established. But I do not think the stock ought to be given to the men until it is entirely paid for, and the period of time has expired, because the whole benefit of such a plan is that the men remain stockholders in the company and save their money.

Now, the men who buy the stock and pay 50 cents a month, or $1 a month, or 25 cents a month are prevented from buying a good many knickknacks that are brought to the gates; their subscription prevents their fooling their money away. It enables them to save money and keep it. It is pretty hard for a man working for $3 or $4 a day to go to a savings bank and put in 25 cents a week. It is not very exciting, nor does it encourage him to ever get any money ahead; but under a plan like ours the man sees that if he puts away a few cents a week at the end of five years he has got a very advantageous investment and he is encouraged to go ahead and do it. He sees the plan laid out to help him if he does do it. If he does not do it, and happens to get a little money ahead somebody is likely to come along with a plush chair or something of that sort, and instead of saving money, he will buy it.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Perkins, I want to get to those figures again, of the percentage of 12-hour employees.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand from your figures the men that are working are about 22 per cent?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Outside of the clerical force and the force on the ships and the railroads?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What percentage of the employees of the mills proper, the steel mills, are working on 12 hours?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, as I said yesterday, I would have to get that. I do not think this statement gives that percentage. It is a small percentage, though.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you a copy of the report made by a committee of stockholders?

Mr. PERKINS. There was such a report that was made two years ago or such a matter.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. April 15, 1912.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; it is about three years ago.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. For your information, let me read.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. On page 5 of this report: "The 12-hour day. To ascertain the number of employees of the Steel Corporation working on 12-hour schedules, exclusive of officers, managers, and clerical force, we have examined the records of 175,715 men. Of this number we find 45,248, or 25½ per cent, are at present working 12 hours per day. Generally speaking, this schedule confines itself to the largest proportion in these departments which are more or less continuous, such as the rolling mills, open hearth, blast furnaces, where the percentage working 12 hours varies from 50 to 60 per cent."

Mr. PERKINS. The statement that I just read said that it was in the rolling mills, blast furnaces, and so forth, where it is a continuous industry, and where it is necessary to have either two shifts or three shifts. I think you will find the paper I have just read will cover that.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. At the Homestead mills I find from the figures taken from the Government reports that out of 6,517 employees, 4,456 worked 12 hours, or a percentage of 68.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, you see, you have taken a continuous-industry mill. In another mill where it is not necessary to work continuously you may not find it over 8 per cent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If we were to take away from the steel industry all the things entirely outside of such mills that are spoken of, which are, I take it, where the most laborious work in connection with the steel industry is performed?

Mr. PERKINS. It is in continuous industry.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And the heated work. In round numbers, what percentage of these workmen are on the 12-hour basis?

Mr. PERKINS. I think my paper said about 22 per cent of them are, so that in those mills I should think that it would be perhaps 8 per cent. It is just a guess. It would be very small for the whole way through.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you tell us, please, offhand, Mr. Perkins, what is the volume of shares of stock that from the beginning of this profit-sharing policy has been issued to the workers?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I could not give that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know—

Chairman WALSH. Pardon me, Mr. Weinstock, but Commissioner Garretson requests that you speak a little louder. He says he can not hear you at all. I notice you have a bad cold, but kindly try to do a little better than that. Mr. Garretson says he can not hear you at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you tell us offhand, Mr. Perkins, what proportion the shares held by workers bears to the whole issue of stock?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; I could not say that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Could you approximate it in any way?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I could not. But I am sure the corporation will be very glad to send that to you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think it equals 10 per cent of the whole?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I do not think it is as much as that, because these shares are held by a large number of people in very small amounts. Our idea was not to tempt the men to try to buy too much. We did not want them to feel that they would not have anything to put into the home or to buy other things they want. We just wanted them to feel that they had an interest.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. They were permitted to buy, I suppose, what you might call treasury stock?

Mr. PERKINS. No; there is no treasury stock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. There is no treasury stock?

Mr. PERKINS. We buy the stock in the open market.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you sell to them at cost?

Mr. PERKINS. It is not a question of cost. We buy it at whatever it is in January, and we sell it to them at a point or two below the then market, whatever the market is.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Who bears the loss?

Mr. PERKINS. The corporation, if there is any.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would happen if no stock was available on the market?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not recall that that has ever happened in the Steel Corporation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see.

Mr. PERKINS. I think, perhaps, Mr. Commissioner, I can give you some light on that. A great many people have come to me for advice about profit-sharing plans, because they know I am interested in the work. I have had a great many concerns come back with the question, "How can we use this plan? We have no stock." I presume that is what you are thinking of.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. And that is one of the reasons why I have come to feel that the corporation is much the better form of business for labor, because there is stock. In a business in which there are only half a dozen partners, it is very difficult to get the employee interested; do you see?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes. Now, I gathered from your statement yesterday, Mr. Perkins, that you look upon profit-sharing practically as the missing link between labor and capital?

Mr. PERKINS. Decidedly. I have for many years.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you think that that is the primary remedy for industrial unrest?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir. Let me say, also, that I hope to see the day when a concern doing business outside of any one State must go to Washington and get a charter or license. I consider that when a group of men have a business that they wish to exploit all over the world they are asking for a privilege; they are asking a good many people to intrust money to them for that purpose, and they are asking labor that can not be in touch with the direct head management to trust them, and they are asking the consumer to trust them. I think they ought to realize that theirs is a very great trust in the truest sense of the word, and that they should really want the Federal O. K. on all their acts in return for that privilege.

Now, it seems to me that by getting that privilege they can go on and do a great many things that a smaller concern is unable to do, and that, having organized in this way, the first thing that should be done is to exhibit to the Government the plan of their organization. I think that, first of all, the money for the capital should be paid in dollar for dollar in cash, and then I think a plan should be worked out by which a company would say, we pay the interest on our bonds, then we pay the dividends on our stock—the stock having been paid in as fully as the bonds—and then whatever money we are able to make over and above that shall be divided between the stockholders and the laboring men; that the laboring man is supposed to have earned his wages through having earned the interest on the money that was put in the business. If he earns a surplus above that, such surplus should be shared with him and with the stockholders. I think that is the plan that should be worked out, and I think Federal incorporation should include some such stipulation. In this way the company would have a profit-sharing plan through which every employee could be interested in the company, and the permanency of such a company would be far greater because every single man would be working for its success. It would tend to minimize the friction that exists all the while—that used to in days gone by—in many companies between the employer and the employee. They stand off, glare at each other, and do not work for the same thing. The man with the wage takes the wage and goes home and forgets the business, whereas the manager of the company—the owner of the company—never forgets the business night or day.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the profit sharing is the missing link to minimize industrial unrest, to bring about a more cordial relationship between the worker and the employer, it must then be applicable to the common conditions?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And not confined to the high spots, as it were?

Mr. PERKINS. Quite right.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In the industrial world?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if it is to be generally applied, do you think it can be applied not only to the great corporations but to the smaller enterprises and to the partnerships?

Mr. PERKINS. I do, provided that men will but learn that it is possible to do business in the open. There are a great many men in this country doing business to-day who feel that it is necessary to do it in secret, and that their employees must not know what profit they are making. I believe that feeling is confined more generally to the small firms than it is to the large corporations. I feel that a study of that question by your commission is all important.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well now, further, if profit sharing is the cure, then it must be a system that is not only a sunshine system but also a winter system?

Mr. PERKINS. Absolutely.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That it must stand the test of all conditions?

Mr. PERKINS. Correct.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, admitting that while there is prosperity and while there are profits to the shares that that would tend to bring about a higher feeling of contentment and interest on the part of the worker, what is likely to happen if the opposite takes place? For example, take your own company.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Supposing there were conditions beyond the control of the management, and that you should have several succeeding adverse years when there would be no profits to divide. On the contrary, there might be a deficit. What is likely to be the frame of mind of the worker under those conditions?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I regret to say, Mr. Commissioner, that that is the immediate situation in the Steel Corporation. Conditions beyond the power of the management to control are such this January that, for the first time since the corporation was organized, we have no profits to divide. We, of course, regret this exceedingly. We have notified the men, and, so far as I know, there has been no complaint whatever. The men understand it perfectly, and they understand the reasons why. They are content, because our whole policy from the beginning has been absolutely in the open. We publish annual statements in such detail and form that they know, and always have known, what our full operation was, and all that, and they know that present conditions have not come through mistakes of the management but through causes beyond the control of the management.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do the workers have representation on the board of directors?

Mr. PERKINS. No; but that matter has been considered quite a good deal lately. I believe in it and think it should be done.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if the present unfortunate condition in your company should continue—nobody can guarantee that it will not continue for several succeeding terms or years—is that feeling of contentment and satisfaction that you have pointed out not likely to be replaced by a feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction? And are they not likely to hold the management responsible for lack of dividends and in that way arouse a feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I personally believe in the intelligence of the workmen. I believe absolutely in their fairness, and I think their intelligence as to what is the cause of the present depression in the steel industry and other industries in this country is too great to permit of our being in any danger on that score. They know perfectly well that it is the tariff that has made this situation. They know perfectly well that this country can not continue to prosper under the present tariff and that therefore sooner or later there will be a change in the situation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You hold the tariff responsible for the depression in the steel industry?

Mr. PERKINS. I do; and largely for our general depression—the present tariff bill.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then the remedy would be a protective tariff?

Mr. PERKINS. The remedy would be a tariff on a nonpolitical basis. We must get a tariff that will protect labor. However, I presume that is not a subject for discussion here.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Anything that affects the welfare of labor is in order, I think, here.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Commissioner, I wish you would go into that very seriously. Personally, and quite outside of politics, I can not see—and I have studied it a great deal—how it is possible under our tariff to do business at a fair profit against the labor conditions of Europe. Intercommunication is so complete that you can buy and sell to-day almost by wireless. You can purchase your goods at great distances with great rapidity. We have got to reckon with the fellow of other countries. The competition that we should be preparing to meet is not among ourselves, but from and with the rest of the world.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In that matter, Mr. Perkins, what is the attitude of the employer, first, toward unionism? We have had different employers appear before us here who have looked at unionism from different angles. For example, we have had before us, in Denver, Mr. Welborn, the president of one of the large coal companies of Colorado, and on the question of unionism this was his attitude: He said that, as near as I can recall his language—I am not quoting him verbatim, but I think I recall the sense of what he said—that we have not any objection whatever to labor organizing; it is their right and their privilege, and they are entirely at liberty to do so; but he reserved to himself the right not to recognize and not to deal with them. We had the point of view of another employer who was on the witness stand yesterday, and doubtless you heard him—Mr. Berwind.

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; I heard the latter part of his testimony.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whose opinion was that labor had not profited much by organization; that the betterment of labor must depend much more largely upon legislation than upon organization. In other words, he gave very little credit to organization for having bettered the condition of labor. May I ask, if it is in order, if that is your attitude on the question of organized labor?

Mr. PERKINS. I think that the organization of labor has bettered labor conditions without any question, just as I think the organization of business has, where practiced, bettered the conditions of business. There are two or three things that I think could be done that would help very materially in adjusting and reconciling these conditions in business. For instance, I believe that the business of the country has not been allowed to organize and has been throttled and repulsed and repelled through actions under the Sherman Act, while labor has been allowed to organize and has been given more latitude of organization. This has made the business man and the employer say: "It is not fair to do that, and I will not recognize this other organization because it is allowed to organize and I am not." Now, I think that can be adjusted through the incorporation of labor and through the enactment of law that will permit the legal incorporation of businesses. I think such a course will largely do away with much of the present maladjustment. I think you will find that many men who say offhand that they do not believe in organized labor and will not recognize it, would recognize it if it were given a legal and responsible status.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, from your observations, Mr. Perkins, and your study as a student of the economics of the problem, what do you think would be the condition of the worker in this country if all labor organizations were wiped out?

Mr. PERKINS. Why, I think there would be chaos, just as I think there would be chaos in business if all organization were wiped out. We have come to the period of cooperation. We have got to do business from the standpoint of what is best for society as a whole; and we can only do that by getting together and doing it in groups.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your judgment, then, is that labor, in its own interest, ought to organize?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it should organize, but it should organize legally under proper laws and under proper responsibility, and I think business should organize, and that it is just as important for business to organize and be allowed to organize, under proper laws, in view of its responsibility and duties to the community as a whole.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What should be the attitude of the employer of organized labor?

Mr. PERKINS. I think capital should recognize organized and responsible labor just as labor should recognize organized and responsible capital.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What have you noted to be the weak spots in organized labor?

Mr. PERKINS. The same weak spots that were in organized business up to a few years ago—a tyranny and a disregard for the rights of others; the pursuit of their objective from too selfish a point of view. Business has done the same thing; but I think that during the last four or five years, in both cases, there has been a better understanding, and that employer and employee have been getting together on a better basis. Because of the lack of proper laws and for want of a Federal commission, the National Civic Federation, which some of us have been interested in for a great many years, has done very much to bring about a better understanding. On that board, as you know, there are representatives of labor and representatives of business and finance; and we meet and look at each other and talk things over and find we are not such bad fellows after all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, you found contact wipes out prejudice?

Mr. PERKINS. Exactly. That is right, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that the best way to bring about a better mutual understanding is by getting together?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have been asked to submit this question to you, Mr. Perkins: Does anyone going on a strike in any of your companies lose his right to the share or shares of stock for which he has subscribed, but which are still unpaid for at the time he goes out?

Mr. PERKINS. We have had very little strike trouble; just little incidental disturbances. I have never known of any case where a man has been deprived of his stock for any cause; he can, in any case, take his stock. For instance, if he leaves the company and goes to some competing company, he can take his stock and pay for it, or he can draw the money he has deposited on account of it, with interest; so there is no loss in any event.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Perkins, I would like to know if you believe that without the present tariff bill the business depression would still be here, owing to the European war, or not?

Mr. PERKINS. I believe that if we had a proper tariff our business would be infinitely better than it is. I think, to answer your question almost brutally, that if the present war did not exist and the present tariff was in existence our present industrial condition would be vastly worse than it is, and I think that when the war is over, if this tariff has not been changed by that time, we are going to see conditions very much worse than they are now.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask you.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Perkins, I gather from your testimony that you personally believe in organized labor as it is and also I gather that the Steel Corporation does not treat with organized labor. Would it be possible at the present time for organized labor and organized employers to get together and agree on certain fundamental principles as cardinal principles which each side should always recognize, and would that make it more tasteful to treat with organized labor?

Mr. PERKINS. Now, for one thing, you say you gather that from what I have said. I hardly think you could have gathered that if I have made myself clear. I did not mean to say I believed in the organization of labor as it is; I said I thought organized labor had helped labor; but I also said I felt that labor should be required to incorporate and be under Federal regulation and to be of known responsibility in its negotiations, which is not now the case. I think that with that done labor would find itself able to treat with large business in a way that it is not able to do now. But, of course, if that is done, then business should be allowed to organize, and to do so in the open and by recognition of Federal law.

Now, while labor conditions and labor's relations with capital are not satisfactory, they are much better than they were four or five years ago, but business conditions in a way are very much worse than labor conditions, because the large business or corporation in this country to-day has no idea how it can do business. Let me cite the following as perhaps a striking illustration of what I mean:

We have in this country, as you know, a number of circuit courts. They are the courts next below the Supreme Court. All legal questions are filtered through these courts up to the Supreme Court, and they are known as the different district courts. Only a few weeks ago the court of the ninth district, sitting in St. Paul, interpreted the Sherman law in the suit against the harvester company and said that the harvester company was absolutely all right on all moral questions, and gave us a clean bill of health, but said that because of our size we should be dissolved under the Sherman Act. Five or six weeks later, another court, the court of the third district, sitting in Philadelphia, in deciding the case of the Keystone Watch Co., said that size was no crime; that the Keystone Watch Co. had done a few things that were not right, but had done a great many things that were right, and the court refused the Government's request that it be dissolved. The court said the Government should have asked for an injunction, and not for dissolution. Now, here are two courts of equal power taking absolutely opposite views of the Sherman law. How is it possible for a business man to know what he can do under such conditions? This has been the case for 20 years.

Commissioner BALLARD. But will not those two cases go to the Supreme Court?

Mr. PERKINS. We hope so and believe they are going. But you can imagine the hampering conditions under which business men have had to do business when no one can tell them what the law is.

Now, I believe with Justice Hughes, who, when he was governor here, said, in his famous Youngstown (Ohio) speech that "it should be the function of law to define and punish wrongdoing, but not to throttle business."

Commissioner BALLARD (interrupting). But now, Mr. Perkins, although that has been the case for 20 years—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). I know, but 20 years is a pretty long while to get at business foundations. Until we get conditions straightened out and a clearly defined basis on which business can be done—

Commissioner BALLARD (interrupting). I had in mind, Mr. Perkins, that if labor unions and employees could agree on some fundamental principles, corporations who will not now treat with organized labor would be much more willing to do so.

Mr. PERKINS. I think so, too, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. You have that thought also?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon wishes to ask you a question.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Perkins, how does the labor cost per unit of production of steel rails of this country compare with that of European countries?

Mr. PERKINS. I can not give you any of those technical figures. You will have to get those from an operating man.

Commissioner LENNON. You were speaking about the responsibility of organized labor in the matter of contracts and transacting business with them. Has your experience as a business man shown that the unions in entering upon agreements are less faithful in carrying them out than are the employers?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I don't know that I am qualified to answer that. I think there have been a good many instances of fault on both sides. I think the capitalistic side, on the whole, has been more in error than the laboring side.

Commissioner LENNON. What are the principal nationalities employed in the steel industry—iron and steel industry?

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, I might say, almost all nationalities.

Commissioner LENNON. What was the situation as regards nationality when you began in the industry?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I hardly think there was very much of any difference, but I would not be qualified to give a positive opinion on that.

Commissioner LENNON. When you began were the rollers and the heaters and the other skilled men in the industry as largely foreign born?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I have not been in the operating departments, and I could not answer that with enough accuracy to be confident of my opinion.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all; thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock says he has one more question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just one more question, Mr. Perkins. You made the statement that you would be in favor of recognizing organized labor if it was properly constituted, if it was incorporated; and I take it the thought in your mind there was that being unincorporated there is a lack of responsibility and that the tendency therefore would be for contract breaking on the part of the workers, and that it is not worth while to do business with contract breakers. Well, now, I am frank to confess that I was in the same frame of mind that you are now when we first began these investigations. I find that there have been contracts on the part of labor in the various industries, but I have also become satisfied from the education that I have received during the past year or more, that there are very large bodies of organized labor who look upon their contracts as sacred. Take the railroad men, for example—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). Take the glass-blowers' industry, where we had a representative of the employers' association testify that they had been dealing with organized labor for 25 years and during all that time there had been no strikes; and that the relationship had been so satisfactory that when disputes arose, they themselves selected as the arbitrator the president of the union, and accepted his decision, because they had always found him fair and reasonable. Now, that would indicate, then, that while there are contract breakers among the unions, the great body of unions more and more are learning to respect their contracts and treat them as sacred, and that they keenly appreciate the moral value of an agreement. Do you not think with the tendency upward in that direction, the time has arrived when the employers can afford to take a chance on that?

Mr. PERKINS. I agree with a very large part of what you say, and it is my experience that that is the tendency of labor organizations, and very markedly so. But I do not think that is the point. There is, above everything else in this country, among all of us, a desire for fair play, a quick response to the question, Is this fair or is it unfair? And I think the big difference between the employer of labor and labor is the feeling on the part of the employer that he can not get fair treatment from his Government; that his Government is more inclined to give labor fair treatment, more inclined to recognize labor and its right to organize than it is to recognize that principle in business; and until you do something for business to iron that out you will not get the proper atmosphere that will enable them to get together. In other words, what is good for the one ought to be good for the other. If the principle of organization is a proper one to recognize for labor, it is a proper principle to recognize for business. But it carries great power with it. It ought to be accountable to somebody. Mr. Gompers and I sit at the Civic Federation together when a great many of these questions come up. He carries vast responsibilities for the great work he is doing, and Judge Gary, on the other side, also carries vast responsibilities. Those men have been pioneers in the work they are doing. But as they are succeeded, one after another, some man will come along some time with perhaps not the same ideals that those men have. Now, it ought not to go, like kissing, by favor; there ought to be a regular way of doing it that will be recognized under our laws.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a few questions, please.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Perkins, if profit sharing is to constitute the missing link between the employer and the employee—

Chairman WALSH. Excuse me just a moment. Here is a note that the sergeant at arms has for Mr. Perkins that he may consider.

Mr. PERKINS. As I stated last night, I am due before the board of estimates to-day, and the secretary is sending to know how soon I can be there.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson says that he can conclude in five minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If profit sharing is to be the missing link between labor and capital and to furnish the means for minimizing industrial unrest, how are you going to apply it to the army of occasional laborers—I am using "occasional" in the sense of the employee who works one week for one employer and another week for another; and probably serves 20 or even 100 employers during the year? Because there is an army of such men.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, Mr. Garretson, it is perfectly outrageous that there should ever be such a condition as that in our country.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But there is.

Mr. PERKINS. But we have got to stop that. Anyone approaching this country in an airship and looking down on it and seeing our great fertile fields and rich mines and the comparatively small population, and then seeing the number of unemployed—the number of people who are not employed as they should be—would think this was a lunatic asylum.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You can not get any argument out of me on that.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, what is the fundamental trouble? The fundamental trouble is that we are not keeping abreast of the economics of the age. Our Government officials are trying to force us back to doing business in a way that is more or less destructive. Now, there is nothing more important to a laboring man than permanent employment. First of all he has got to have employment. Then he wants it at the best wage, with short hours and all that—but first he has got to have his employment. But while we make our tariff as we do make it, purely on a political basis, and change it back and forth, and while we continue to make our laws so that the business man can not tell how he is going to do business, you are going to have unemployment. The great thing I hope from this commission is that you will be able to throw some light on that subject. We ought not to have unemployment in this country, and I firmly believe that if business is allowed a definite program of organization and our tariff is taken out of politics and made from the standpoint of the protection of labor, there would be but a very small amount, if any, of unemployed labor.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not dealing with unemployment at all, but the changing employee—the man who labors steadily, but for separate employers—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). That man would not change. If you were to look through our Steel Corporation records you would find that there is a very much larger number of people in permanent employment, because of their interest in the business. I think that any man who has an interest in the business will not be so apt to want to change.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But isn't this work to be done for the man who works various days?

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). They ought to have an incentive to stay. Of course, we have got to have a certain percentage of unemployment most of the time—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Oh, yes; unemployment, yes; but I am not dealing with unemployment at all, but the man that works 20 days or 25 days in the month, but he works it for 25 different people. How can you bring him in on a profit-sharing basis?

Mr. PERKINS. I presume there will be a small percentage that you can not apply that to; but if we had organized industry you would be surprised to find how small that would be.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, is there any country on earth—any civilized country—that has been able to do away with this class of labor?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, Germany has come mighty near it in the last four or five years.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Oh, she's got them all employed now.

Mr. PERKINS. Oh, I mean before the war; if you look it up you will find that she had them pretty well employed before the war.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your system now—I want to draw the line as between your profit-sharing plans as in effect in the institutions you represent and the -social features; and I am only dealing, for the moment, with the profit-sharing plans. When there are forfeitures on the part of a man it creates a fund that is divisible between the others who are parties to the scheme?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And if for any reason a man develops anything that causes his discharge, through disloyalty or any other cause of whatever nature, he is put out, and the profits become a portion of the profits of those who are not guilty of the offenses charged against him. Is that not a standing incentive to treachery against the man?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; if you were correct in your statement; but you are absolutely incorrect.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, I ask you if that was the case?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; it is not the case.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is not?

Mr. PERKINS. No, sir; it is not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am glad it is not. Do you regard the purchase of stocks by your men as a guarantee against those men asserting—well, according to the standpoint it would probably change the wording—either rights or privileges that they would otherwise assert?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It has no such effect?

Mr. PERKINS. Not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You use the phrase "responsibility of unions"—that it did not exist. Do you mean that only in a purely legal sense or the sense of fact?

Mr. PERKINS. In a legal sense and in some cases in fact; but in what might be called almost an indefinite sense—in a feeling that the difference is very great between the status before the Government—not before the law, because there is no law on the subject yet, but before the the Government—the status of labor and the status of business.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Isn't it rather—well, at least entertaining—to find when for 50 centuries the master has made the law, that when within the century the man has asserted his right to a voice in the enactment of laws, the question of fairness is so often raised.

Mr. PERKINS. I don't know that I quite comprehend your expression. I, for one, believe that the evolution of the world is solving this problem. I wish it might be solved faster, but at the beginning the status was owner and slave, way back.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Go far enough back, yes; or come far enough forward.

Mr. PERKINS. Owner and slave; then, it was master and man; then, it was employer and employee; the three periods are pretty well expressed by these terms. Now, I would like to see the next period one of copartnership. I would like to see the man who works as nearly as possible interested in the ownership of the industry.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If one had his turn so many centuries, why not give the other a little period?

Mr. PERKINS. You can't have any argument with me about that. I believe in it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The term yesterday was used in making a criticism of men lobbying for the passage of laws for employees—you used the phrase that it was unfortunate when the employer felt that his Government was not fair to him?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How long is it since there could have been even a shadow of a claim that his Government was unfair to the employer?

Mr. PERKINS. Ever since the Sherman law was passed.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, 30 years against 3,000?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I don't quite see the point you are making. I absolutely agree with you that a man is a man, whether he is working in the mills or whether he is presiding over the finances of the country, or President of the United States, and I believe that one great influence that has been bringing all men to a more intelligent understanding of the questions is the enormous amount of educational work that has been done in the world; that is preeminently so in our country, and it is the most fruitful sign possible. I believe, with President Wilson, that we ought to approach the question of capital and labor in a get-together spirit; and I think what he has said for several months about the Government's relation to business and labor and all that is eminently wise; and I think that you, as a commission with that backing, are entering, with a great promise, upon a solution of this question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you are absolutely a believer, as I am, that one side should not furnish all the "get-together"?

Mr. PERKINS. Absolutely not. I want it distinctly understood, and I think I have already stated it, that, broadly speaking, I think capital has been more to blame than labor in the past.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, could it be otherwise, when they had it at their disposal to be blameful in a very long period during which they dominated the situation absolutely?

Mr. PERKINS. I said it started a long period ago, with the idea of owner and slave.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes. Now, going back to the question of responsibility of unions. Have you ever heard of an instance where the locomotive engineers violated an agreement which it held with employers?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I have not been in that line of business. You ask me if I ever heard of an instance; I say no; but that might not be right.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What I want to lead up to is, why, if it is recognized as a responsible organization, would the United States Steel Corporation refuse to deal with it and discharge men who had joined it for joining?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, Mr. Commissioner, I want again to make myself clear. I do not think it is so much a question of whether they have violated or whether they have not, or whether labor has violated or whether it has not. The point is that, fundamentally, it is not fair, and broadly speaking, it is not right to have such large representations of labor in groups and such large representations of capital in great business without responsibility to some higher power. That is my position.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you believe in the organization of men—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). Absolutely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And the recognition of unions, provided a condition is brought about that does not exist?

Mr. PERKINS. No; but that the condition now existing be worked out to a better condition. I think we have done as well as we could without laws and regulation, but I think that we must have a higher condition, just as you say; this thing has been going on for 3,000 years, now let's work it out to a better conclusion than we have ever had.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And if every employer took your attitude, there would be no union recognized?

Mr. PERKINS. Absolutely. You have absolutely misinterpreted everything I said whether willfully or otherwise I don't know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The fact is you refused to deal with that organization?

Mr. PERKINS. No; not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact that those men were discharged for that very reason?

Mr. PERKINS. I do not know what you refer to.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am referring to the strike in the Pittsburgh switching district where the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers and the Brotherhood of Railway Trainmen had men discharged from the employ of the United States Steel Corporation by reason of the objection that it was an open shop.

Mr. PERKINS. Which is that?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I say, both of those organizations.

Mr. PERKINS. I don't know what you mean.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, a certain number of organizations are open-shop organizations, are they not?

Mr. PERKINS. I don't know about that; I am not informed on that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, you used the word about the social devices that are in effect. Where the payment of pensions—am I right in assuming that the payment of pensions and sick benefits, and all other forms of insurance that you pay your men, is founded upon tenure of service?

Mr. PERKINS. Pensions are.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about the others?

Mr. PERKINS. They are not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You don't pay any benefits after a man leaves your service?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, then, it comes as a pension.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You pay sick benefits?

Mr. PERKINS. Not if he goes to work for somebody else.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Certainly. It is all based on tenure of service?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Pensions, of course, is the best example?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But how, except under Government—under a nationalized plan—could this army that I refer to of men who work for a series of employers, through no fault of their own, ever receive any pension, except under nationalization? How could it be done by the private employer?

Mr. PERKINS. Those cases can not. But that is what they are taking up now in State compensation—

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am not speaking of compensation now, but—

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I mean the whole thing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Should it not all be nationalized to make it effective?

Mr. PERKINS. I believe that industry should bear those burdens as far as possible. We may have to adopt some plan—of course, this question has not yet been worked out, but the industry should contribute a certain part and the State the balance for the very men you speak of. But there is doubt in my mind whether some of the European plans by which the Government does it all, without any contribution from the industry, is as wise as a plan by which certain lines of industry at least contribute to that end.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Haven't those European Governments that have dealt with the proposition—and most of them—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have they not proceeded upon the basis that it was improper for the private employer to do it because it constituted a certain form of duress?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I didn't know that they did.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, that is a fact.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I doubt if that is so. They may have done it, but I doubt if they have done it on that basis, and I don't believe that is correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You have never approached the men themselves from the angle I have, possibly, Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Well, I have approached a good many.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. If I may ask you two questions which may be answered very quickly, Mr. Perkins, that have been submitted by a gentleman interested in the hearing. Would good unions—that is, I suppose by that term he means desirable unions, the kind that you have spoken of—

Mr. PERKINS (interrupting). Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have good unions any reason to fear civil responsibility? I suppose he means by incorporation and responsibility of that character in the civil courts?

Mr. PERKINS. Would you just read that again?

Chairman WALSH. Would good unions have any reason to fear civil responsibility?

Mr. PERKINS. I should not think they would. I was thinking when you first read it of the great question of good and bad unions and good and bad trusts.

Chairman WALSH. Would not such responsibility tend to raise the standard of unions and to make bad unions better?

Mr. PERKINS. I think it would.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you. That is all, Mr. Perkins. We are obliged to you for your attendance.

Mr. Henry Ford.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Perkins, just one question: Are you aware of the fact that some unions have been incorporated?

Mr. PERKINS. No; I don't know that I am.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For your information I will say to you that my own organization was incorporated for 10 years.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it now?

Commissioner GARRETSON. No; it simply surrendered its corporate form because it worked a hardship on us for insurance matters.

Mr. PERKINS. That could be changed now. That probably would not be true now.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes; under the laws of that State.

Mr. PERKINS. Well, that is certainly better than 3,000 years ago, anyway.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Henry Ford.

TESTIMONY OF MR. HENRY FORD.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please?

Mr. FORD. Henry Ford.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside?

Mr. FORD. Detroit.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you resided in Detroit?

Mr. FORD. Twenty-five years.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please?

Mr. FORD. Manufacturer.

Chairman WALSH. The commission submitted certain questions to you, as to which you have made written answers, and you have requested me to read these questions and answers, and to have them read preliminary to the questions which the commission will ask you to answer?

Mr. FORD. If you please.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. I will read this:

DETROIT, MICH.

I will endeavor to answer briefly the written questions submitted to me by the commission in their order.

Question No. 1. Give a description of the profit-sharing plan of the Ford Motor Co., and then state the purposes aimed at in establishing a profit-sharing plan; its results on efficiency of men; its results on the character and steadiness of men; its results as regards citizenship and general interest in the advance of the community.

Answer. Every man working for the Ford Motor Co. is first entitled to his just wages as such, depending upon efficiency and responsibility, which wages are about 15 per cent above the usual market wage for the service in question, and then everyone who is eligible is entitled to a certain profit. The minimum daily income under the plan, wages plus profit, is $5. The hourly profit-sharing rate, added to wages, is based on the wage rate, and so arranged or graduated as to give those receiving the lowest hourly rate the largest proportion of profits. For example, a man receiving 34 cents per hour has a profit rate of 28½ cents per hour in addition, and a total daily income of $5, whereas men receiving 54 cents per hour wages have a profit-sharing rate of 21 cents per hour, with a total daily income of $6. The working day is 8 hours instead of 9, as before; the week 48 hours.

Wages and profits are paid every two weeks in currency.

Those qualified for participation in profits are of three classes: (1) Married men living with and taking good care of their families; (2) single men over 22 years of age who are of proven, thrifty habits; (3) young men under 22 years of age and women the sole support of some next of kin.

The person must be in the employ of the company six months before he can participate in profits, which rule serves to deter men from leaving other steady jobs.

A record of facts is made in the case of each individual, and every employee qualifying under the above, able to use the money constructively for the good of self, dependents, and the community in general is awarded a share according to schedule.

Wages are paid according to skill, and skill subdivided into degrees of skill. The company has but eight rates of pay operative in the shop or on its hourly wage pay roll. A separate rate of wage applies to each skill rating. An employee may know the reward of his increased efficiency and development and of all the possibilities and probabilities for advancement with the company at the time of entering its employ.

The company maintains a corps of 40 men, good judges of human nature, who explain opportunity, teach American ways and customs, English language, duties of citizenship, who counsel and help the unsophisticated employees to obtain and maintain comfortable, congenial, and sanitary living conditions, and who also exercise the necessary vigilance to prevent, as far as possible, human frailty from falling into habits or practices detrimental to substantial progress in life. The whole effort of this corps is to point men to life and make them discontented with a mere living.

You ask our purpose in establishing this plan. Our first purpose was substantial justice to our coworkers, without whom we could have accomplished nothing. We had had great success, and, in fact, we desired no greater success from a mere financial point of view. For a long period we had been contemplating some plan, but every one suggested seemed fraught with objections. We finally decided to go forward with this one and feel our way along to a position of substantial justice. We do not regard it as in any sense a gift or a charity, but only due reward for service.

Prior to the inauguration of the Ford Motor Co.'s profit-sharing plan the company was entirely satisfied with the individual and collective output and efficiency of its men. There was no thought of betterment in this direction, no measure of economic benefit made in anticipation, no desire for publicity or other gain to the company incorporated into the plan or considered with reference to it. The object was simply to better the financial and moral status of the men.

No man is influenced to change his mode of living, his habits, or character in order to qualify under the profit-sharing plan if he does not willingly so elect.

Whereas at start 60 per cent of the men were receiving a share of the profits, six months later 75 per cent of the men were enrolled as participants, and at the end of the first year 87½ per cent of the entire force were participating, representing practically all of the men past 22 years of age with very few exceptions.

The increased efficiency of the men under the plan has been from 15 to 20 per cent with reference to work produced, which is further emphasized when you consider that the improvement was made in an eight-hour day versus the comparison in a nine-hour day.

Daily absentees from work have decreased from a total equivalent to 10 per cent of the working force, under old conditions, to three-tenths of 1 per cent under the profit-sharing plan.

The number of men leaving the employ of the company since the profit-sharing plan started in comparison with the year previous is shown below:

	Discharged.	Quitting.	5-day men.
March, 1913.....	1,276	870	5,156
March, 1914.....	166	115	166

Five-day men are the floaters, so-called, who leave without explanation or notice.

Fear and worry in the struggle for livelihood to properly provide for home and dependents with the dread of what might happen if the job is lost have practically been eliminated.

No man is discharged from the service of the company until he has been proven utterly unfit from every standpoint. If he fails to make good in one department the foreman of that department sends him to the clearing house, and he is given repeated trials, if necessary, until he makes good, or it is proven that he does not want to succeed. A recent ruling of the company requires the approval of one of four men before the man can be finally dismissed. Of the four, two are, respectively, the president and the vice president of the company.

Bank accounts show an increase during the first six months of 130 per cent; life insurance carried, 86 per cent; value of homes owned outright, 87 per cent; value of lots owned outright, 86 per cent. This remarkable showing refers only to such employees as are on the profit-sharing basis.

Careful medical survey reveals a substantial improvement in physical attributes.

Upward of 200 men have been influenced and helped to obtain citizenship in the United States.

A carefully prepared map of the city shows that 8,000 families have changed their place of residence since the plan was started, and a study of the districts into which they have moved and from which they came shows that the migration has been from poor and squalid to healthy, sanitary quarters, with environment conducive to health, happiness, and comfort.

Results on character and steadiness of men may perhaps be best measured and more thoroughly understood by agencies outside the company. Police justices say whereas Ford employees, recognized by their badges, were almost daily seen in the prisoners' dock up to a year ago, since January, 1914, they have been noticeably absent and are rarely among the unfortunates brought to justice. From one of the largest Polish Catholic parishes in the city, the father writes:

"The work of the Ford Motor Co. has been of tremendous benefit to my people. Heavy drinking is characteristic of the Poles, I know. Your work, however, has resulted in sobriety now being the rule rather than the exception in my parish."

The company has organized a school wherein the non-English-speaking are taught the rudiments of the English language—to speak, to read, and to write it. At start, teachers were employed who had made school work their vocation. After about three months' operation the school grew from about 200 members to approximately 1,100, and the paid teachers were replaced by volunteers from the Ford Motor Co., some of whom had had experience in school work, but the most of them foremen, subforemen, and men from the rank, and are simply enthusiastic individuals eager to help along a good work and better the condition of their brother men, both as an expression of gratitude for what their employer has done for them and to seize an opportunity for self-encouragement which the work offered.

Question No. 2. What reasons did the Ford Co. have for assuming so large a measure of responsibility, not only for the labor conditions in their plants, but also for the social and moral surroundings of their employees?

Answer. The knowledge that market rates of wages were not sufficient for men to properly care for self and dependents and that the environment in which its employees were thus made to live, gave rise to mental anxiety and a physical condition that made it utterly impossible for the human agency to deliver all of the effort that it was capable of in fulfilling the best and larger functions for which it was designed at work, at home, and in the community. The company also had the courage to seize an opportunity for breaking away from old-time habits and customs that were possibly applicable to other periods. The institution of a new order, treating men like men in man fashion has brought out much of human salvage and proven that barriers between employers and employees thought to exist and often do exist can be largely removed.

A large proportion of our employees were foreign born, many of them recent arrivals, not used to American habits and surroundings. Very few, if any, resented our guiding them into better conditions, into habits of thrift, saving, sobriety, and improved moral and social conditions. No coercion is laid upon any employee, but if he is not living a sober life, or is neglecting his duties as a father or husband, and he persists in such course he can not be an associate in our business.

Question No. 3. What has experience shown regarding the extent to which the character and social conditions of employees are the result of the conditions under which they are employed, including wages, hours of labor, general physical surroundings, and treatment by officials, superintendents, and foremen?

Answer. No man can bring up a family and hope to own a home on the ordinary rates of wages.

I do not think that any man can do good work mentally and physically for more than eight hours per day.

In my judgment the other factors are not so very important.

Question No. 4. Is it desirable for a corporation to assume so large a measure of control of employees as the Ford Co. has done?

Answer. We do not undertake to say what corporations should do in general, but if employers of labor—we mean the men themselves at the head of these enterprises—have a genuine, sincere, and active interest in the improvement of the conditions of labor and the heartfelt, personal interest in the welfare of their employees, no conditions that are irksome or distasteful will be laid upon the men.

Theoretically some persons may argue that we have no right to inquire how a man lives at home, so long as he does his work at the factory; but we are talking of conditions, not of theories. Our experience leads us to conclude, beyond doubt, that the interest taken in employees as to their individual welfare is most desirable from every standpoint, not only that of the employee and his family, but of the business itself.

The ever-increasing interest developed in our plan by other employers of labor and the individual expressions of the men themselves, which we have taken great pains to learn from disinterested sources, further prove the correctness of our views.

Question No. 5. To what extent would it be desirable, in addition to giving employees a share of the profits in a corporation, to give them also an insight into the operation of the company and a voice in the determination of working conditions?

Answer. If by the question is meant a voice in determining the policies of the company in working out its success we say no man wants to be burdened with the care and responsibility of deciding things. Great freedom of speech and expression of ideas exist in our work, and a great many valuable suggestions are gained thereby. Individually or collectively men may raise their voices with suggestions and they are always heard. If, on the other hand, what is meant is a voice in fixing the personal physical surroundings of the employees, we should say most decidedly the employees should have a voice and their opinions and wishes should be consulted. So far as the Ford Motor Co.'s actual experience is concerned, these surroundings have been, as judged by modern and existing standards, so ideal in character that there have never been any complaints from the employees, and we believe entire satisfaction has been the rule.

Question No. 6. As a result of your observations and experience, what is considered to be the effect of the growth of large corporations and the centralizing of their control on the condition of labor in the United States?

Answer. Any manufacturing institution that is successful in making a single product should increase the business and its plant and more work to employ more men. We can not expect a man to give us his best efforts when he is in debt and has not enough to keep his family on. If corporations are overcapitalized, they must necessarily oppress labor to make a showing. But if they grow from small beginning, naturally, and stick to one legitimate product, balanced conditions are bound to follow. The sooner men can be taught that labor is just as much of an asset and more than machinery and buildings, the sooner labor will be properly recognized. In my judgment mere bigness is no objection if corporations are not overcapitalized.

Question No. 7. What is your attitude toward the accumulation and perpetuation of large fortunes?

Answer. We believe it is better, wiser, and more just to make many men comfortable than to make a few very rich.

Question No. 8. As a result of your observation and experience, do you consider that private philanthropies can deal adequately or effectively with social conditions?

Answer. They may and probably do some good. Of course they are not adequate. But my idea is justice, not charity. I have very little use for charities or philanthropies as such. My idea is aid men to help themselves. Nearly all men are willing to work for adequate reward. We have all kinds of cripples in our employ, and they are making good. We have a great many who have been in prison, and who are outcasts from society. Everyone of them is making a good showing and is gaining in self-respect and strength of character. We will guarantee to take every man out of Sing Sing and make a man of him.

[Applause.]

Chairman WALSH. There must be no outward expression of feeling no matter how favorably the statement may impress you. Another statement may be made which will be abhorrent to you and bring out a counter demonstration, and there must be absolute quiet. [Continues reading:]

Question No. 9. From your observation, what is the effect of the work of private philanthropic organizations on the persons whom they assist and the people who endow or contribute to such institutions?

Question No. 10. Do you consider the establishment of such unrestricted foundations as the Rockefeller Foundation to be in the interest of public policy? If not, what objections sell to you to carry the most weight?

Answer. I have not given sufficient consideration to these questions to justify an expression of opinion.

HENRY FORD.

May I ask you, Mr. Ford, without, of course, intimating the name of any such person, what distinction, if any, is made in the treatment of a man or person who has been so unfortunate as to have been confined in prison, as compared with other employees of your institution?

Mr. FORD. We do not let the other employees know anything about it.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any treatment accorded to him other than what might be called economic treatment as set out by your plan? He is, to your idea, properly fed, adequately fed?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Therefore properly fed and clothed and placed in a position of economic independence?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you find from that that it establishes his moral standard?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to have this matter of what you call these five-day men a little further elucidated. Are those five-day men men that came to your plant and worked a portion of a week and then disappeared?

Mr. FORD. Five-day men?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; you referred to five-day men, and you say these five-day men are floaters, so called, who leave without explanation or notice?

Mr. FORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Does the term "five-" imply they are men that worked a portion of a week?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So that in one year in the whole plant 5,156 men came in and wandered away; they would comprise what is called casual or floating labor?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. They are that class of men that go from factory to factory and from lumber camp to lumber camp, and from ice harvest to grain harvest, and the like?

Mr. FORD. Yes; on the bumpers.

Chairman WALSH. You have doubt, Mr. Ford, in connection with working out your plan in your ordinary business experience, heard the reasons attributed by sociologists and others as to the cause of this?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In the concrete experience which you have had in this year, then, there were 5,000 men who remained at work who could otherwise have joined that large class of nomadic laborers?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is your plan for the determination as to the fitness of a man—you say no unfit man is discharged from the service of the company until he has been proven unfit from every standpoint?

Mr. FORD. We shift them from one department to another, and it is almost invariably found that a man will fit in some place or other. Of course, there are some men who prefer to be floaters and do not want to stay.

Chairman WALSH. The number of men that have left your service speaks very eloquently, to my mind, as to how it practically works out; but I would like you to give us the detailed plan for the record; that is, how much of it do you finally determine individually from reports, or what is the organization for the final determination or say so that the man shall go?

Mr. FORD. If he wants to go, there is no use trying to keep him any longer.

Chairman WALSH. I am afraid, Mr. Ford, that I have not made myself clear. When you have finally determined—first, how is the unfitness of the man determined? Is it on report of foremen of the various departments?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. To whom are those reports made, or does the foreman have a right to discharge the man finally?

Mr. FORD. No, sir; as the statement says, it finally comes to myself and the vice president and Mr. Lee and the superintendent of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Is the man always given a hearing if he desires it?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That is, before the final body that exercises the right—discharges him?

Mr. FORD. Yes; he is given a hearing every time he is changed from one department to another.

Chairman WALSH. Where is your plant located, Mr. Ford?

Mr. FORD. At Detroit—Highland Park.

Chairman WALSH. Are all of the men that come under this plan located in Detroit?

Mr. FORD. No, sir; they are located all over the world. We have 45 or 50 branch plants, from Paris clear around the world, and it affects them all.

Chairman WALSH. Are there men engaged in those different plants throughout the world—do all the men engaged in those different plants throughout the world come under this scheme?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is the machinery provided in the other plants for determining the fitness or unfitness of the men?

Mr. FORD. We have investigators to investigate the men at all plants.

Chairman WALSH. Do they make reports in writing?

Mr. FORD. I do not know that they do. Some of the plants are smaller and they are brought up personally.

Chairman WALSH. Do the reports in your outside plants finally reach this board of control you have mentioned?

Mr. FORD. Not always.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a similar organization, then, in the other plants?

Mr. FORD. Yes, there is. We have a manager in all those plants.

Chairman WALSH. What detail of machinery have you to ascertain at the head of the concern whether the plan is justly and impartially carried out in the other plants?

Mr. FORD. Well, it generally works itself out that if anyone is discharged without reason it comes to Detroit in some way or other.

Chairman WALSH. It comes to Detroit, does it?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The men that have been engaged in your industry since this plan was put into effect show an anxiety to remain, do they?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And has it actually worked out both at the home plant and abroad at the other plants?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That, if men are declared unfit, that they pass their grievance up to the heads?

Mr. FORD. Yes; they pass their grievances up to the head.

Chairman WALSH. How many men would you say are in the employ of your industry in Detroit and elsewhere that come under this plan?

Mr. FORD. Do you mean the total number that come under the plan?

Chairman WALSH. Yes—as you have described it in answer to the question.

Mr. FORD. Between 16,000 and 18,000.

Chairman WALSH. And they are scattered all over the United States?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir; and all over the world.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel, Mr. Ford, that you have worked out a plan by which the responsible heads of your concern—the real operators of the industry, can have a knowledge of labor conditions and of the operation of the plant so far as it affects the lives and well-being of the employees throughout this vast industry?

Mr. FORD. We have only worked at it a year and are finding out something new every day.

Chairman WALSH. Have you found during the years, at least as to its general integrity, that the plan is a good one?

Mr. FORD. We like it for our place.

Chairman WALSH. I note that you state that 200 men have been influenced and helped to obtain citizenship in the United States. Briefly would you describe how and where the rudimentary knowledge necessary for acquiring citizenship is got?

Mr. FORD. We teach them to speak and talk English.

Chairman WALSH. In the schools?

Mr. FORD. In the schools of the factory—and to read and write.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a special effort made—I notice that you refer to it here?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a special effort made to qualify your men for American citizenship.

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you, so that it can be furnished to this commission, Mr. Ford, the map referred to here, showing that 8,000 families have changed their places of residence, and any other data that you may have about that map?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Will you be kind enough to furnish it to the commission?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

(The map referred to was submitted. It is not printed.)

Chairman WALSH. I notice the information is given in this answer to this query, that you expand considerably outside of your plants, as, for instance, the record in the justice court, the submission of experiences of clergymen, etc.?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Is there some department of general sociology in your plants?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. To get at and ascertain the effect of your plan on the citizenship and on the industry?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And are records and statistics regularly kept?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. As applying to your plan?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Are those records open at all times to the civil authorities?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And those that are dealing with the social question in a large way?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you found that there is much demand for that particular sort of information?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Of the general sociologic effects?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir. The head of it is here with me to-day.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. FORD. The head of that department is here with me to-day, Mr. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. What is his name?

Mr. FORD. Mr. John R. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. How many has he under him?

Mr. FORD. He can tell you.

Chairman WALSH. You could not say?

Mr. FORD. Fifty or sixty, I guess.

Chairman WALSH. And the information is given to any desiring, I suppose, to other corporations?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And to municipal and civic bodies?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Throughout the United States?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And there has been, I believe you say, a great call for that sort of information?

Mr. FORD. All over the world. We have sent it all over.

Chairman WALSH. And is the effort made to have the figures and conclusions as nearly accurate as they are possible to be obtained?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you state that after three months' operation your school grew from 200 to approximately 1,100. How many of those schools are there, or is there more than one?

Mr. FORD. We have that there in our own factory. It is one large floor of one of the large buildings.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, you have a school right in your plant?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you have facilities for 1,200 people to attend that school?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir. We separate them into rooms of a dozen to twenty in each room.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say that the paid teachers were replaced by volunteers from the Ford Motor Co.?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you established a definite curriculum, a course of study prior to this time?

Mr. FORD. I don't remember the system, the name of the system. Mr. Lee can give you the name of the system.

Chairman WALSH. Are these employees that now act as teachers paid?

Mr. FORD. Volunteers.

Chairman WALSH. They are volunteers without pay.

Mr. FORD. Volunteers without pay. They do it on their own time; that is, after the eight-hour work, the school comes on for an hour or so.

Chairman WALSH. Certainly. But there is no request made upon them by the managers of the corporation in that direction?

Mr. FORD. Oh, no.

Chairman WALSH. And did you find enough volunteers of that sort qualified to man the teaching faculty of your school?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir; we have some that we have taught there, teaching now.

Chairman WALSH. And do you have a scheme by which their qualifications are determined?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does that come under Mr. Lee's department?

Mr. FORD. Under Mr. Lee's department.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you this question: In your opinion is there a greater factor entering into the elevation of men than the restoring or creation of self-respect?

Mr. FORD. Well, just put that a little different. I don't quite understand the question.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is there any greater factor—we will assume now that a man is down and out, for any reason—vicious or weak habits or submergence from the economic standpoint, or anything that puts him in what you might call the down-and-out class—is there any factor which could enter into the bringing him back to real manhood and to good citizenship than that of giving him back his own self-respect?

Mr. FORD. Give him employment and pay him for it.

Chairman WALSH. Which will make him a self-respecting citizen?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you found that the greatest factor?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. That grows from your experience?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you a few general questions. Where did you begin your business life, Mr. Ford?

Mr. FORD. In Detroit.

Chairman WALSH. And what was your employment; what did you begin with?

Mr. FORD. Machinist and engineer—farmer first—I came from a farm; was on a farm until I was about 17.

Chairman WALSH. You began life on a farm?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Where?

Mr. FORD. In Detroit; near Detroit.

Chairman WALSH. And how long did you remain on the farm?

Mr. FORD. Until I was 16 or 17 years; nearly 17.

Chairman WALSH. Did you attend the school—what education did you receive while on the farm?

Mr. FORD. The public school, the country school.

Chairman WALSH. The public school, the country school?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And at the age of 16, when you left the farm, where did you go?

Mr. FORD. To Detroit, Mich.

Chairman WALSH. What was your first employment in Detroit?

Mr. FORD. In a machine shop.

Chairman WALSH. In what capacity?

Mr. FORD. As apprentice boy.

Chairman WALSH. Apprentice boy?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And did you learn the trade of machinist?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you acquire any other education than the practical one in the shop?

Mr. FORD. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever go to any other school after you left the country school?

Mr. FORD. Except a little while at business college.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would go on and briefly state what your employments have been from the time you were machinist until you assumed your present duties.

Mr. FORD. I went to the Edison Illuminating Co. as machinist, and in a year I took charge of the plant, and I shifted that into an 8-hour working day. It was 12 hours and I shifted it into 8 hours, without adding any men, and found that we could run it 8 hours with the same number of men better and more economically than they could with 12.

Chairman WALSH. Do I understand you were foreman there on that, or manager?

Mr. FORD. I was chief engineer.

Chairman WALSH. You were chief engineer?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. From that employment where did you go?

Mr. FORD. Well, I went into the automobile business.

Chairman WALSH. From the Edison Co.?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And that was in what year?

Mr. FORD. Well, it was 1898, I think, or 1899.

Chairman WALSH. 1898?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is this company a corporation?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Under the laws of what State?

Mr. FORD. Michigan.

Chairman WALSH. Michigan?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And do you have some of your operations in the hands of subsidiary corporations in different States or countries?

Mr. FORD. No, sir. Except in Canada and England separate corporations were organized with many stockholders to take care of business in those countries.

Chairman WALSH. Are all of your operations conducted under the Ford Motor Co. of Michigan?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir; all over the world, with the exceptions I just stated.

Chairman WALSH. All over the world?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir; with the exceptions just stated.

Chairman WALSH. You have not found it—

Mr. FORD (interrupting). Not a dollar's worth.

Chairman WALSH (continuing). Desirable or advisable to create other corporations?

Mr. FORD. No, sir; no one has a dollar's worth of stock in any other country or any other place except—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The stockholders of the Ford Motor Co. of Michigan?

Mr. FORD. That is it.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In your written answers, Mr. Ford, you spoke about paying the men their wages and their profits every two weeks?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How is it possible to ascertain the profits every two weeks?

Mr. FORD. Well, I just anticipated that and took that as a lump.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you declared dividends on your book—records?

Mr. FORD. Well, we knew what we could do. We don't borrow any money. We have our own capital to do our own business. We grew from the acorn up. We started to save our money when we first started in on our capital, and we know what we can do with it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So that every two weeks you estimate your earnings for the past two weeks?

Mr. FORD. No; we don't do it that way at all. We just know people have to have that much money to live properly, and we paid it to them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You pay these men every two weeks, regardless of the actual earnings?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you ever tried to estimate, Mr. Ford, what the percentage of efficiency is that you are getting out of your men to-day, taking 100 per cent as the maximum?

Mr. FORD. We only know—I only know that we have to hold them back.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you have got to use the rein instead of the spur?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that would indicate they are giving all they have to give, their best efficiency?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, what incentive is there—let me rather put the question in another way. This criticism has been made on profit sharing. It has been held by some critics that the weak spot in profit sharing, except where you can determine the actual production of the individual, is that there will be a great many leaners in the group who will depend upon the lifters to do the work, and they will lie back and share in the results.

Mr. FORD. That is up to the management to look out for that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it from what you have said in your enterprise there is a way of determining the actual productive power of each individual, so that he is treated and judged as a unit?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And he does not feed out of a general pot?

Mr. FORD. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But he stands on his own feet?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And is judged accordingly?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you think, Mr. Ford, that your plan is applicable to industries generally?

Mr. FORD. I think so, if they would do one thing—not try to do everything in one place, make all kinds of articles in one factory. I don't think any factory is large enough to do two things. We do only one thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Don't most of the factories in this country that are conducted on a fairly large scale specialize—take a shoe factory, they specialize on shoes, and a clothing factory on clothes, and so on?

Mr. FORD. They make all sizes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. You carry specialization down to a finer point.

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think where that is done your plan could be applied?

Mr. FORD. Well, you can get the maximum of economy.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is the attitude of your company, Mr. Ford, in the matter of dealing or recognizing organized labor?

Mr. FORD. I don't know anything about organized labor. We have never had any of it, to my knowledge, around our place.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your people are not organized?

Mr. FORD. Not that I know of. I have never had anything to do with any organized labor of any kind.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have always conducted what I suppose is the open shop?

Mr. FORD. Always the open shop.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Has your company ever discriminated against any men?

Mr. FORD. No. Sometimes in building we have a little on the outside where they are bothering us, and we can not always control it; take these contractors, one thing and another.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see.

Mr. FORD. Sometimes they hold a building back. We do everything we can to get the building put ahead, and do not discriminate against who works there or what their creed is or what they belong to or where they come from, so long as they go on and work.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, no questions are asked as to whether they are or are not union men?

Mr. FORD. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So far as they are union men that is no disadvantage?

Mr. FORD. No; it does not make any difference.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Ford, when this system was inaugurated by you the public were left to believe—not by you or your company, but by the press—and by themselves, as it were, that your company had declared $5 a day a minimum for all employees?

Mr. FORD. Yes; of specified classes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that true?

Mr. FORD. That is true, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. All of them?

Mr. FORD. All of them 22 years of age.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. All of them over 22 years of age?

Mr. FORD. Yes; or under 22 if they have anyone depending on them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That includes male and female?

Mr. FORD. Well, no; not entirely female.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Not entirely female?

Mr. FORD. No. We pay a great many of them $5 a day where they have some one depending on them.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You mean by that their mother or father?

Mr. FORD. Well, anyone.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who is married and her husband is unable to work?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What percentage of the female employees are getting $5 a day?

Mr. FORD. Well, I would have to look that up; I would not be able to tell.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Can you give any approximate idea?

Mr. FORD. I do not know; perhaps 10 per cent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am to understand, then, all the male employees over 22 years of age are receiving $5 a day as a minimum?

Mr. FORD. Yes. Not all of them; perhaps not just all—we will get all that for you and let you have it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to get it in my mind now what percentage of the employees are under 22 years of age?

Mr. FORD. Well, I don't know offhand; perhaps another 10 per cent.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Ten per cent?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand that the $5 a day is made up in a wage and a so-called bonus of profits?

Mr. FORD. It is a total daily income; that is what it is.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. It is a minimum amount of money they receive per day—$5?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They work a week for $30?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In addition, do they enjoy some profit-sharing system on top of that in addition to that $5?

Mr. FORD. Those who are in charge, foremen and such like. The foremen, of course, are up higher in wage; they are paid $6 to $7 a day.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I mean the workmen, the men running the machines?

Mr. FORD. He has got a chance to come up higher.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Oh, yes; if he gets up to be a foreman and assistant foreman of the job or shop, does he then enjoy anything in addition to his $5 a day?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is right?

Mr. FORD. That is right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say the capacity, or the production, or the efficiency of the work through this system has increased about 15 per cent, I think your paper said?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that equal to the additional amount of money paid out in this increased wage or profit?

Mr. FORD. No; I don't think so. I do not think it is equal, but it is getting up toward betterment.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In other words, does the Ford Co. for the additional money paid to the employees and the additional efficiency secured because of that as a business proposition, a financial business proposition, has it made a loss or otherwise, a gain?

Mr. FORD. Well, I do not know how you would figure it. We are running smoother, for one thing; we are doing better. We can give you all that in figures and you can figure it out.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You will furnish us the figures, then?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In your reports, I suppose?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The Ford Co.—the stock of the company is largely distributed or—

Mr. FORD. There are eight members, eight men.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Eight men?

Mr. FORD. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the capital stock?

Mr. FORD. Two million dollars.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And its business last year?

Mr. FORD. Between $80,000,000 and $90,000,000 in 1912-13; $119,000,000 in 1913-14.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And its profits?

Mr. FORD. I think about $25,000,000 or $28,000,000.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. About $25,000,000 or $28,000,000?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir. We will give you that also.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Give us those figures, too, please.

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Commissioner BALLARD. I gather from what you state as to the workmen since they have received this increased wage have moved into a better part of town, have bettered their conditions?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you have also done some work for them along educational lines. Do you think that that increased wage alone would have been enough, or is it necessary to increase the wage and have the betterment work? Should they go hand in hand?

Mr. FORD. Oh, yes, sir; it is necessary to follow it all up all the way through.

Commissioner BALLARD. Just the mere increasing of the wage would not do that, you think?

Mr. FORD. That would perhaps turn the other way.

Commissioner BALLARD. Of course, as you started in as an apprentice, do you consider there are now in this country chances for a young man apprentice, an apprentice boy, to rise the same as there has been in time past?

Mr. FORD. I think better chances.

Commissioner BALLARD. You think the chances are better now—that any young man now has a good chance if he has the stuff in him?

Mr. FORD. That is it; yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Ford, what was the average going wage of the men prior to the putting in of this plan, the men that are now receiving $5 a day?

Mr. FORD. It was a minimum wage of $2.34 a day; which was about 15 per cent higher than the going wage.

Commissioner GARRETT. In following up the question of Commissioner Ballard it was your feeling, or was it, that this educational process was necessary in a large number of instances to enable the men to utilize the benefit that came to him through the increased wage?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir. We started on that a couple of years before we started the increased wage.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You were preparing the ground?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In regard to the leaner that was referred to that exists, has your experience shown you that when there is a tangible definite incentive given it tends to eliminate the leaner?

Mr. FORD. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock.

Thank you very much, Mr. Ford, you may be finally excused.

(At this point, at 12.30 o'clock, Friday, January 22, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day and at the same place.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order. We are about to resume.

Mr. Gompers.

TESTIMONY OF MR. SAMUEL GOMPERS.

Chairman WALSH. Your name is Samuel Gompers?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you are the president of the American Federation of Labor?

Mr. GOMPERS. I am.

Chairman WALSH. You have occupied that position for how many years?

Mr. GOMPERS. Nearly 30 years.

Chairman WALSH. And you have been connected with the labor movement in America for how many years?

Mr. GOMPERS. Nearly 50 years.

Chairman WALSH. Will you be kind enough, Mr. Gompers, to outline to the commission your attitude, from your observation and experience in the labor movement and as a citizen of the United States, toward the centralization of industrial control and its effect on the condition of labor in the United States?

Mr. GOMPERS. I should be very glad to do that, Mr. Chairman, if I may be permitted to say I received a questionnaire from your commission, and I have made some answers, or partially written answers, which I should like to have the opportunity of presenting. But if I have your permission, I should like to precede it by making a request and taking cognizance of some statements which have been made in connection with the hearing now before your commission.

Chairman WALSH. Very good, Mr. Gompers, we will be glad to hear you in your own way.

Mr. GOMPERS. First, let me say that I have received a telegram from the chairman of the general executive board of the Commercial Telegraphers' Union of America, an organization affiliated to the American Federation of Labor, in which the information is given that a telegram was also sent by that executive board to you, sir, as chairman of the Industrial Relations Commission. And the request is made that certain officials of the Western Union Telegraph Co. and of the Postal Telegraph Co. be summoned to appear before your commission and to give testimony relative to wages paid, pensions, rights of labor to organization, blacklist and the intimation is given that you will get some startling information. From my own investigations I can promise you that you will get some startling information.

One of the subjects I heard discussed this morning before your commission was that the relative rights of business should be recognized by law the same as to the relative right of labor to organize. Speaking for myself, as well as for the American Federation of Labor, we believe that it is unwise to interpose objections to the organization of business men for business purposes. But the reason I take cognizance of this discussion, or the discussion of this point is, the fact that the concept is entirely erroneous on the part of the gentleman who made that claim for the equal rights of what he called labor to organize and business to organize.

Business is the handling of things, the product of human labor. "Labor," is the erroneous expression for human beings—the right of human beings to organize for the purposes of protecting the only thing that they have and own and can control is their labor power, which can not be bereft or separated from them as being human beings. And the hypothesis is entirely wrong in making the relative claim of the laborers to organize to protect themselves—their labor power—and the right to business men to organize to protect their property—the product of all human beings.

Another point mentioned by one of the gentlemen who appeared before you this morning, and I understand that the claim has been made in other hearings before this commission, is that the organizations of labor, the labor unions, ought to become incorporated in order that the agreement which they enter with employers may be regarded as more inviolate, to impress upon the organized workers the sacredness of contract and to, by that means, secure the greater dependability of employers in regard to their agreements with employees.

Now, the fact of the matter is that in the present unincorporated condition of the labor organizations they are no more or no less responsible in the law, before the law, for breach of contract than are the employers now.

One would imagine that the employers, or many of them, who advocate the incorporation of labor organizations—that the employers now are responsible in the law for the violation of agreements with organizations of employees, and that therefore the relative responsibility should be established, and that through the incorporation of the trades-unions. As a matter of fact, they are not responsible to be mulcted in damages and are not mulcted in damages in lawsuits by reason of employers breaking such agreements with labor organizations. And the proposition to incorporate the unions, as a gentleman some years ago said to me, would simply make it easier for the funds of a union to be taken in compensation for damages to employers. And my answer was that like Claude Melnott, in the Lady of Lyons: Princes must not be generous with other people's money.

There are enough opportunities now—all too many for the funds of organization of labor for working people to be reached and confiscated and at least we are not going to advocate, as working people, the enactment of law by which the process shall be made easier by which the funds of our unions may be confiscated.

The history of the world is replete with evidence of constituted authority robbing the working people of their pittance laid aside for their own protection, and the protection of their young. We will protest against a repetition of such procedure, whether by enactment of law or proclamation—at least, if we can not prevent it—and I think we can, but if we can not we will at least protest.

There is another point, and that is the constant harping upon the worn-out idea that the unions of labor restrict output, so commonly held and so often repeated that real many people finally reach the stage where they themselves believe it. The fact of the matter is that it is much more largely true of unorganized workmen than of organized workmen.

It is true that in the old, old time that workingmen did "soldier," using the trade expression, on a job, in order "to make it last." It is true also that opposition was manifested to the introduction of new machines, new tools, but that is past. I mean that is practically past in so far as organized labor is concerned. I will not pretend to say that it does not exist at all, but to a very limited and to a continually decreasing extent.

The labor movement of the past 30 years at least, or more, has changed that mode of thinking and that mode of procedure among the working people, so that instead of reducing output or opposing the introduction of machinery and new tools of labor we encourage them; but insist, first, that with the introduction of new machinery the men whose trade has been displaced by such new machinery that these men be given the first opportunity in the operation of the machine, be given preference to others in the operation of the machine, and in addition to demand a reduction in their hours of daily labor. Not to reduce output, but that the workers shall be the participants in the results of the better and swifter means of production. And it comes with bad grace on the part of our large captains of industry to charge the labor movement with curtailing output, when the workmen in our country individually and collectively produce more than the workers of any other country on the face of the globe, but when the corporations through a series of years concentrated their industries in fewer plants, shutting down plants in whole districts, throwing hundreds and thousands of workmen out of employment, throwing them into the streets, the whole plant dismantled or gone into decay, to the detriment, not only of the workers let out, but to the community in which they worked and lived and helped to make some better.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether the commission would be interested in the reading of a letter received last night, or rather it being a report made to me as president of the American Federation of Labor by the organizer of our federation in this district and whom I asked to make an investigation and report to me upon the conditions as they obtain in Roosevelt, N. J., and the causes which brought about that condition. It is a letter that might occupy not more than six or seven minutes.

Chairman WALSH. Very good, Mr. Gompers; just proceed.

Mr. GOMPERS. In view of the very severe cold I have, I should like to ask one of the gentlemen to read it.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson, will you please read this letter?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Chairman, do you want me to thunder the letter?

Chairman WALSH. I would like to have it read so that the farthest auditor might hear it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Very well.

NEW YORK, January 21, 1915.

Mr. SAMUEL GOMPERS,

President American Federation of Labor.

Ouray Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR AND BROTHER: In compliance with your request I herewith beg to submit a report on the strike situation at Chrome, N. J., where between six and seven hundred men have been on strike since January 4 against the American Agricultural Chemical Co., who have about six plants at Chrome, Carteret, and Roosevelt, N. J., so that you may be in a position to furnish correct information to President Frank Butterworth, of the International Brick, Tile, and Terra Cotta Workers' Alliance, and a local union of that organization at Roosevelt, N. J., both of whom have made inquiry to you for information and a request to make an investigation.

The cause of the strike was occasioned through the company, some three months ago, reducing the wages of the men from $2 per day of 10 hours to $1.60 per day, making a reduction of 40 cents per day, or 4 cents per hour. It is claimed by the men that they were induced to accept this reduction at the time upon the plea of the company that it would be restored when the depression was over, which they expected would be on the first of the year. The men, believing that it would be restored on or about January 1, patiently remained at work, but when they found out that company did not intend to live up to their promise they went on strike on Monday, January 4. A few days after the company issued a circular which was passed out to the men, in which they called attention to the general depression throughout the country, compared the wages paid in the various brickyards and other classes of labor throughout that section, and stated in the circular that they could get all the men they needed for 16 and 17 cents per hour, but they would give the preference to their own men if they would return to work immediately under the reduction. This the men refused to do.

On January 5, one day after the strike took place, Mr. Louis Tarcai, who is connected with a Hungarian publication in Manhattan, called at this office, stating that a committee of the men had communicated with him and the officials of the paper, calling attention to the strike. There are four nationalities involved in this strike—Polish, Slavish, Italian, and Hungarian. The Hungarians are more numerous than the other three. I instructed Organizer Tykoff to go to Chrome that same day with Mr. Tarcai, look over the situation, and render such assistance as he could. Since that time he has gone there every day, attending and addressing meetings and perfecting organization among the men, their charter having arrived yesterday, some 300 having paid the initiation fee and are enrolled at this writing.

The Italian element among the strikers secured the services of an Italian speaker, who has been assisting in keeping them together and familiarizing them with what is going on among the other nationalities.

I secured the services of Mr. Tarcai, paying him for same during the last 10 days. On Wednesday the 20th, following the shooting of so many men by the deputies, I sent Organizer Collins to make a careful investigation of the situation and the reasons leading up to the shooting of these men. I did this because I knew he would not be swayed by the excitement, but would report the conditions as they actually were, and I herewith quote his written report to me as part of this report to you:

"HUGH FRAYNE,

General Organizer, American Federation of Labor:

"I herewith beg to report to you the result of my investigation of the strike situation as I found it on my visit to Roosevelt, Chrome, and Carteret, N. J., on Wednesday, January 20:

"The short train ride reveals that along this coast line of the Kill von Kull many industrial baronies have been created in the hope that no possible interference from agitators can take place.

"The present strike is a complete refutation of the idea of benevolent corporations.

"The newspapers have been misinformed of the motive for the strike; it is not for an increase of wage, but a protest against a decrease of 40 cents a day; the wages were $2 for a day of 10 hours.

"The location of the borough of Roosevelt makes the cost of living higher than in the city of New York because of the lack of transportation facilities.

"The population is 90 per cent foreigners, 80 per cent Hungarian and Slavish, 10 per cent Italian, and 10 per cent native born.

"There are between six and seven hundred strikers from the American Agricultural Chemical Co.; the same proportion of nationality prevails.

"The chief of police and his men have testified to the peaceful attitude of the strikers.

"The mayor takes the same attitude and has expressed a desire for investigation.

"The mayor, in my conference with him, spoke without any solicitation on my part of the help the federation had been in keeping the strikers peaceful.

"The sheriff was not called into the strike by the mayor of the city of Chrome, but at the solicitation of the American Chemical Co.

"The sheriff claims that the strike was the result of agitators. This is untrue because the strikers worked for three months with the wage reduction in the hope that the company would treat with the committees and restore the old scale.

"The business men of the city have petitioned the company that it is impossible to expect men to live on $1.60 a day.

"The deputies were already formed up and picked out before the warrants were served; this helps to establish the relations between the company and the prosecutor's office.

"The deputies had no legal right outside of the company's premises, yet the morning that the strikers were picketing the railroad for strike breakers they, the deputies, rushed out of the gates and without any provocation opened fire. This is the testimony of the policeman who was on duty.

"The mayor in conference told me that he felt in an embarrassing position because of his order to the strikers not to do any damage or break the peace, and living up to this they were shot without the slightest provocation, and the wives seem to think that the mayor did not instruct them right, as they should have been in a position to defend themselves.

"Fraternally submitted.

"WILLIAM COLLINS,

"Organizer, American Federation of Labor."

In conclusion I desire to say that within 24 hours after the strike took place organizers and interpreters in the different languages, representing the American Federation of Labor through this office, were on the ground advising and counseling with the men not to violate the law and to commit no violence of any kind. They also conferred with the mayor and other city officials and the representatives of the company in an effort to secure an amicable and peaceful settlement of the strike, but the latter were unwilling to settle except that the men return to work and accept the reduction in wage.

I also desire to say that I got in touch with Mr. James O'Connell, of the Industrial Relations Commission, and furnished him with a copy of the circular issued by the American Agricultural Chemical Co. to their men and gave him such other information as might be of assistance in the event that the case was brought before the commission. I have also had a conference with Mr. Gill, the investigator appointed by the Industrial Relations Commission to make a thorough investigation of the strike, its causes, and who is responsible for the shooting of the men. This activity is in line with the policy of the American Federation of Labor and refutes the statements of those who say that nothing is being done to organize and help the unskilled foreign-speaking workers.

As previously stated, some 300 of the men have been enrolled and a charter granted by the American Federation of Labor, and the indications are that the men will stand firmly together and refuse to return to work until the company restores the original wage of $2 per day.

With best wishes, I beg to remain,

Fraternally, yours,

HUGH FRAYNE,

General Organizer, American Federation of Labor.

Mr. GOMPERS. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, under the impression that your commission has made considerable investigation into the activities of the detective agencies, in a series of years much information has come to me upon that subject. From the old-time Pinkerton who created small standing armies, privately engaged—privately hired—up to the development of the modern detective agencies. I am informed, and I think my information is reliable, that more than eight-tenths of the work of the detective agencies now is strike breaking, strike provoking, trouble breeding agencies with an espionage upon men and women employed in industry in the unions of labor, and the espionage upon labor leaders.

As one of the types of agencies to which I refer, I hold in my hand this document of about 50 printed pages—let us be exact, 54 printed pages, larger than a folio; and the title is described as "Secret Service, Leader-News Building, 524 Superior Avenue. Phones, Bell—Main 4496; Guy Central 4886. Copyright 1914, by R. J. Coach, president and general manager. The R. J. Coach Secret Service Co., Cleveland, revised edition."

I have but one copy of this document, but it deals with all forms of service to employers. On page 1 it starts out, speaking of the company, and says: "He has methods of his own for disposing of impending labor troubles."

On page 19, it says: "Every symptom of troubles, whether of dissatisfaction or indifference among the operating force, will be reflected through an all-embracing system if properly established." And then again on the same page: "The method of tracing it to its source and correcting it will entail but little time and expense." Then again: "Conditions once learned and reported to the client ought to make changes so gradual as to be unnoticeable. Disturbers are dropped from the pay roll; both imaginary and just grievance by the men are given attention; the workmen become loyal, and the force gains greater productive power."

The following page: "The operators of this service"—this Coach Service Co.—"are experts in several lines of work, skilled executives, expert accountants, and men able to work at the machines and bench. Experts in industrial work must be trained leaders of men, forceful and unyielding." Further on: "They work as ordinary employees, each does a full day's work. They draw their pay the same as other men."

Another part: "In another case the owners of the factory were threatened with a strike; also the output had decreased 25 per cent. Our operatives soon ascertained that the men were in rebellious mood because of the tyrannical methods."

In another: "The daily service fulfills its purpose well, but by having one or more of our operatives in the plant on monthly contract, the employer not only receives the benefit of a cheaper rate but is always kept in touch with what is going on among his workmen."

Again: "When a disturber or discontent breeder enters the plant his identity is almost immediately revealed. You also know just how the men regard contemplated reductions or increases in wages, and if action requires, you can prepare yourself for trouble."

"As the operative widens his circle of acquaintance he soon learns the innermost thoughts of each man he comes in contact with, and the general manager knows how much he can depend on each employee if an organizer starts to work secretly among the men—this is now the favorite method of procedure—the operative having established himself, can intelligently report upon the attitude of the workmen toward unionization. The fact that progressive employers generally are adopting this form of service proves that it must have merit beyond the few benefits mentioned here."

Then, again: "Operating under agreement with labor unions as many of them are conducted, is distasteful to employers. They are never safe from arbitrary demands that may be imposed upon them. If your workmen are not now organized it does not indicate that they never will be. The American Federation of Labor has issued Federal charters to more than 14,000 bodies of men belonging to craft that never before were organized. More than 2,000,000 of men are members of the A. F. of L. unions, and there are hundreds of thousands of others who belong to the I. W. W. and the Knights of Labor and kindred organizations, and the organizers have to organize in order to hold their positions. Our method of assisting the employers in this connection have proven effective."

On page 28 of the prospectus of this company, which is sent to employers as an inducement for them to engage the services of this company—the R. J. Coach Secret Service—are these significant words: "Our operatives soon get the run of the labor agitation in the shop or factory. Our methods are such that the agitator soon finds himself a minority of one in the establishment, with the atmosphere too frigid for comfort."

And now mark this—the words that follow: "We do not care to say more on this subject."

Further on the document sets forth: "Only those who have participated actively in a strike in which capital and labor were locked in desperate conflict are able to appreciate the danger, the hardship, the suffering, and the enormous waste of money involved." Then: "The R. J. Coach Secret Service is especially helpful in averting strikes. Our operatives working unknown among the employees in ways that have proved efficacious in years of experience." And then: "Our operatives soon put an end to the efforts of agitation. Efforts of agitators are counteracted, and gradually the malcontents are weeded out."

And so on and so on. And I again call attention to the language or to these words: "We do not care to say more on this subject."

And after having said all that it has said, when through the maneuvering and the effort to hide the meaning of language, a detective agency will use the words which I have quoted, it leaves very little to the imagination as to what depths and lengths such agencies go in order to be of service as an agent provocateur of trouble where life is held insignificant, if only one thing can be done—that is, to break the spirit of the workers.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you, Mr. Gompers, if you have any objection to stating whence the source of that circular?

Mr. GOMPERS. All employers are not hostile to labor or organized labor. There are a number of men—large employers of labor—who are in sympathy with the organized-labor movement, and these detective agencies can not know who is who in the world of employers, and they send these almost indiscriminately to any employer who they think may be a prospective patron of their services; and through these friendly inclined employers I receive documents of this character, and this is one of them.

Reverting to the question you asked me, Mr. Chairman, I am under the impression it is contained in the questionnaire that was submitted to me.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. You may proceed in the way you suggested at the inception of your testimony.

Mr. GOMPERS. I hold in my hands the questions submitted, and I have in a way answered some of them. I take it that the questions ought to go in the record so that the answers may be intelligent?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Will you kindly read the question?

Mr. GOMPERS. "Please outline your attitude toward the centralization of industrial control and its effect on the condition of labor in the United States."—question 1.

Answer. The attitude of the American Federation of Labor toward the centralization of industrial control as such is the same as its attitude toward all other employers of labor. The question of centralization of any industry is one of natural development, and, regardless of legislation or attempts at judicial intervention, decentralization can not and should not be attempted. We can not turn the wheels of industry or of progress backward. To a large extent the effect of the control of the centralization of industry has had a deleterious effect upon the condition of labor in the United States. But for this condition two causes are attributable: First, the constant influx of immigration unrestrained by and practically unlimited by the immigration laws of our country; and, second, by the failure of the workers themselves to assert their rights of organization and of having a voice in determining the conditions under which they shall work.

"2. Do you consider that the relative position of labor has been improved or impaired by the development of large corporations and the centralization of their control?"

Answer. The relative position of labor has improved indirectly from the development and centralization of industry, but in the relations of employees to the corporation they have been impaired.

"3. Please outline the general attitude which was assumed toward industrial combinations during the early part of the twentieth century at the time when trusts and large corporations in the basic industries were being established?"

Answer. The attitude of the American Federation of Labor to industrial combinations I have outlined in my answer to the first question, that of the relation of employee to the employer. In the general aspect of the industrial combinations each individual union member, like every other citizen, has taken his own position toward that. This can be best epitomized in the demand of the people, including the workingmen, for the legislation as exemplified in the enactment of the Sherman antitrust law of 1890, whereby discrimination and the unwarrantable methods of monopolization and discrimination of the industrial combinations were sought to be curbed, and at which time the workingmen in their organized capacity sought exemptions of the operation of the Sherman antitrust law from the voluntary organizations of working people and agriculturists and horticulturists, and which exemption was passed by unanimous vote of the Senate, and later eliminated from the bill under assurances that the Sherman antitrust law could not be made to apply to the labor organizations, but which later were made to apply, by judicial interpretation of the fact, after which the agitation on the part of organized labor movement was inaugurated and culminated in the enactment of the labor provisions of the Clayton antitrust law of October 15, 1914.

"5. Please point out in which of the industries you consider that labor has made the most rapid and satisfactory development, and in which industries you consider that this development has been most greatly retarded?"

To be answered later.

"6. A, B, and C. Is it, or is it not, a fact that the development toward trade-unionism has been most rapid and complete in those industries which have not been dominated by large corporations, such as:

"A. Building trades.

"B. Bituminous coal industry.

"C. Printing and publishing."

Answering question 6, A, B, and C, will say that the development of trade-unionism has been great in building trades, bituminous coal industry, in the printing and publishing trades, and on the railroads. The question of incorporation has not either tended toward the development or retarding the movement of organization in at least two of the industries named corporations are highly developed.

Where I said incorporation I mean corporation; that is, in the coal industry and in the railroads. There are no greater corporations.

"7. Is it, or is it not, a fact that the organization of labor and the advancement of labor conditions has either been retarded or completely blocked in the industries in which large corporations are dominant, such as:

"A. Iron and steel industry.

"B. Paper and wood-pulp industry.

"C. Slaughtering and meat packing.

"D. Automobile industry.

"E. Petroleum refining.

"F. Cotton textiles.

"G. Woolen and worsted goods.

"H. Flour and other cereals.

"I. Telegraph and telephone."

Answering question 7, with its subdivisions, I would answer it generally in the affirmative.

The attitude of these corporations in retarding or blocking organizations of the working people has been an attitude assumed within this past 10 or 15 years.

"8. Please take up, one by one, the principal basic industries which employ the larger number of workers and outline the conditions which make for the success or failure or effective labor organization."

Eight is covered by my answer to question 7.

"9. Do you consider that under existing conditions the employees in such industries as the steel industry, paper and wood-pulp industry, slaughtering and meat-packing industry, etc., are protected in the exercise of their rights as workmen and citizens?"

Answering question 9, I should answer categorically in the negative.

"10. If not, what line of action do you consider to be socially desirable to assure them in the exercise of such.

"Please explain both the method by which such rights can be obtained and wherein it is socially desirable that the workmen in such industries should be in a position to secure their rights."

Answering question 10 would say that the rights of workers in the establishments coming under categorically question 9 can be obtained by the organization of the working people, every right should be guaranteed to the workers to organize and to exercise their normal natural activities to protect against wrong and demand rights; to strike, to be protected in the conduct of a strike; to eliminate the detective agencies and provocateurs and armed private guards, such as are exercised by the detective agencies and exemplified, for instance, by the R. J. Coach Secret Service Co., of Cleveland, Ohio, and whose work is set forth in one of the documents from which I have quoted, from their own publication.

The restriction, limitation, and regulation of immigration would be the greatest factor to stop the constant flow of immigrants contracted for and induced by the corporations and the ship companies, and which now and for the past 10 years has afforded a constant flow of immigrants to the plants of these corporations; the stoppage or limitation of which would afford the opportunities for the workers in these establishments to regain their lost courage, character, and manhood, and to assert their rights to organize for their own and for the common protection.

"11. In your experience as president of the American Federation of Labor have you encountered any instance in which the actual decision upon labor policies has been exercised by the financial powers rather than by the working managers of the corporations?"

"A. Strike in the sheet and tin-plate industry in 1901.

"B. Strike in the anthracite coal industry in 1903."

Answer to question 11: The financial powers, as a rule, have insisted upon certain dividends, of earning power of the plants of the corporations which dominate rather than the determination of local labor policies. During the financial panic of 1907, for instance, a number of the working managers of the local establishments urged the United States Steel Corporation to be permitted to reduce wages, either in compliance with or concurrently with the declaration of the American Federation of Labor protesting against reductions in wages, and urging the working people of America to resist every reduction in wages, and if that resistance meant the loss of the strike to resist in any event, that it was better to resist and lose than not to resist at all.

Say, either in compliance with or concurrently with the declaration of the American Federation of Labor to protest against reduction in wages the Steel Corporation decided that wages should not be reduced.

It was the United States Steel Corporation which formally declared against the unionization of its plant and notified its subsidiary companies.

What I mean to say by my answer to this question is that the corporations, the financial dominating spirit of these corporations, are less concerned with the policies and methods employed by the subsidiary companies or branch companies—all they want is the dividends, and leaving all else to the local management. And it is evidently a policy that secures the best results for the princes of finance and relieves them from the details of management and sometimes of responsibility.

Question 13 reads as follows: "What is your attitude toward the social desirability of endowed foundations for the investigation of labor conditions?"

"(a) Do you consider that such foundations can impartially investigate problems in the field of industry?"

"(b) What objections do you see to the establishment of foundations in perpetuity similar to the Rockefeller, Russell Sage, and Carnegie Foundations?"

"(c) Granted that it is possible for a scientific and impartial investigation of industrial conditions to be made, do you consider that the results of such an investigation would carry conviction to the workers or would greatly influence the action of the employers?"

"(d) Granting that the investigation was impartial and scientific, do you consider it would increase or alleviate industrial unrest?"

Answering 13: I believe that such foundations as the Rockefeller Foundation can not impartially investigate a problem in the field of industry. The whole basic principle upon which that foundation is instituted—the guiding spirit behind it all precludes the possibility of impartial investigation as to the relations between employers and employees.

Answering 13 (b): The art of teaching should be either conducted by the State and the costs borne by the people of the State, or only private teaching should be done by the family itself or by universities and when they are endowed the teaching should be wholly independent from the influence of such endowment. Several of the colleges and universities have protested against the influence and domination of private endowments, even in some of the universities and colleges of our country.

As to the desirability of such foundations as the Russell Sage and the Carnegie, that may be open to question, but there is no dissension among thoughtful and liberty-loving persons as to the position, the object, and the scope and spirit of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Answering 13 (c): I can not take it for granted that it is possible for a scientific and particularly an impartial investigation of industrial conditions to be made by such an institution as the Rockefeller Foundation. In addition, I would say that the results of industrial investigation by either of these foundations would not carry conviction to the workers or would greatly influence the action of employers.

Answering 13 (d): I have already partially answered and would add that it would not increase or alleviate industrial unrest. And I may add that, in my judgment, unrest—discontent—is not an evil, is not a thing which ought to be given its quietus, and it could not no matter what effort might be made. A healthy unrest among the people, an intelligent discontent is the constant intellectual groping, moving, striving for conditions better than they are to-day, and if it had not been for the unrest and the discontent of the past we would not have even the tolerable conditions of living and labor which we have to-day, and what the past has been to the present, so will the social unrest—the industrial discontent, be for the future.

Chairman WALSH. Granting that you do not consider that the activities of the foundations named above are socially desirable, please outline, if you will, the course of action or character of legislation which you would consider desirable?

Mr. GOMPERS. In so far as these foundations would devote their activities to the sciences, medical, surgical; to the laboratory, to the contributions toward history; for the arts, the sciences, they would be helpful. But the effort to undertake to be an all-pervading machinery for the molding of the minds of the people in their relations between each other in the constant industrial struggle for human betterment—in so far they should be prohibited from exercising their functions, either by law or by regulation. I think that, for instance, the secretive, diplomatic method of the Rockefeller Foundation, in having its educators placed upon the official list of officers of the Federal Government, to whom a nominal salary was paid by the Government, which in turn gave the Rockefeller Foundation the opportunity to send their literature through the mails under the franking privilege of the Government was a fraud upon the Government as such, and in addition it was a subordination of the principle of education and an imposition upon the people of our country.

I think one of the worst features, one of the most dangerous features of these foundations, is where they undertake to mold the opinion and the judgment of the people. I do not think that the Government of our country or that the people of our country are ready to surrender the function of teaching to a private institution such as the Rockefeller Foundation, with the history behind that foundation—the means by which their moneys were first made and later accumulated.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask some particular questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Several questions, Mr. Gompers, have been handed to me with the request that I present them and invite your answer. The first question is, If a union injures others unlawfully, by a boycott or sympathetic strike or by violence such as dynamiting, why should it not be liable in damages?

Mr. GOMPERS. May I see that?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Certainly.

(Commissioner Weinstock hands paper to Mr. Gompers.)

Mr. GOMPERS. What is this [indicating]?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is another question.

Mr. GOMPERS. The party who asked you to in turn ask me this question reveals his own misunderstanding or his own unjustifiable hostility toward organized labor, and before I proceed to answer this question, Mr. Commissioner, unless you assume responsibility for the question, I would like to know the personality of the questioner. He or she finds me upon the witness stand, and I am here in my own name with the right to inquire who asks this question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, he is a representative of the employers' association.

Mr. GOMPERS. My name is Samuel Gompers; I reside in the city of New York, with office at the offices of the American Federation of Labor, Ouray Building, Washington, D. C. I am responsible for my utterances here, and I want to know who is my questioner.

Chairman WALSH. The writer of the question has indicated to me from the audience that he desires it stated that he is Mr. Walter Drew.

Mr. GOMPERS. I thought so; that is his type. [Applause.]

Chairman WALSH. We must have no audible expression of your feelings. That is absolutely imperative, and I hope that you will aid us in carrying this out.

Mr. GOMPERS. "If a union injures unlawfully"; the question is one of those ingeniously constructed questions, something like the question put to a witness, "Do you still beat your wife?" If you answer that you do, you imply that you always have beaten her, and still do; if you say no, it is an implication that you no longer beat your wife.

"If a union injures another unlawfully." If a union or any other body of men injures another unlawfully, then they are subject to be brought to the bar of justice and placed upon their defense. The question of boycotts or sympathetic strikes—boycotts and strikes are, under the law of the United States, not unlawful. The Clayton antitrust law has taken out of the category of unlawfulness the strike and the boycott. And the question, so far as strikes and boycotts are concerned, has no meaning.

A VOICE FROM THE AUDIENCE. How about the hatters' decision?

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly retire, that gentleman who asked that question? We must have perfect order.

A VOICE FROM THE AUDIENCE. I will do so. I would like to ask Mr. Gompers—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Will the sergeant at arms speak to that gentleman?

A VOICE FROM THE AUDIENCE. I am going out.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed, Mr. Gompers.

A VOICE FROM THE AUDIENCE. I am going out; I am going out as fast as I can.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed, Mr. Gompers.

Mr. GOMPERS. If I may be permitted, I shall take cognizance of the question asked by the gentleman, but after I have finished this.

Chairman WALSH. If you could and would, Mr. Gompers, I wish you would proceed. We must absolutely, in every way, discourage such interruptions. Please pass that unnoticed.

Mr. GOMPERS. The interjection of this question of violence and dynamiting is an insult, and only intended as an insult. The idea of asking a witness before this commission this question: "If a union injures other unlawfully." I am going to omit the question of boycotts and strikes. "If a union injures another unlawfully," by violence, such as dynamiting, why should it not be held in damages? Anybody who indulges in violence and dynamiting ought to be brought to the bar of justice and sent to prison. It is not a question of unions being mulcted in damages in civil proceedings. I am sure that the question does not arise as the result of ignorance; it is intended to be an insult.

Mr. WALTER DREW. Mr. Chairman—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Kindly keep your seat, Mr. Drew. You may be called as a witness, and I will ask you to please keep your seat or I shall have to ask you, as I did the other gentleman, to leave.

Mr. GOMPERS. Before the Senate Committee on Judiciary, having under consideration a bill to relieve the voluntary associations of working people from the operations of the Sherman antitrust law, as interpreted by the Supreme Court of the United States, this same question was asked by Walter Drew of me while I was addressing the committee, and the repetition of it here is simply an insult, no matter what his intentions may have been.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have anticipated the next question, Mr. Gompers. "Why should a law-abiding union resist being made legally responsible for its actions?" I think you have covered that.

Mr. GOMPERS. Another Claude Melnotte, who would be liberal with our money. May I have your permission to take cognizance of the question propounded by the gentleman who was justifiably ejected from the room?

Chairman WALSH. I do not like to be stubborn, but I am going to ask you to assist us in maintaining the spirit of the rules of our commission and kindly pass that by unnoticed.

Mr. GOMPERS. I will say this: That since—that any action of organized workers since October 15, 1914—such activities as that exercised by the hatters of Danbury, Conn., no such suit could be brought against the working people as was brought against the hatters of Danbury under the Sherman antitrust law.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The next question is as follows: "Have you seen the Eleventh Special Report of the United States Commissioner of Labor as to Restriction of Output by American Trades Unions, prepared by Prof. Commons?"

Mr. GOMPERS. I think I have not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, of course, you can not answer the next question if you have not seen that report. It is "Does that report show the restriction of output to be more or less universal?"

The next question is: "What can you say of jurisdictional disputes among unions? Do they not lead to long and costly sympathetic strikes, involving many innocent third parties? Can the American Federation of Labor control such disputes among its members? Has it done so? What is the remedy? Would not legal responsibility tend to largely end such disputes?"

Chairman WALSH. Please reread that.

Mr. GOMPERS. The question is: "What can you say about the question of jurisdictional disputes among unions?" Well, I can say that they exist and have existed from the beginning of the world; that men have had in the past and do now endeavor to do work when they have not work in their own trade or calling—do try to find work in some other trade or calling, and those who find themselves pinched for work in the trade or calling in which employment is sought—and when they themselves are pinched for work or opportunity they are going to protest whether they are organized or unorganized. It is in part due to the maladjustments of modern industry on the one hand—the lack of foresight of the captains of industry and due to the constant transition of new machinery in industry, new tools, and substitutes that men's occupations are gone, trades dissipated, trades for which men have given three—five years of their lives learning and they find their occupations gone.

"Do these not lead to long and costly sympathetic strikes involving many innocent third parties?"

Sometimes; yes.

"Can the American Federation of Labor control such disputes among its members?"

The American Federation of Labor has no members except as the organizations themselves are units, and these units are members. The affiliated organizations—the units—have the members. The American Federation of Labor can not control—the American Federation of Labor is a voluntary association. As its name implies, it is a federation of organizations. It can act and does act in an advisory capacity, to be helpful, to express its judgment, but it has not the power of enforcing its judgment. It must be dependent and it is dependent upon the voluntary acceptance by the organizations and the men of the declarations and the judgment reached by the American Federation of Labor.

"Has it done so?"

I assume that means has the American Federation of Labor done so. It has done what I have outlined.

"What is the remedy?"

One might as well ask what is the remedy for storms. Storms are just as normal as is the sunshine. The result of natural conditions, and I prefer that Mr. Walter Drew would furnish a remedy for storms and the sometime burdensome heat of sunshine; it is not within my power.

"Would not legal responsibility tend largely to end such disputes?"

No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is it or is it not a fact, Mr. Gompers, that these jurisdictional disputes, which frequently inflict upon third and innocent parties great injury—do not place in the hands of employers who are antagonistic—hostile employers—

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Garretson says that he is absolutely unable to hear you. Mr. Reporter will you please read the question as far as it has been put?

The REPORTER. Is it or is it not a fact, Mr. Gompers, that these jurisdictional disputes, which frequently inflict upon third and innocent parties great injury—do they not place in the hands of employers who are antagonistic—hostile employers—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. A reason for refusing to deal with organized labor?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir; that is true.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Reporter, I wish you would please read in a loud voice the entire question.

The REPORTER. "Is it or is it not a fact, Mr. Gompers, that these jurisdictional disputes, which frequently inflict upon third and innocent parties great injury—do they not place in the hands of employers who are antagonistic—hostile employers—a reason for refusing to deal with organized labor?"

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir; that is true—unfortunately true, and it is a condition which we can not change. It is a condition that we are endeavoring to persuade our fellow workers and fellow unionists to meet. In the past few years, outside of organizing and the effort to secure legislative reform from Congress and from the State, there is such effort being made by the American Federation of Labor to eliminate or minimize jurisdictional disputes—as much effort as to any one thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you not think it is possible, Mr. Gompers, from your experience as a labor leader, that these jurisdictional disputes can be eliminated without cessation of work?

Mr. GOMPERS. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not?

Mr. GOMPERS. They ought to be; it may be desirable that that be done, but it can not be done; that is, effectively and actually. For men who are struggling for bread and the earning of a livelihood involved in working at their trade or occupation—it is a question of seeing that job taken away by one he regards as an interloper, and what we aim to do—what our movement aims to do is to bring it down to the smallest possible number and the least possible friction and are trying to reach that result. We find it frequently that there are two claimants regarded as opposite trades, but one just as insistent as the other, just as earnestly and just as ably, presenting the case of its right to do the work and not the other fellow.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there no way of making it plain to the workers themselves that every time they engage in a jurisdictional dispute that means cessation of work or their working into the hands of their enemies, and putting into the hands of antiunion employers a lash that can be used on the backs of all unions?

Mr. GOMPERS. That is what we are trying to do. I think the report of the executive council of the American Federation of Labor as made time and again to conventions upon this subject of jurisdictional disputes—the question discussed in the various declarations we have made, the various differences which we have tried to adjust—we have done our best, and are doing our best, and the fact of the matter is that we are not given credit for doing anything at all. What opportunities have we to reach the ten millions of workers throughout America or more? Our publications, our leaflets, and our meetings, after, however, the thing has percolated from one mind and one mouth to another, along the line, the thing is lost, or nearly lost, and all you get is the essence, if you can get that at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, are jurisdictional disputes increasing or diminishing in number?

Mr. GOMPERS. That is difficult to answer. Mr. Commissioner, there is no such thing as finally adjusting jurisdictional disputes. The very adjustment you make to-day is disarranged to-morrow or next year by reason of a new machine, a new tool, a new substitute being offered. For instance, let me put this—let me take a concrete case.

Take the dispute between the sheet-metal workers and the carpenters upon metal trim. Now, the sheet-metal workers say, "This is sheet metal, and, being sheet metal, it belongs to us to do." The carpenter says, "This is simply a substitute for wood. It is not a tinker's damn or a tinker's hammer, but it is the carpenter's hammer." And so I am told that in some instances contractors prefer the carpenters to do it, because they are held, by the contractors, to be the most competent to do that kind of work, and there they are. And there are some sheet-iron manufacturers who claim that the sheet-metal workers ought to do the work.

Now, what are we going to do about it? After we shall have declared that the sheet-metal workers ought to do the work, and the carpenters get the work from the contractors—that has been practically the case. The laboring men—the building trades department of the federation declared that the work belonged to the sheet-metal workers; the contractors said "the carpenters are going to do it." Will you interpose your judgment and say that the sheet-metal workers are going to do it anyway? And if the organization is going to be disrupted in the effort and get into conflict with employers and our own people, it does not decide anything, Mr. Commissioner. All that we can do is to be helpful in the two parties keeping their differences within reasonable limits, so that they do not fly at each other's throats and claiming the job and going out on strike against each other and to their own and mutual injury and to the injury of the innocent employer. We are applying ourselves to that work.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Answering question 7, Mr. Gompers, in your questionnaire which you were dealing with, you stated that you believed that it is a fact that the organization of labor and the advancement of labor conditions have been either retarded or completely blocked in the industries in which large corporations are dominant, and so forth, could you give this commission what you believe to be the reasons for the retarding and blocking of such labor conditions?

Mr. GOMPERS. There seems to be a natural trend running all through the human race of domination. The workmen for centuries were slaves; and there are some people who have not yet awakened to the fact that we are living in the twentieth century. Industrially they are and we are living in the twentieth century; mentally they are living in the sixteenth. The idea of domination entirely. When unorganized workmen in desperation ask for some consideration at the hands of employers it is regarded as a rebellion—a rebellion which must be crushed out. And the corporations to which you refer have acted upon that notion, and they have to a large degree crushed out the spirit of protest among the employees. In addition, as I have said in my answer, I think, to that or one of the other preceding questions, the Government of the United States has given them almost carte blanche to draw upon the people of all other countries to keep up a channel in which there was a constant flow of workmen coming from these countries time after time, beginning with one class of laborers and then going down in the social scale, worse and worse, to the worst class of laborers and bringing them over here. It is not so much the corporation itself as it is the elements within these establishments that can not—do not seem—to generate companionship, comradeship, group patriotism, and to try and help bear each other's burdens and to relieve each other from wrong. And so long as we shall have this channel open and the peoples from those other countries coming here to fill up whatever gap may be caused by a little discontent or by protest or by people trying to get out and go some other place—so long as these gaps can be filled by this constant stream of immigrant laborers there will be no hope to organize the workers in these plants under the domination of these corporations.

I may say this: I expect within 24 hours to be placed in possession of information of such an authentic character that I hope I may have the opportunity either of personally presenting it to this commission or else to some other representative agency of our Government in regard to immigration. The President of the United States is to-day having a hearing upon the immigration bill as it passed Congress, and it was acting under your summons, as I have to, that my absence was forced and I was unable to be at the hearing which the President has or is now holding at this time upon this subject of immigration. And let me say this, that the shipping companies are to-day in cahoot with these corporations, and under the pretence of liberalism—I want to emphasize that as strongly as I can—under the pretense of liberalism many of these men are suborned by the shipping companies and these corporations to prevent the passage of a fairly comprehensive immigration restriction bill.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In passing, touching upon the immigration question as you have just now, if you had supreme power in the matter what would you do with immigration—how would you deal with it?

Mr. GOMPERS. I think that I would limit immigration—restrict it. I don't think I would close the walls, close all our ports; I do not think I would.

A gentleman a few weeks ago discussed with me a proposition which appealed to my judgment, one which was based upon a proposition to permit immigration from all countries upon a basis of a small percentage of those who are already here. I have not given that proposition sufficient thought to warrant the expression of a definite opinion upon it, but that immigration must be restricted and better regulated than it now is no one will dispute. May I just call attention to this fact, Mr. Commissioners?

Now, immigration has fallen off greatly, due to the terrible European war. When that war shall have come to an end the countries now engaged in the conflict will do everything within their power to prevent the strong men, the healthy men, the capable men, from leaving their respective countries. Every obstacle will be put in the way of any one of these men leaving. But this is also true that the countries will do everything they possibly can to encourage the immigration of the weak; of the men whose health has become undermined; who have contracted some malady; who have become enfeebled or weakened; and where can these people go? Not, surely, to each other's countries who have been engaged in the war. The only opportunity for them is to come to the United States or to Canada. And quite apart from the ordinary difficulties and evils of this practically unrestricted immigration that is coming in here, the consequences of the war, when it shall have come to an end, are such and the dangers are such that it behooves us to exercise more than the ordinary care and precaution to save ourselves from the condition which may overwhelm us and do us great injury.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have pointed out, Mr. Gompers, that where the employer believes himself to be in the saddle his tendency is to become despotic and tyrannic. Now, as you and I know, labor is made out of the same common clay that the employer is made out of, and when labor believes itself to be in the saddle does it not also tend to become despotic and tyrannic?

Mr. GOMPERS. Only a phase of it; that has been a phase. When workmen are unorganized they always look upon themselves as absolutely powerless to secure any change, any redress for any grievance. They regard their employers as almighty, all-powerful. The employers regard their employees as their wards, and, in a way, so far as their judgment goes, they want to be the trustees of these people; but any attempt on the part of the workers to secure of their own volition any change is regarded, as I said before, as a rebellion.

Now, whenever unorganized workmen have reached the state of mind where they are going on a strike or are out on a strike a complete revolution has taken place in their minds. Where before they regarded themselves as entirely impotent and their employers as almighty, the first notion of formerly unorganized, now newly organized, workmen engaged in a strike—in their judgment this transformation has occurred—is that they are all powerful; that the employer is a weakling and has no rights which they are bound to respect. It is the complete reversal of the position, of the mental attitude.

Now, that is true; but when organization is maintained among the working people, and whether the strike has been lost or won, if the organization of the working people is maintained, each has a better respect for the rights and the powers of the other.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Returning, Mr. Gompers, to the question that there had been unions which had been unreasonable and unjust in their demands, as has been evidenced by the fact that the national officers at times had taken away charters of unions because they were unreasonable and unjust in their demands.

Now, the question is, if you were an employer how would you protect yourself against unreasonable or unjust unions in their unreasonable demands?

Mr. GOMPERS. If I was an employer, of course, I can not conceive of myself in such a position. But I shall try to—I have urged this upon employers—I would say I believe anything I would advise another to do I would be willing to do myself.

Now, I will try to be in agreement, enter into collective bargaining with my employees as organized entities and preferably when these local unions are part of an international union. In a measure, and to a considerable extent, the international union really underwrites the good faith of the collective bargaining between the employers and associations of employees and the union of employees. I do not want anyone to imagine that even that is going to eliminate all trouble and strife and dissatisfaction. I do not think it will, and I do not think it is desirable either. Sometimes when people show their teeth to each other it tends to the movement of good, red blood.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, I do not know as I caught your answer, Mr. Gompers. You are an employer and you have entered into an agreement with the union that is affiliated, and that union makes an unreasonable demand and unjust demand, what are you going to do?

Mr. GOMPERS. Mr. Commissioner, I would like in this instance that your question should be concrete rather than general. I do not know whether we agree as to what constitutes unjust demands.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, let us take the concrete case, then. You were not here the other day when Mr. Belmont was on the witness stand?

Mr. GOMPERS. I was not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He cited a concrete case. I am not familiar with the facts, but I can repeat it as he did. He spoke of a strike that took place on the subway, and his explanation was that there were unreasonable demands made and the company refused to comply, the men went on strike, the international officers investigated the case and demanded that the men return to work. They refused and their charter was taken away. So there you have a concrete case.

Putting yourself in the position of the employer in that case, what would you do?

Mr. GOMPERS. I am familiar with the case you cite, sir. I am in accord with the action of the officers of the international union. The men were misled.

They were misled. No question about it. And not for their own good. I know of no other instance in my career of more than 45 years as a union man where the interests of the working people were fritted away as they were in that case.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Was not the case of the Pacific & Electric Co., Mr. Brittain, of San Francisco, a somewhat similar case?

Mr. GOMPERS. No, sir; I spent about seven or eight days in San Francisco last year, and of that fully five days were devoted to conferences with Mr. Brittain, president of the company, and I know that is totally different. Commissioner Lennon was with me a considerable part of the time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Was the charter taken away from the workers at that time?

Mr. GOMPERS. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It was not?

Mr. GOMPERS. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I did not know of it. I thought it might have been a similar case.

Mr. GOMPERS. No; it was not.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell has a few questions he would like to ask.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Gompers, yesterday one of the large employers whose business is diversified, in mining, railroad, and shipping, employing many thousands of workmen, does not deal with unions or with men as organized, and in answer to question that I asked him as to whether or not workmen would be to-day enjoying the same conditions as to wages, hours, and other things going with employment, if there had been no organization of labor for the past 30 years, and his answer was he believed they would be. What is your opinion of that?

Mr. GOMPERS. He does not know. The fact of the matter is that the conditions of labor are measured better by the hours of toil, daily toil, than by any other standard. To think that the conditions of the working people would have been just as well improved without the organizations reminds me of the fatalist who declared that when he shot a partridge that had crossed the horizon and it fell to the ground with a dull thud, said it was not the shot that killed the bird; the fall would have killed it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think it would not have been possible?

Mr. GOMPERS. Simply impossible. The world has moved by the protests of a few who have gathered others with them and made that protest felt, and the impress upon the minds of their contemporaries. It is not true. It is the organized-labor movement which has compelled employers of unorganized toilers to make conditions nearer to that of the organized, like an army; the people of the country do not all go to war. A certain number of people go to war and fight for the balance. Organized-labor movement is the militant body of workers to secure for all the workers the best possible conditions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, let me ask you directly, are there any workmen following a given craft, trade or calling, unorganized, that have got the eight-hour day, for instance?

Mr. GOMPERS. I know of none. Perhaps, Mr. Commissioner, an illustration will be more convincing than any other, a concrete case. Take the railroad conductors, the conductors engaged in the service of the railroad companies and the conductors in the service of the Pullman companies. The conductors of the railroad companies' service receive a wage nearly 100 per cent more than that of the conductors in the Pullman service. The hours of labor are normal—there is a great disparity in it; I can not tell you what it is—but the great influence, and dominating influence is that the conductors in the service of the railroad company are organized and the conductors employed by the Pullman Co. are not organized.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The same gentleman, Mr. Berwind, before us yesterday, said he believed that the employment of people industrially should be taken care of by legislation, and, with one exception, that of regulating wages. In all other cases industrial life should be taken care of by legislation enacted by the whole people rather than the adjustment of their industrial differences between employer and the employee. What is your opinion of that theory?

Mr. GOMPERS. Well, I not only hope that such a day will never come, but I am confident it will never come. There is so much that people want other people to do by law.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We have heard, Mr. Gompers, from a number of witnesses appearing before this commission of so-called bad unions and so-called good unions. Employers say, who have appeared before our commission, that they would be glad to see men organize in unions if they were good unions. Can you give this commission some idea as to what is a good union or a bad union; what their activities might be in both?

Mr. GOMPERS. From my own standpoint, or the viewpoint of the—

Commissioner O'CONNELL (interrupting). Your experience as the head of the American Federation of Labor, and your coming in touch with all the unions in this country and abroad, I do not care where you get it, good or bad, tell us what it is?

Mr. GOMPERS. My observation is that I have seen unions which have made mistakes, pursued mistaken policies, but I think that that is one of the human frailties, that we make mistakes, and after all we might say experience is only another name for the mistakes we have made. I do not know what is meant by a bad union.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Let me see if I can—

Mr. GOMPERS (interrupting). Bad men may come together, and that does not make a bad union. They may be bad men. Good men would not necessarily make a good union. The question is of union, it is the association and combination to secure improved conditions for the men and women who work, to eliminate child labor—the methods proposed may be all askew and wrong; they may make mistakes, but the good union and bad union I think are misnomers.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do I catch the idea—at least it impresses me as such, that a good union would mean men would organize in an organization or association of some kind that would bring them together and they would resolve that they don't want shorter workdays, that they don't want higher wages, that they don't want better conditions, they don't want child labor taken out of the factories, and they don't want to interfere with their employers. Might that not be considered, from the employers standpoint, a good union?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes; magnificent. I remember—let me see—I don't know exactly and I do not want to make an incorrect statement if I can help it. But it was before the House Committee on the Judiciary when some one was speaking about good unions. Yes; that is their conception, a union like one of those good dogs, he has no teeth. A good union that will come together and sing "My country, 'tis of Thee," and sing psalms and go home and say the employer is a jolly good fellow.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, on this all-important question of jurisdiction. Is not this subject of jurisdiction largely magnified, largely being used as a subterfuge for a reason to not deal with unions?

Mr. GOMPERS. Very often, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is not the employer in many, many instances responsible for the jurisdictional disputes?

Mr. GOMPERS. Frequently provokes it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In order to get the best of his competitors in business he encourages a jurisdictional dispute if he can't bring the desired result some other way?

Mr. GOMPERS. And exaggerates it, too.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The labor movement as represented by the American Federation of Labor, in order to avoid jurisdictional disputes where the jurisdiction of work—the kind of work and so on—was concerned has taken place in rapid forms of industry, has succeeded in amalgamating and putting into one organization two contending parties in order that the jurisdictional dispute might entirely disappear?

Mr. GOMPERS. It has done so in several cases.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. A great many cases?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And is continuing to do that sort of work?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And is continuing to bring the contending parties together wherever the result has not been accomplished?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has not the federation in its convention adopted resolutions with a view of protecting the so-called innocent employer, so far as it could in such limited power as it has, being a federation, by encouraging the organizations that were there is a trade dispute that they shall continue at work and let the subject matter in contention be submitted to mediation or conciliation or arbitration?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir; it has.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. To avoid punishing the third party?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir. As a matter of fact in every convention we have a committee, one committee which we call the committee on adjustment, to which, as a rule, all jurisdictional controversies are referred, and the committee is out of the convention very nearly wholly during the entire time until it is ready to report to the convention, and during that entire time the committee is hearing parties to disputes and endeavoring to effect adjustment, and that frequently adjustment is reached.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I was just going to say that at the recent convention in Philadelphia a great number of jurisdictional matters were before that committee.

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And they endeavored to adjust them and did have an agreement without affecting the third party?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes; in several instances.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Gompers, in reading that pamphlet from the detective agency of Cleveland, I understood they spoke of sending their detectives into the plants, and I understood you characterized that as wrong and outrageous?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. And that same pamphlet, as I understood, spoke of union organizers being also sent by the unions into that plant and without the knowledge of the employer; is that also wrong and outrageous?

Mr. GOMPERS. I don't catch the question.

Commissioner BALLARD. The detective proposed, as I remember, to send their detectives into the plant to find out if there were any agitators or any organizers at work in there, and I understood that you thought that is wrong and outrageous conduct. That pamphlet also, as I remember, spoke of union organizers going into the plant for the purpose of organizing the plant?

Mr. GOMPERS. No; it speaks of the organizers coming to the city.

Commissioner BALLARD. And not going direct to work in the plants?

Mr. GOMPERS. No.

Commissioner BALLARD. You would not consider that correct and proper?

Mr. GOMPERS. I would not say I would not consider that proper, but that is not in the pamphlet.

Commissioner BALLARD. I thought it spoke of that?

Mr. GOMPERS. I have no recollection of that in the pamphlet.

Commissioner BALLARD. And you would not consider it right to send a union organizer to an apparently satisfied plant and let them attempt, without the knowledge of the employer, to organize workmen in that plant?

Mr. GOMPERS. I would not consider that right, the question of these detectives, they as a rule suborn a workman; that is the purpose. They play upon the needs of some poor fellow to betray his fellow in an effort to organize or to secure some improvement in the conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Gompers, are jurisdictional quarrels between unions any more acute or any more prevalent than exactly similar rivalries between corporations for trade, and are they not, then, parallel for them?

Mr. GOMPERS. I know where there is considerable rivalry, clamoring for trade jurisdiction by the corporation. As to the exact—

Commissioner GARRETSON. For the sale of their product?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not an evidence of exactly the same human quality in the two classes?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes; it is true politically, too. We have, oh, for the past 20 years or more, have been clamoring for a greater New York. We have been clamoring for a greater Chicago and a greater St. Louis and a greater Buffalo and a greater Boston and even a greater United States. And then we have taken in—

Commissioner GARRETSON. Take the encroachment of the jurisdictional departments as against the old trade line stores. Is there any difference?

Mr. GOMPERS. Except that that is commercial.

Commissioner GARRETSON. On the question of soldiering, as you spoke of it at one stage of the game, that is the limitation of output. Is soldiering on the part of the laborer anything but a relic of slavery; a slave soldiered on his master because he had no reward?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does not soldiering occur in the present day in the exact proportion to the incentive that there is to him to soldier or not to soldier?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir. The workman of to-day is not only required but actually gives a good hard fair day's work, and in modern industry soldiering is practically impossible. Labor to-day is divided and specialized, and the men are given just one little thing to do over and over and over again, thousands of times a day perhaps. Each one has got to do it in order to keep up with the team, with the great establishment, and if he does not keep up he falls by the way; he has lost his job.

Commissioner GARRETSON. He is one of a train of gears?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If it were true that the laborer limited output, and it were admitted it was an economical crime to limit output, what is the relative economic crime on the part of the corporation that buys ten plants and closes down three of them to keep up the price of the product?

Mr. GOMPERS. I am afraid I am not a good criminal lawyer.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Economic crimes are committed by lawyers but not passed on by them?

Mr. GOMPERS. It is a subject on which I shall leave my invective for a mass meeting.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Plain English would not cover it.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to direct a few questions to you. I will say the practice has been that when they are couched in language, in-offensive language, it is necessary for the chairman to read them. I can say, however, that this is quite long and involves quite a discussion and if it occurs to you in the same way, of course, your statement will be accepted. I will read it to you nevertheless. "Is it not true that organized labor is making it difficult for the workmen outside of organizations to find work in their respective callings? Are there not great impediments placed in the way of workmen attempting to enter unions? If this is so, may not the unions be said to represent the interests of organized labor rather than of the working proletariat generally?"

Mr. GOMPERS. Individually, categorically, and generally, I answer in the negative. The fact of the matter is that organizations of labor, the national unions, the international unions, the American Federation of Labor, have a large corps of organizers to appeal to the unorganized. There is not an international union of any trade which I know which has not its organizers out trying to organize the unorganized. Every central body, every central labor union in the cities has its organizing committee, every local federation of labor. We have about 1,600 volunteer organizers, men and women who go about to preach the gospel of mutual assistance and of unity. And we have on the pay roll of the American Federation of Labor 30 or more organizers to whom we pay a fair day's wage and his expenses or her expenses to organize. Of the quarter of a million of dollars approximately received by the American Federation of Labor every year, that comes from the per capita tax, about 8 cents a year for each member of the affiliated organizations, two-thirds of that money is expended for organizing purposes, literature for organizing.

Within this past two days, before I came here, I directed a circular to be sent to the organizers throughout the United States. I have not yet seen it in print, but I very much would like to have the privilege of having a copy of that organizing document in the record. I am perfectly willing I may be judged as a man by the contents of the circular. The American Federation of Labor has conducted a campaign of education among our fellow workers to make it somewhat more easy for every nonunion worker to join, to become a member.

In the union in which I hold my primary membership, we have in the fund in that organization a per capita of not less than $10, and yet the initiation fee for anyone to become a member is $3. So long as it will hold out we present in actual possession $7 to everyone who becomes a member of the organization. That quite apart from the protective features, but the fund is already there.

Chairman WALSH. Isn't the restriction of immigration likely to result in the improvement of the conditions of the American workingmen?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Is not the interest of labor an international rather than a local one?

Mr. GOMPERS. It is not a local question. The people who talk so glibly of the internationality of the proletariat of the world are themselves clutching at each other's throats. We are plain men, and while we do not want to close the gates of our country to those who may helpfully contribute to the welfare of our country when they come here, we are going to protect ourselves first. While we love our neighbor we do not love him quite as well as we do ourselves.

Chairman WALSH. The next question is, Does the American Federation of Labor, as its name may be taken to indicate, concern itself with the restricted problems of American labor alone and care nothing about the international problem?"

I presume your last answer would cover that?

Mr. GOMPERS. Yes, sir. There is not any wrong committed against any human being anywhere with which the American Federation of Labor does not concern itself.

(See Gompers exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. We thank you very much, Mr. Gompers. This is our hour for adjournment, and you will be finally excused. Thank you very much.

The commission will now stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock, in the board of estimates' room, across the hall.

(At 4.40 in the afternoon of this Friday, January 22, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Saturday, January 23, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m., in the board of estimates' room.)

NEW YORK CITY, January 23, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Brandeis, you will please take the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. LOUIS D. BRANDEIS.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Louis D. Brandeis.

Chairman WALSH. Where is your place of residence?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Boston.

Chairman WALSH. And what is your profession, Mr. Brandeis?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. You have also been engaged in public work, Mr. Brandeis?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; but not in office.

Chairman WALSH. Not in office?

Mr. BRANDEIS. No.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please state the general character of the work which you have been doing, so far as it might affect industry.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have, for quite a number of years, devoted myself, among other things, to a consideration of the industrial—social industrial problems, and especially the relations between employer and employee.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the effect of the growth of large corporations on conditions of labor in American industry, and the general industrial relations?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have endeavored to study that among other things.

Chairman WALSH. Would you kindly state what your observation has been, with respect to the question as to whether or not the high concentration and the growth of these corporations have improved the physical conditions under which workmen are employed, or otherwise.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think, in many instances, they have improved their physical conditions; that is, large and successful organizations have been able to provide the best-planned and best-equipped factories, and they have, to a very considerable extent, built new factories. And there is, both among large corporations and the small—or large factories and the small, a clear development of better factory conditions—more light, better ventilation, greater safety; and, in so far as the large corporations have been leaders in various branches of manufacturing and have constructed these new factories, they have undoubtedly improved in that way the physical condition of labor.

Chairman WALSH. Have the large corporations increased the wages as rapidly as the prices of commodities have increased, or shortened working hours as rapidly as the development of the industry would warrant?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It is difficult to answer that comprehensively. I should feel quite certain that in some respects they had not—certain corporations, and very prominent ones, have not increased wages as rapidly as the profits of the organization warranted, nor have they reduced hours. But I think that is true also of many corporations that are small.

Chairman WALSH. Does the corporate type of organization tend to produce a higher grade of workmen and citizens?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I should think not.

Chairman WALSH. Have the large corporations acted as a bulwark to prevent the growth of trade-unions, from your observation, Mr. Brandeis?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state what information you have, generally, of course, upon which you base that answer.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think that the large industrial corporations have found this possible. That is true of the trusts and true also of large corporations which are not among those technically known as trusts, but which have powerful financial organizations; for instance, the Steel Trust, the Tobacco Trust, the Sugar Trust. It seems to me that they have possessed the power against which, in the main, the unions—union organizations have struggled in vain. There have been a very large number, undoubtedly, of other employers who were not large, who had exactly the same desires and the same economic views as those who control these great corporations, but they had not the power of resistance, the power of endurance, and the influence and connections, which enabled them to make their will law. It was a difference, not of motive in the main, but of conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the extent to which potential control over labor conditions is concentrated in the hands of financial directors of large corporations?

Mr. BRANDEIS. To a certain extent. I think that goes, necessarily with the control of the corporations themselves. There has been undoubtedly great financial concentration—direct to a certain extent and indirect to a greater extent, and that influence which came from the concentration in comparatively few hands of a deciding voice in important financial and industrial questions almost necessarily affects the labor problems, as it does other problems, although it may not have been the design primarily to deal with the labor problem.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the extent to which this potential control is exercised in connection with labor matters? Do you know of individual instances in which the control is directly used?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Well, the report of the Stanley investigating committee indicated that it had been used quite effectively in the steel trade.

Chairman WALSH. Do such financial directors, in your opinion, Mr. Brandeis, have sufficient knowledge of industrial conditions and social conditions to qualify them to direct labor policies involving hundreds of thousands of men?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I should think most of them did not; but what is perhaps more important or fully as important is the fact that neither these same men nor anybody else can properly deal with these problems without a far more intimate knowledge of the facts than it is possible for men to get who undertake to have a voice in so many different businesses. They are prevented from obtaining an understanding not so much because of their point of view or motive, but because of human limitations. These men have endeavored to cover far more ground than it is possible for men to cover properly and without an intimate knowledge of the facts they can not possibly deal with the problems involved.

Chairman WALSH. Does the fact that many large corporations with thousands of stockholders, among whom are large numbers of employees, in anyway whatever affect the policy of large corporations?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do not believe that the holding of stock by employees—what is practically almost an insignificant participation, considering their percentage to the whole body of stockholders in large corporations—improves the condition of labor in those corporations. I think its effect is rather the opposite.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would elucidate that a little, if you will, please, Mr. Brandeis; state the reasons for it.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Perhaps I would have to go a little further into my general feeling in this respect—

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would do so, Mr. Brandeis.

Mr. BRANDEIS. AS to the causes of the difficulty and of the unrest.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would please do so.

Mr. BRANDEIS. My observation leads me to believe that while there are many contributing causes to unrest, that there is one cause which is fundamental. That is the necessary conflict—the contrast between our political liberty and our industrial absolutism. We are as free politically, perhaps, as free as it is possible for us to be. Every male has his voice and vote; and the law has endeavored to enable, and has succeeded practically, in enabling him to exercise his political franchise without fear. He therefore has his part; and certainly can secure an adequate part in the Government of the country in all of its political relations; that is, in all relations which are determined directly by legislation or governmental administration.

On the other hand, in dealing with industrial problems the position of the ordinary worker is exactly the reverse. The individual employee has no effective voice or vote. And the main objection, as I see it, to the very large corporation is, that it makes possible—and in many cases makes inevitable—the exercise of industrial absolutism. It is not merely the case of the individual worker against employer which, even if he is a reasonably sized employer, presents a serious situation calling for the interposition of a union to protect the individual. But we have the situation of an employer so potent, so well-organized, with such concentrated forces and with such extraordinary powers of reserve and the ability to endure against strikes and other efforts of a union, that the relatively loosely organized masses of even strong unions are unable to cope with the situation. We are dealing here with a question, not of motive, but of condition. Now, the large corporation and the managers of the powerful corporation are probably in large part actuated by motives just the same as an employer of a tenth of their size. Neither of them, as a rule, wishes to have his liberty abridged; but the smaller concern usually comes to the conclusion that it is necessary that it should be, where an important union must be dealt with. But when a great financial power has developed—when there exists these powerful organizations, which can successfully summon forces from all parts of the country, which can afford to use tremendous amounts of money in any conflict to carry out what they deem to be their business principle, and can also afford to suffer large losses—you have necessarily a condition of inequality between the two contending forces. Such contests, though undertaken with the best motives and with strong conviction on the part of the corporate managers that they are seeking what is for the best interests not only of the company but of the community, lead to absolutism. The result, in the cases of these large corporations, may be to develop a benevolent absolutism, but it is an absolutism all the same; and it is that which makes the great corporation so dangerous. There develops within the State a state so powerful that the ordinary social and industrial forces existing are insufficient to cope with it.

I noted, Mr. Chairman, that the question you put to me concerning the employees of these large corporations related to their physical condition. Their mental condition is certainly equally important. Unrest, to my mind, never can be removed—and fortunately never can be removed—by mere improvement of the physical and material condition of the workingman. If it were possible we should run great risk of improving their material condition and reducing their manhood. We must bear in mind all the time that however much we may desire material improvement and must desire it for the comfort of the individual, that the United States is a democracy, and that we must have, above all things, men. It is the development of manhood to which any industrial and social system should be directed. We Americans are committed not only to social justice in the sense of avoiding things which bring suffering and harm, like unjust distribution of wealth; but we are committed primarily to democracy. The social justice for which we are striving is an incident of our democracy, not the main end. It is rather the result of democracy—perhaps its finest expression—but it rests upon democracy, which implies the rule by the people. And therefore the end for which we must strive is the attainment of rule by the people, and that involves industrial democracy as well as political democracy. That means that the problem of a trade should be not longer the problems of the employer alone. The problems of his business, and it is not the employer's business alone, are the problems of all in it. The union can not shift upon the employer the responsibility for conditions, nor can the employer insist upon determining, according to his will, the conditions which shall exist. The problems which exist are the problems of the trade; they are the problems of employer and employee. Profit sharing, however liberal, can not meet the situation. That would mean merely dividing the profits of business. Such a division may do harm or it might do good, dependent on how it is applied.

There must be a division not only of profits, but a division also of responsibilities. The employees must have the opportunity of participating in the decisions as to what shall be their condition and how the business shall be run. They must learn also in sharing that responsibility that they must bear to the suffering arising from grave mistakes, just as the employer must. But the right to assist in making the decisions, the right of making their own mistakes, if mistakes there must be, is a privilege which should not be denied to labor. We must insist upon labor sharing the responsibilities for the result of the business.

Now, to a certain extent we are gradually getting it—in smaller businesses. The grave objection to the large business is that, almost inevitably, the form of organization, the absentee stockholdings, and its remote directorship prevent participation, ordinarily, of the employees in such management. The executive officials become stewards in charge of the details of the operation of the business, they alone coming into direct relation with labor. Thus we lose that necessary cooperation which naturally flows from contact between employers and employees—and which the American aspirations for democracy demand. It is in the resultant absolutism that you will find the fundamental cause of prevailing unrest; no matter what is done with the superstructure, no matter how it may be improved in one way or the other, unless we eradicate that fundamental difficulty, unrest will not only continue, but, in my opinion, will grow worse.

Chairman WALSH. From your observation, Mr. Brandeis, what would you say is the responsibility of these so-called absentee owners of industries for conditions, wages, and other conditions existing in the corporations in which they are financially interested?

Mr. BRANDEIS. They must be held absolutely responsible. There is no such thing, to my mind, applying it in this connection, as an innocent stockholder. He may be innocent in fact, but socially he can not be held innocent. He accepts the benefits of a system. It is his business and his obligation to see that those who represent him carry out a policy which is consistent with the public welfare. If he fails in that, so far as a stockholder fails in producing a result, that stockholder must be held absolutely responsible, except so far as it shall affirmatively appear that the stockholder endeavored to produce different results and was overridden by a majority. Of course, stockholders may be innocent if they have been active and have been outvoted; but stockholders can not be innocent merely by reason of the fact that they have not personally had anything to do with the decision of questions arising in the conduct of the business. That they have personally selected gentlemen or given their proxies to select gentlemen of high standing in the community, is not sufficient to relieve them from responsibility. As a matter of course, most stockholders do have very little to do with the management and in these great corporations they have practically nothing to do. It is largely the financial interests who determine policies and the practical results. But the stockholder is morally responsible although he actually has nothing to do with the management because he can not justify himself in being a stockholder unless he assumes the obligations which go with stockholdership; and stockholdership is practically partnership in the establishment so far as concerns the questions now under consideration.

Chairman WALSH. You have probably noticed that practical—I was going to say practical unanimity, but that might be putting it a little too strong, the very general and broad statements that are made by directors in these corporations, especially those located in the city here, to the effect that they feel that they discharge their duties when labor policies are left to their local officials or to their executive officers here.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have not read with any care the reports of what was testified to and that you have reference to.

Chairman WALSH. There are exceptions, but generally that has been the statement; that is, that they leave that to the executive officers.

Mr. BRANDEIS. That position, so far as it may have been taken, seems to me absolutely unsound. It is a position which, I think, must be deemed a relic of those earlier days when the labor problem was not regarded as the prime problem in the industrial world. The obligation of a director must be held to be absolute. Of course, I said a little while ago that one of the grave objections to this situation with large corporations was the directors did not know what was going on, and they could not therefore pass an intelligent judgment on these questions of the relations between employer and employee, because they did not have the facts.

Nobody can form a judgment that is worth having without a fairly detailed and intimate knowledge of the facts, and the circumstances of these gentlemen, largely bankers of importance, with a multitude of different associations and occupations—the fact that those men can not know the facts is conclusive to my mind against a system by which the same men are directors in many different companies. I doubt whether anybody who is himself engaged in any important business has time to be a director in more than one large corporation. If he seeks to know about the affairs of that one corporation as much as he should know, not only in the interest of the stockholders, but in the interest of the community, he will have a field for study that will certainly occupy all the time that he has.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed, Mr. Brandeis, in the development of these large corporations, the percentage of stock which might give control, or in practical everyday life does give control—what I mean is this: There seems to be an impression in some quarters that the controllers had to have a majority of the stock—51 per cent, for instance.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it is true not only of these very large corporations, but of very much smaller corporations in which the stock is listed and widely distributed, that not only a small percentage of the stock may give control, but that for a long series of years control is held sometimes without the ownership of any stock whatsoever, or of practically no more stock than is necessary to qualify directors.

I had a professional experience in connection with one corporation whose capitalization is very small as compared to those to which you refer, Mr. Chairman, but which runs into the millions, where I represented the outside stockholders who wanted to get control. The contest lasted a considerable time. We ultimately got control of the management, and when we examined the books we found that the management had practically sold itself out of all stock years before, and held practically no stock at all; that the president of the corporation had not only sold his stock holdings, but had sold out even his qualifying shares, and had to go to the market the next day and buy five shares of stock in order to qualify as director.

I mean these corporations are not controlled through a majority of the stock; they are controlled very largely by position. And that is an almost inevitable result of the wide distribution of stock.

From the standpoint of the community, the welfare of the community and the welfare of the workers in the company, what is called a democratization in the ownership through the distribution of stock is positively harmful. Such a wide distribution of the stock dissipates altogether the responsibility of stockholders, particularly of those with 5 shares, 10 shares, 15 shares, or 50 shares. They recognize that they have no influence in a corporation of hundreds of millions of dollars capital. Consequently they consider it immaterial whatever they do, or omit to do, the net result is that the men who are in control, it becomes almost impossible to dislodge, unless there should be such a scandal in the corporation as to make it clearly necessary for the people on the outside to combine for self-protection. Probably even that necessity would not be sufficient to ensure a new management. That comes rarely except when those in control withdraw because they have been found guilty of reprehensible practices resulting in financial failure.

The wide distribution of stock, instead of being a blessing, constitutes, to my mind, one of the gravest dangers to the community. It is absentee landlordism of the worst kind. It is more dangerous, far more dangerous than the absentee landlordism from which Ireland suffered. There, at all events, control was centered in a few individuals. By the distribution of nominal control among ten thousand or a hundred thousand stockholders, there is developed a sense of absolute irresponsibility on the part of the person who holds that stock. The few men that are in position continue absolute control without any responsibility except that to their stockholders of continuing and possibly increasing the dividends.

Now, that responsibility, while proper enough in a way, may lead to action directly contrary to the public interest.

Chairman WALSH. For the purpose of illustration, take a corporation such as the Steel Corporation and explain what you mean by the democratization of industry, and to apply it to a concrete corporation, take that one.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think the difficulty of applying it to that corporation, I mean a corporation as large as that and as powerful as that, is this: The unit is so large that it is almost inconceivable that the men in control can be made to realize the necessity of yielding a part of their power to the employee.

Now, when they resist a particular labor policy, for instance, the unionization of shops, and they do resist it violently, most of the officials do so in absolute good faith, convinced that they are doing what they ought to do. They have in mind the excesses of labor unions and their obligations to stockholders to protect the property; and having those things in mind and exaggerating, no doubt, the dangers of the situation, they conclude that they can not properly submit to so-called union demands. They are apt to believe that it is "un-American" to do so—and declare it to be contrary to our conceptions of liberty and the rest. And they believe they are generally sincere in their statements.

The possession of almost absolute power makes them believe this. It is exactly the same condition that presents itself often in the political world.

No doubt the Emperor of Russia means just as well toward each of his subjects as most rulers of a constitutional government or the executives of a Republic. But he is subject to a state of mind that he can not overcome. The fact that he possesses the power and that he is the final judge of what is right or wrong prevents his seeing clearly and doing that which is necessary to give real liberty and freedom.

It is almost inconceivable to my mind that a corporation with powers so concentrated as the Steel Corporation could get to a point where it would be willing to treat with the employees on equal terms. And unless they treat on equal terms then there is no such thing as democratization. The treatment on equal terms with them involves not merely the making of a contract; it must develop into a continuing relation. The making of a contract with a union is a long step. It is collective bargaining—a great advance. But it is only the first step. In order that collective bargaining should result in industrial democracy it must go further and create practically an industrial government—a relation between employer and employee where the problems as they arise from day to day, or from month to month, or from year to year, may come up for consideration and solution as they come up in our political government.

In that way conditions are created best adapted to securing proper consideration of any question arising. The representative of each party is heard—and strives to advance the interest he represents. It is the conflict of these opposing forces which produces the contract ultimately. But to adequately solve the trade problems there must be some machinery which will deal with these problems as they arise from day to day. You must create something akin to a government of the trade before you reach a real approach to democratization. You must create a relation of employer to employee similar to that which exists in the trade under the protocol with the preferential union shop.

Chairman WALSH. Past experience indicates that large corporations can be trusted to bring about these reforms themselves?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think all of our human experience shows that no one with absolute power can be trusted to give it up even in part. That has been the experience with political absolutism; it must prove the same with industrial absolutism. Industrial democracy will not come by gift. It has got to be won by those who desire it. And if the situation is such that a voluntary organization like a labor union is powerless to bring about the democratization of a business, I think we have in this fact some proof that the employing organization is larger than is consistent with the public interest. I mean by larger, is more powerful, has a financial influence too great to be useful to the State; and the State must in some way come to the aid of the workmen if democratization is to be secured.

Chairman WALSH. Are the workmen employed by large corporations in a position to work out their own salvation by trade-union organization to-day?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think our experience, taking the steel trade as an example, has certainly shown that they are not. And this is true also of many other lines of business. Even in case of corporations very much smaller than the Steel Corporation, where the unions have found it impossible to maintain their position against the highly centralized, well-managed, highly financed company. Such corporations as a means of overcoming union influence and democratization frequently grant their employees more in wages and comforts than the union standard demands. But "man can not live by bread alone." Men must have industrial liberty as well as good wages.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that the existing State and Federal legislation is adequately and properly drawn to provide against abuses in industry, so far as the employees are concerned?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have grave doubt as to how much can be accomplished by legislation, unless it be to set a limit upon the size of corporate units. I believe in dealing with this labor problem as in dealing with the problem of credit. We must meet this question.

Chairman WALSH. Of what? Excuse me.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Size. And in dealing with the problem of industrial democracy there underlies all of the difficulties the question of the concentration of power. This factor so important in connection with the subject of credit and in connection with the subject of trusts and monopolies is no less important in treating the labor problem. As long as there is such concentration of power no effort of the workmen to secure democratization will be effective. The statement that size is not a crime is entirely correct when you speak of it from the point of motive. But size may become such a danger in its results to the community that the community may have to set limits. A large part of our protective legislation consists of prohibiting things which we find are dangerous, according to common experience. Concentration of power has been shown to be dangerous in a democracy, even though that power may be used beneficially. For instance, on our public highways we put a limit on the size of an autotruck, no matter how well it is run. It may have the most skillful and considerate driver, but its mere size may make it something which the community can not tolerate, in view of the other uses of the highway and the danger inherent in its occupation to so large an extent by a single vehicle.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon has a few questions he would like to ask.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Brandeis, in speaking with regard to the physical betterment that has come about in some instances in these great industries, did you mean to indicate that these physical betterments were not something of an element toward progress, toward democratic manhood?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think they contribute a very material amount, provided they do not result in a bribe to forego that which is more important.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, to apply it to the work that the unions have done for physical betterment, increase of wages and limitation of the hours and the elimination of children like in the coal industry.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Oh, I think those are all positive gains, unqualified gains.

Commissioner LENNON. Gains for manhood?

Mr. BRANDEIS. They are all gains for manhood; and we recognize that manhood is what we are striving for in America. We are striving for democracy; we are striving for the development of men. It is absolutely essential in order that men may develop that they be properly fed and properly housed, and that they have proper opportunities of education and recreation. We can not reach our goal without those things. But we may have all those things and have a nation of slaves.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, in speaking of the exercise of power by those that acquire it through any means, what is your view as to the exercise of power in foundations, like the Rockefeller Foundation and the Russell Sage Foundation—the possibility of that power being applied not for the welfare of humanity, but whether or not there will be difficulties likely for the people to overcome the exercise of that power some time in the future.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have never given that subject very close study, and I have never questioned any way that those foundations arose from the highest motives. So far as I have known anything about them, they express a desire, a zealous purpose to aid humanity. But I have such faith in democracy and such a distrust of the absence of it that I have felt a grave apprehension at times as to what might ultimately be the effect of these foundations when the control shall have passed out of the hands of those who at present are administering them to those who may not be governed by the excellent intent of the creators.

Commissioner LENNON. That is, the creation of such institutions does bring into being a great power that is possible of application not for the good of humanity but sometimes under different directions?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It is. I mean it is creating the power and we do not know into what hands it ultimately may get and how it may be used. And I think there is this also in regard to it. It seems to me on the whole inconsistent with our democratic aspirations. I have, and I think many must have, a grave apprehension as to some of the great educational endowments of the so-called private universities in contrast with the State universities. I think we are fortunate in having in this country both the one and the other; and that other foundations, if they are not too large, may be very beneficial; provided always that there are other forces in governmental agencies which can counteract them. Still I can not help feeling a certain apprehension as to later results of these foundations.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has some questions he would like to ask.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The question, Mr. Brandeis, has been put to various witnesses that have come before us, as to what, in their opinion, was the prime remedy for industrial unrest, and different witnesses have offered different remedies. One has suggested that the prime remedy in modern industry is scientific management with a bonus system; another has suggested arbitration; still another, mediation and conciliation; yet another, profit sharing; another has expressed the opinion that the remedy lies along the line of legal minimum wage. I take it your prime remedy for industrial unrest, from what you have said this morning, is a condition of industrial democracy?

Mr. BRANDEIS. That is fundamental, and I should adopt each one of these five remedies that you have named also as in incident, as an aid.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As subsidiary?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; as subsidiary.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But the prime remedy, in your opinion, is industrial democracy?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is the first, the essential?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; it is not only a prime remedy, but absolutely essential.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Will you tell us, please, Mr. Brandeis, whether your opinion is that this industrial democracy should be voluntary or compulsory?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do not believe it can be made compulsory at the present time.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let us be sure, please, that we understand alike the meaning of industrial democracy. I understand by industrial democracy a condition whereby the worker has a voice in the management of the industry—a voice in its affairs. Do we agree on that?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes, sir; and not only a voice but a vote; not merely a right to be heard, but a position through which labor may participate in management.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Has a right of action in regard to its affairs?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; the power contributing to action—of participating in action.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Returning, then, to the question as to whether you would make that voluntary or compulsory, what do you say?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think that certainly for the present it should be made voluntary, and the great work now is the work of education. I referred a few moments ago to a protocol in the garment trade, and I think the accomplishment in that trade—in the cloak, suit, and skirt trade—to my mind, the most promising indications in the American industrial world.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. To what degree, in the garment industry, as conducted in New York, does labor have a voice?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Labor has a voice in this way: The protocol which was adopted on September 2, 1910, did this: In the first place it removed certain known grievances—long hours and a number of other grievances incident to the ordinary conduct of business which were then specified, and, among other things, the removal of insanitary conditions. Such results are accomplished by many agreements between the union and employers. But it went very much further. It created a system of government for employers on the one hand and employees on the other hand. In many agreements between employers and unions you find a provision for a grievance committee, but such committees are only for occasional use. The protocol establishes a government with administrative officers, courts, and a legislature always ready to take up questions arising in the trade.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean it is a continuous performance?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It is absolutely as continuous as our political Government. They have a well-equipped office on both sides. There are hundreds of manufacturers operating under the cloak, suit, and skirt protocol—the oldest one of the existing protocols—and perhaps 22,000 or 30,000 workers directly employed in about 500 shops.

The questions arising there, in view of the character of the industry, are very numerous, and the officials of the union on the one hand and of the employers on the other hand are constantly passing upon these questions.

The regular paid officers, like administrators in the city or State government, act from day to day and many times a day on questions presented. But besides there come up from time to time questions more serious and far-reaching, similar to questions submitted to our courts. And there come up other questions, like those we have to submit to our legislatures. These representatives of employers and employees come together to determine the problems of the trade in precisely the same way that members of the legislatures and the judges of the courts come together to decide the matters for the Nation or of the State or of the city. It is participation in the decision of such questions arising between employer and employee which brings those men constantly into relation with each other.

Some of these questions are very difficult questions; they are questions which call for the inventive faculties, questions which involve experiments, questions which compel deep thinking. But the representatives of employer and employee called together to solve those questions have come to realize that the problems which arise are problems of the trade and not problems of one side or the other of a controversy; that no satisfactory solution can be reached by shifting the responsibility and getting rid of the question by throwing the burden on to the other side, saying, "The fault is yours; solve the problem." Most of the members of this industrial government have come to recognize that conscious fault or wrongdoing on either side is rather uncommon.

Their board of arbitration, of which I have acted as chairman, is not an arbitration board acting like one settling a strike. It is comparable rather to the highest court of appeal on judicial questions and occasionally Congress on legislative questions.

Early in the history of the protocol there was often the claim that one side or the other was at fault; there was mutual recrimination, such as is constantly occurring in controversies between employer and employee. Now the attitude is just the opposite.

At one of the most heated hearings last year one of the employers came to me, who had been very bitter in the earlier days and said, "We can not do this thing that the union wants; but if I were the union representative, I should ask for the same thing." Now, that is the way they approach the problems, each side recognizing that the other person has rights. And when there is a conflict, it is seen that usually this presents a condition to be remedied; that it is the joint obligation of both sides to remedy it; that they must get together and work out the problem if the difficulty is to be removed. They recognize that it is the business of both sides.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it that in this particular industry, there is an earnest and sincere effort on both sides to find equity?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It is not merely to find equity—that is one thing. I think as a rule we have gotten past the point, except in the heat of individual questions that come up—but usually both sides desire equity. They have reached now a desire to solve industrial problems, and the recognition that the problems of the employer can not be solved by shifting them onto the employee, and that the problems of the employee can not be solved by shifting them onto the employer; that some way must be found to arrive at the cause of the difficulty, to remove that cause, and relieve the trade, as a whole, from the crushing burden. That is a hopeful attitude, and it is the only attitude that can lead to the solution of these industrial difficulties.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How many of these suggested remedies are embodied in the conditions that prevail in the garment industry of New York—scientific management with bonus, is that a part of it?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it has a recognition. I think they recognize, as I believe all intelligent and enlightened thinkers will recognize, that the only way to permanently and appreciably better the condition of labor, is to increase productivity and to eliminate the waste. That is what scientific management is. It means merely getting more with less effort. It means stopping all waste effort either in the exertion of the individuals or in goods. Just how you are going to apply the principle is a matter of detail. It is most important that it shall be applied democratically. It can not be successfully applied otherwise in the long run; that is, both employer and employee must come to recognize the fact that the elimination of waste is beneficial to both sides and that they must cooperate to produce the best results and the most effective methods of production. That condition is recognized under the agreement of the protocol referred to, not by express declaration in the protocol, but by the action and attitude of the leaders.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Before I put my next question I want to preface it by asking another question to lay the foundation. You and I have heard a great deal about overproduction and underconsumption. Now, as an economic student do you believe there is such a thing as overproduction, or is it because of underconsumption?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It think it is underconsumption, or maladjustment in distribution. I think it is entirely true that at a given time you may have produced an amount that the market can not take. You may disarrange conditions or produce an article which the market does not want. But we have not the power to produce more than there is a potential desire to consume.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, so long as there are hungry mouths and naked bodies in the world there can not be overproduction?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Not only hungry mouths and naked bodies, but there are many other things that people want.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, if we are laboring under a condition of underconsumption rather than of overproduction, is it or is it not wise to minimize production?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I believe it is one of the greatest economic errors to put any limitation upon production. If we took all the property there is in the country to-day and distributed it equally among the people of the country, we should not improve conditions materially. The only way in which we can bring that improvement in the condition of the workers which Mr. Lennon referred to, and in which I heartily agree, is to make not only the worker but all the people produce more so that there will be more to divide.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Then to see to it that the division is a fair division.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly.

Mr. BRANDEIS. And I have felt in connection with scientific management, with the introduction of that method of producing more, that we ought to make up for the opportunity we lost when we changed from hand labor to machine labor. I think it is perfectly clear that when that change was made the employer got more than he ought to have got; and labor did not get its share, because labor was not organized. Now, when labor is to a very considerable extent organized, labor ought to insist upon scientific management. It has a just cause of complaint if a business is not well managed. Then, when the proceeds of good management are secured, labor ought to insist upon getting its share; and, as I have said, I think its share ought to be large, because of the reason that when machines were introduced labor did not get its share.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, assuming Mr. Brandeis, that our machinery for distribution was perfected so that everything that we produced reached the parties that needed it, and it was placed within his power to buy—assuming that, then the more that was produced under those circumstances, the more there would be to divide between employer and worker. Is that not right?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think that is; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, if I, as your fellow worker, should advocate or advise you to minimize your output, would I be your friend or your enemy?

Mr. BRANDEIS. A condition might well arise where it might be to my individual benefit to restrict production, but the benefit to labor as a whole would be immensely advanced by increasing production. We ought to develop enlightened unselfishness, as a substitute for the old, so-called, enlightened selfishness; and enlightened unselfishness would give us all a great deal more than we have.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And while it is undisputed, and would be, I think, that organized labor officially has never advocated a diminished output, yet the general opinion is that unofficially many branches of organized labor look with favor upon a diminished output. Do you regard that as a wise or unwise thing?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Unwise. I think it is due probably to two causes. In the first place it has an historical cause. Workingmen have known that in a great many instances employers encouraged an increased output, particularly when business was depressed, and then when earnings grew large they cut the rate of pay. In that way increased profits have resulted not necessarily in a decrease of pay, but not in a corresponding increase in the wages of the worker. That was unfair. The employees were thus cheated in a great many cases by individual employers; and in many minds has arisen the belief that labor will not gain by increased production. That this is going to be perhaps it. Now, that is the historical cause. It is merely an instance showing how the wrongful act of each person is injuring an immense number of other persons, how one employer has the capacity to injure a thousand employees.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see.

Mr. BRANDEIS. That is one thing.

The other thing is, I think, uneconomic thinking. Many labor leaders have regarded demand as static, as something fixed. They have therefore assumed that if there is a hundred per cent to divide, it will last longer if we each do less, and it will go further. That I believe to be absolutely unsound, as shown by experience. There is no fixed demand. Demand is capable of almost any degree of expansion. It is partly this unfortunate lack of confidence in employers, as a whole, and partly a failure to recognize the results of economic experience to which the tendency of many labor leaders to restrict production by the individual worker is due.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, Mr. Brandeis, you, in your position, are not an employer nor are you a wage earner. You have been an economic student.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; and to a great extent an adviser both of employers and of wage earners.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Exactly. Now, for the information of the commission, will you be good enough to point out, Mr. Brandeis, what you have observed to be the mistakes of employers in dealing with labor. Will you brief them?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think the main mistake that the employers have made has been a failure to acquire understanding of the conditions and facts concerning labor. There has been ignorance in this respect on the part of employers—ignorance due in large part to lack of imagination. Employers have not been able to think themselves into the labor position. They do not understand labor and many successful business men have never recognized that labor presents the most important problem in the business. One of the ablest business men I ever came in contact with, and who later made some very important advances in dealing with labor problems, said to me when I first had occasion to discuss a pressing labor problem with him "I want to take up the labor question when I get around to it." He had been proceeding for years with a reorganization of his business in all other respects—in respect to distribution, in respect to financing and factory organization—but he postponed taking up the labor question until he should be through with all the other problems. Now, he was a man who looked upon business as applied science—as something to be thought out. His was a master mind; he was also a man of splendid heart and character in every way. But he had held the traditions generally prevailing that labor was something you could leave to the superintendents of your factories. He held an attitude similar to that which the chairman called attention to as being the attitude of directors who had testified here. Instead of recognizing that in most businesses the labor problem is the most important one, even from the business standpoint; that if you solve that satisfactorily all other problems are comparatively simple, it had seemed to him one that could be left to a subordinate. The fact that this man, whose record as a business man is very high, both in character and ability, was putting off the labor question until he got through with all the others, shows why labor has been so often misunderstood by employers.

The other cause of employers' difficulties is a failure to think clearly. The employers' refusal to deal with a union is ordinarily due to erroneous reasoning or false sentiment. The man who refuses to deal with the union acts ordinarily from a good motive. He is impressed with "union dictation." He is apt to think "this is my business and the American has the right of liberty of contract." He honestly believes that he is standing up for a high principle and is willing often to run the risk of having his business ruined rather than abandon that principle. They have not thought out clearly enough that liberty means exercising one's rights consistently with a like exercise of rights by other people; that liberty is distinguished from license in that it is subject to certain restrictions, and that no one can expect to secure liberty in the sense in which we recognize it in America without having his rights curtailed in those respects in which it is necessary to limit them in the general public interest. The failure of many employers to recognize these simple truths is a potent reason why employers have not been willing to deal with unions. I think our employers, as a rule, are kind hearted; they mean to do right; they mean to be just; and there is no difference between the men who have fought the hardest against labor unions and those who have yielded to and dealt with labor unions in that respect, except that the former have not had that education which comes from actual active cooperation with unions in the solution of these problems.

I had my first practical experience in dealing with labor problems while acting for manufacturers in the effort to settle or prevent strikes. I found if I wanted to bring about a settlement it was absolutely necessary that the head of the business be brought into the conference. If the employer was a large corporation, nothing less than the president would do, and on the other hand we required the president of the international union to deal with the man in real authority. My effort was to bring these two men together and make each understand the problems of the other. And when I could bring that about, when I could make the union understand the employers' problem and the employer the union's problem, a settlement was almost certain. The next step was to make the individual employee feel that whatever the system of dealing, either through superintendents or otherwise, that there was no individual in that employ who was so insignificant but that if he believed a wrong was done him, he could, in the last analysis, appeal to the highest official of the corporation. When once that principle was established the danger of a rupture between employer and employee was usually passed. The labor men felt faith; they felt that they could deal with the employer in full confidence; and under those circumstances I found that the laboring man would accept the definite statement of the corporation as to what they could afford to pay and what they could not afford to pay. I offered the union representative the opportunity of going through the employer's books; offered them every facility to learn the actual facts and requested their suggestions. They withdrew manfully from the opposition, for they were convinced they were being dealt with fairly, and that the rights of each individual laboring man were recognized as important as those of the biggest official. The corporation operated many factories, but the president was not burdened with numerous appeals. The fact that he recognized that there was nothing more important than the rights of the individual laboring man to human treatment was all the assurance needed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You feel, then, Mr. Brandeis, that one mistake that employers have made is not putting themselves in the other fellow's place?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; in not putting themselves in the other fellow's place is one thing, and not recognizing that in order to put themselves in the other fellow's place they must come into actual contact with him. Now, one of the great things that has been accomplished in the garment trade through this protocol is, that the employers have sat down with the laboring men again and again to deal with individual problems, and these men, no matter how much they differ—and they differ very radically and with the greatest of intensity—have the greatest respect for one another. They have the same respect for one another which opposing lawyers have for each other. Their conflict does not create enmity. The men though contending for exactly the opposite results become friends.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are there any mistakes that employers have made that you care to touch upon?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Well, I think that embodies the principal mistakes. Now, the other thing, which I think is involved in what I have said, is the tendency to deduce a wrong motive from what appears to be a wrong result. In things economic and social, wrong results do not proceed to any very great extent from wrong motives. The motives are, in the main, right, meaning by "motives," intent. But the results sought are very often wrong. People fail to recognize true values. It is failure to recognize things at their real worth which leads to unfortunate results.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On the other hand, Mr. Brandeis, what are the mistakes of organized labor, as you see them?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Well, in many ways they are similar—they are the correlative of the mistakes of the employers.

I think in the first place the commonest mistake is a belief that the employer is earning a tremendous amount of money at the expense of labor. Taking all things into consideration, the employer rarely earns "a tremendous amount of money." He earns in a great many cases far less than is proper for the industry. The margins of earnings in most business is less than it should be—less than is required for safety. The workingmen are mostly unfamiliar with large figures and are misled by them. They do not readily understand percentages, and they do not consider the risk that is involved. Very few workmen appreciate how necessary it is that there should sometimes be large profits in order to set off the losses. Few people care to advertise their losses, but the profits are advertised freely, and very often are exaggerated.

Now, what the employer needs most is to have proper representatives of labor understand the problems of his business; how serious they are, how great is the chance of losing money, how relatively small is the chance of making large profits, and how great is the percentage of failures. Put a competent representative of labor on your board of directors; make him grapple with the problems whether to do or not to do a specific thing, and undertake to balance the advantages and disadvantages presented, and he will get a realizing sense of how difficult it is to operate a business successfully and what the dangers are of the destruction of the capital in the business. A few years ago, when union leaders were demanding from my client an increase in wages, and I asked them: "How much do you think the employer ought to earn before he increases your wages?" they named a figure which was far above his actual earnings, and I said to them, "Gentlemen, the books are open. If you can find either that more is being earned, or can show any way in which the employer can earn more than he is earning, the balance shall go to you." That put the responsibilities upon the labor leaders; they came to realize the difficulties under which the employer was laboring and acquiesced in the situation. The second cause of discord is the natural distrust felt by labor due largely to their lack of knowledge and of opportunities for knowledge.

The third cause is the sense of being subject to the power of the employer. That feeling of subjection can not be removed without changing the conditions under which industry is being carried on. Perhaps the greatest of labor's mistakes is the practice, in many trades or communities, of restricting production. That is a very serious difficulty. Nothing would do so much to win the employer to collective bargaining as action on the part of the labor leaders favoring increased production. If employers could be satisfied that unionism meant increased production and better discipline and that the unions were striving for that result, a large part of the apprehension of employers would be removed and collective bargaining would be wisely extended.

Both labor and employers should bear constantly in mind that each is his brother's keeper; that every employer is injured by any single employer who does labor a wrong; and that every laboring man and every union is injured by every individual unionist who does an employer a wrong. The influence of a single wrongful act by one who can be classified, is tremendous. It affects every other member of the class. When an employer acts improperly toward his employees, it is the business of other employers to see that such conduct is prevented, for his wrong will injure them. And in the same way any lack of fairness and any act of lawlessness on the part of labor is certain to injure other workers and the unions as a whole, and the individual members of labor unions with employers.

Chairman WEINSTOCK. Am I right in assuming, Mr. Brandeis, that if you were a wage earner, you would be a unionist?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Decidedly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, as a wage earner and a unionist, who has abiding at heart the welfare of your fellow workers, what would be your preaching to them?

Mr. BRANDEIS. My first one would be to endeavor to make union men, in their accomplishment and in their conduct, superior to nonunion men, so that a man would want a unionist in his employ as against a nonunion man. It is to raise the effectiveness and the morale and to make every member of a union realize he is a traitor to the cause if he does not do the best that is in his power.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would be your preaching to your fellows on the questions of violence in—

Mr. BRANDEIS (interrupting). Oh, of course, absolutely it must be avoided, because such acts ruin the reputation of labor unions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would you have the unions do to its members who committed violence in labor troubles?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think they ought to discipline them in the most serious way, and that, instead of protecting them where they have been in the wrong, they should be the first to apply corrective measures.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know of any greater enemies to unionism outside of the unions than the unionist lawbreaker?

Mr. BRANDEIS. No; he furnishes the most potent weapon to those fighting the unions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean that he puts a weapon into the hands of the community—

Mr. BRANDEIS (interrupting). He does—he puts it there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were an employer, on the other hand, Mr. Brandeis, and had to deal with an unreasonable union, a union which would come to you and thereat that unless you acceded to certain demands that you knew were unfair and unreasonable, they would strike, what would you do?

Mr. BRANDEIS. If it was clear that they were unfair and unreasonable, I think the only thing to do is to resist, either on the part of the union or on the part of the employer ultimately, unless there is some way of settling this by arbitration; and I believe it should not be an arbitration specially created for the purpose, but it should be an existing government, as I have described in the case of the protocol. It seems to me, then, in the absence of such machinery, the only thing to do, if you are sure you are right, or, rather, if you are sure that the other person is wrong, is to resist to the end. That is the only thing you can do, unless you have created a government which is the substitute for force. Valuable as mediation has been, valuable as are the offices of the public officials in trying to bring people together when there is a difficulty, such arbitration usually involves substituting for the decision of the parties who know something, the decision of somebody else who knows practically nothing.

But if you have a continuing government in which these questions are being taken up from day to day and grievances are averted rather than settled, the representatives of employer and employee learn to respect each other's intelligence as well as each other's motives. There are very few difficulties which can not be adjusted by a careful discussion of the facts. But then the parties should come before their tribunal not with demands, but with requests. Demand should be resisted. Requests should be carefully considered; and upon proper consideration and the development of relevant facts a satisfactory solution is apt to be found.

During a long period in which I undertook to adjust matters between employers and employees, although the agreements contained provision for arbitration, the problems were settled through investigation and discussion and not by arbitration. Usually the facts were found to be something different from that which either party had supposed them to be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. This question of the union being—taking up the punishment of members for alleged violation of law, and that sort of thing, I suppose what you have said in that regard applies just the same to the employer?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Absolutely; absolutely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And that there is no more lawbreaking on one side than the other?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have no question but that there is equality in that respect. Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Brandeis, we have had before our commission on a number of occasions during our sitting here so far, large captains of industry connected with large corporations who speak of their belief that men have the right to organize and should organize, but they do not want to recognize them as an organization. They speak of being willing to do so if they were a good organization. Now, in your experience with a large number of employers and employees, and the adjustments with which you have been associated you have probably heard the expression or heard it said that there were good and bad unions. Could you give this commission some idea of what is meant by a good union?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Well, I don't think very much of the distinction between a good and a bad union, that there is anything very clear there. There are good and bad corporations and good and bad unions and good and bad individuals. I think we have got to deal with all of them; but how we deal with them will depend very much on the character of the individual.

There are unions, as there are corporations, where the only way you can deal with them is to deal with them by war until they are properly managed; but to recognize them is something you ought to do anyhow; that is, the idea that you won't recognize them, the idea that you won't talk with them, the idea that you won't communicate with them seems to me to be entirely erroneous. They are there, and you must recognize them reasonably. You are doing a perfectly foolish thing if you do not recognize them. But if they do not behave properly, do not behave decently in the ordinary relations of men, the only thing to do, in the absence of some tribunal or some government which will make them behave properly through its power, is to recognize them as belligerents instead of recognizing them as friends and allies and associates.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Various employers give various reasons for their refusal to treat with organized labor or their employees jointly, preferring to treat in the open field, as they say, with the individual worker, thus not interfering with a man's American rights, citizenship, and so on. And among the things that they assign as reasons for not wanting to deal with organized labor is that it is unincorporated. Do you think that is a justifiable reason?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Oh, I think not. I think there is nothing whatever to that. In fact, if labor is to incorporate, I suppose it would be rather for its own protection than the protection of the other side, that it would be necessary.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Be rather in a corporate form where it would be placing itself in a position to be constantly dragged before the courts and justices of the peace and mulcted and so on?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have thought myself that labor's apprehension of incorporation was largely unfounded; but I see no reason whatever why an employer should say, "We won't deal with you because you are not incorporated"; that is, there seems to me to be no reason in the world why an employer should say it. On the other hand, I have thought that many of the reasons given by labor unions for not incorporating were not sound reasons. I think it is really a question of no very great importance. And the main reason that I would suggest to labor, or might suggest, why they should incorporate would be to remove this more or less groundless idea on the part of employers that there was something in incorporation which would put a union on an equality with the corporation itself. I don't believe there is anything in it of any intrinsic importance, however.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you believe the officials of the organizations of labor should have the power and authority vested in them by their members so as to speak for them and bind them the same as the president of a corporation should or has?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Well, I think it very important—of course, that differs with different questions. The union is a democratic organization and it differs from the corporation in respect to the fact that in a corporation it is money that votes; that is, a man with 50,000 shares has more voice than the man with one share—legally. I think it is important that the officers should, so far as possible, be vested with a discretion, because I think in important matters it is essential that they should have that discretion in order to get the best possible terms when they are negotiating. But we have got to recognize that a union is a democracy, and therefore the officials should in some form have the confirmation of the members of the union of what they are doing so far as possible.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You believe the organization of the wage workers in their unions, be they good or bad or indifferent, have been of some service in improving their opportunities in life.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Oh, of very great service.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. One of the largest employers heard before the commission here in answer to a question said that he believed that conditions would be as good, and industrial benefits to workingmen, as they are, if there had not been organization at all.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think they would have been intolerable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You think just the reverse?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You believe that all things, except possibly the question of wages, and that even not minimum wage, should be regulated by law?

Mr. BRANDEIS. No; I think the question of what we should regulate by law is purely a question to be determined by experience. We should not regulate anything by law except where an evil exists which the existing forces of unionism or otherwise, labor, are unable to deal with it. You can not lay down any better rule than this, that it is desirable that people should be left with the powers of free contract between one another except so far as experience shows that the existing forces will prevent contracts fair in their results. The provisions made law for the protection of women and children or for sanitary conditions and safety of all wage earners are justified, so far and only so far as experience shows that without them we shall suffer evils. We ought to go as far as, from time to time, it may be necessary to protect the community from those evils, but no further. How far we must go will vary in different communities. And we can very well see that in certain trades; for instance, where there is a complete organization there may be no need for legislation, because the trade-unions are able to protect the workers. In other trades and other communities where organization is absent for any reason, such as lack of public education or sex, it may be necessary to enter upon the field of legislation in order that the great public needs may be preserved.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Do you believe the fact that there has been an organization of the wage workers in our time in this country, that it has had a tempering effect upon the—sort of a keeping of them down—in other words, having an effect of the prevention of trouble and prevention of violence.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it has been a very conservative tendency.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Hasn't it had an educating effect upon the wage workers?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Undoubtedly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And no other influences had any more educational effect?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I don't know of any.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has the single individual as a wage worker or wealth producer in our town any opportunity or chance, as an individual, to protect and take care of himself and get right and justice as a wage worker?

Mr. BRANDEIS. He has not in many trades and many occupations.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am speaking of the unorganized individual.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think there are some occupations where he probably has, and in some industries where he has; but it is a question of the relation of force. When you have a large employer, who not only is large in size but who has large means, and who can exert those means in summoning aid in any contest, and has great power of endurance, there the individual has no standing against him. If you make that unit large enough, as in case of the Steel Corporation, even the existence of a union will leave the individual worker practically without protection.

As an industry develops into a larger unit, the chances of the individual being able to protect himself diminishes. Self-protection is possible only where real freedom of contract exists. The only freedom the individual worker has is to leave and go to another employer. But if that is the only alternative and the other employer is equally as large, then the worker passes from pillar to post, and he has no protection at all. But where the situation is that the workman has some other alternative or where the employer needs the workman as much as the workman needs the employer, he may get protection, even without being a member of a union. But such cases are growing constantly less.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Has not whatever consideration he does get—is it not based upon consideration that has been brought about by or through the unions of organized men—what they have set as a basis?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think very largely, directly or indirectly, and I think that the unions have to a very considerable extent improved the conditions in non-union factories; sometimes more than they have in union factories. Owners of the nonunion factories often seek to keep out unionism by "going the unions one better."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just one question on the efficiency matter.

From the discussion back and forth between yourself and Commissioner Weinstock, I want to ask if the sole purpose of the employer in introducing the efficiency into his business, is for the purpose of increasing output, that the great public may be benefited by it? Has he no other motive, no other purpose, no other consideration of the workman to be better and more powerful?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; I think there are a large number and a rapidly increasing number of employers whose purposes are laudable from every standpoint; from the standpoint of improving the condition of labor and of serving the community as well as serving themselves. We have in this country to an extraordinary degree an awakening of desire on the part of employers to improve the conditions of labor, and to be of service to the public as a whole.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And—

Mr. BRANDEIS (interrupting). Of service to themselves.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And as a business proposition at the basis, at the best?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Business men have come to recognize that you can not serve yourself well without serving the public, and I think the desire of a great many employers is just as great to serve the employees and the public as it is to serve themselves.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In your experience as a lawyer, and having dealt for the employer and with the employer, for labor and with labor, and the opportunity that you have had of studying this matter, have you, in all that, heard of a union being in favor of waste?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do not think I have ever known of a union which would declare that it was in favor of waste.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am speaking now not of soldiering of someone?

Mr. BRANDEIS. No; that would be the work of the individual man. But I have known of a good many instances where the union men were in favor of that which was waste, although they did not put it in that way; that they believed mistakenly in wasteful practices, just as employers have believed mistakenly as to what was for their own best interest or perhaps the best interest of the community. I think the work that is necessary among the unions, among a great many leaders, as well as among the rank and file, is education to make them realize that they are doing harm to other union men and to the community at large when they are not doing the best work and the most work they can. The need is, of course, not confined to unionists, it is equally needed among nonunion men.

In connection with scientific management, I heard an interesting illustration of just how the possibility of increasing production affects the mind of the individual worker. One of my friends was at an exposition in England where he saw a girl pasting labels upon a box. She was doing it apparently very rapidly and with great dexterity. As a matter of fact, looking at the process with his trained mind, my friend saw that she was making about three times the number of motions that were really necessary. She did not have the boxes at the right place; she did not have the labels at the right place; she did not have the paste at the right place; and so she was wasting a great deal of effort. He said to his friend, "I am going to see whether I can get her to do it in another way." And he induced her to undertake to put on the labels in his way. After considerable demur she consented to try it. He had with him a stop watch and timed her. She said, "I told you I couldn't do it as rapidly your way"; but as a matter of fact she had done the work twice as rapidly, even the first time that she tried the new method. She was quite interested when she learned this.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. With no additional energy, with no additional expenditure of energy?

Mr. BRANDEIS. With much less. A fortnight afterwards he came back and found she was doing the work in the old way—

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Was the energy on her part increased or decreased?

Mr. BRANDEIS. No, indeed; the energy required was less. When he came back again in a fortnight she was doing the work in the old way. He asked her why, and she said, "Well, as I thought it over I concluded that I would not get any more money for doing more work and I was taking away work from somebody else. So I thought I would return to the old way of doing it."

Now, that is what I believe is happening quite generally without any wrongful intention to waste, but by reason of false economic doctrine. Of course, the unjust action in the past is one of the causes. But confidence and appreciation of economic truths are essential to prevent such waste.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Brandeis, you spoke of probably your first experience in adjusting disputes between employers and employees while with a very large concern, and that you finally made agreements with the unions and worked with them. Has that continued ever since with the unions and dealt with them?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It did throughout the life of the employer who made the agreement.

Commissioner BALLARD. When later, however, it was replaced.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Well, there came changes—and there were two changes, changes in personnel and also changes in size. The business grew to be several times as large, for it was very successful. With that increase in size and the sense of power there was less patience with the demands of labor. I think the motive was good; yet there came a different attitude toward labor.

Commissioner BALLARD. It has been said, I have frequently heard it and sometimes read it, that one objection to the labor unions was, in the building trades where they organized plants, that every man was put on exactly the same basis; that individual effort was discouraged; individual ambition was discouraged; in fact, the man that did a little more than a certain task was held back by being told that he must not set such a pace, and that therefore the ambition of the common man was to some extent deterred and held down by the union principle. Has that been your experience?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have observed instances of that, just as on the other hand there are other trades in which there is a complete absence of any such thing. For instance, I had a great deal to do with the boot and shoe workers; and it was a common experience to find two men, one close to another, one might earn twice as much as his neighbor.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is probably in piecework.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Piecework.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke in answer to a question of Commissioner Weinstock and gave four or five things that you looked upon as being—well, among others, I understood you to mention the minimum wage.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. I think in our study of industrial conditions a minimum wage is bound to come into the question. I think it would not be out of place if, perhaps, you could tell your views of the minimum wage.

Mr. BRANDEIS. Whether or not the minimum wage should be adopted or not would depend upon the conditions in the particular community and trade to which it applies. There ought not to be any adjudication establishing minimum wage unless an evil exists that can not be remedied otherwise. In many of the trades in which women are employed the data ascertained show that a very large percentage of the women are earning less, and in many cases much less, than is required for decent support, and that this condition is so definitely fixed that there appears to be no way of eradicating it except by the compulsory processes of law. Where that condition does exist it seems to me society demands that the law should interfere, just as it has interfered by limiting the hours of labor for women, the times in which they may work and the periods of rest.

The question presented is one of fact and not of theory. The principle is perfectly clear that you ought not to interfere with the right of contract unless society demands that you should. But, the principle is equally clear that we should interfere with the right of contract so far as the conditions make it necessary in order to protect the community—present and future generations.

The condition is such in many of our industrial communities that this necessity exists. The women in industry are largely unorganized; they are largely untrained, being to a great extent in business only for a short time; the percentage of the young and inexperienced is large. In all those respects their condition differs from that of men, and the consequence of their receiving less than a decent wage is far more serious than in the case of men. It is necessary, therefore, for the protection of society that we should fix or rather create boards which can upon investigation fix a minimum wage, having due regard to the position of employers as well as of the employee. And in fixing a minimum wage, it merely sets up a prohibition designed to protect the community from social danger.

We set up a prohibition that a person can not be an engineer upon a railroad or a stationary engineer unless he has had certain training. We set up the prohibition that a man can not operate an elevator unless he has reached a certain age. There are certain prohibitions which society has found it necessary, just as prohibitions about tenement houses and the like to protect the public health, safety, and general welfare. I believe that experience in many instances has shown that that condition exists in respect to women workers in industry calling for intervention in certain trades and communities. So far as it does exist and is serious, there is need of the interposition of the law to protect the communities and to protect the race against evils that are incident to such a condition.

Commissioner BALLARD. Rather than have the legislature make and fix a minimum wage you would have a board which should in special cases, perhaps, by consideration of the various cases, fix a minimum wage in those places?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it is absolutely clear that there ought not to be any general rule; for there can not be a general rule that is fair and just. The conditions as to what should be the minimum wage, what is the least on which you could live in the city of New York, is very different than what it is in some small village up the State. The conditions are different in different trades and occupations—the minimum wage in a department store, for instance, ought to be higher than the minimum wage in a factory, because the girl in the department store has to dress well all the time and that costs money. You ought to take into consideration locality and conditions; and in introducing the minimum we should also take into consideration the ability of the employer and give him time to make the change. Any law which undertakes to fix a definite wage as a minimum wage for the whole State is absolutely unscientific and uneconomic and would tend to create a great deal of suffering.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Brandeis, in following out your investigations on efficiency systems, have you come in contact, in any great degree, with the personality of the men themselves affected thereby?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have to some extent.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you found—have you or have you not found that a very large part of the objection on the part of the workman who has heretofore not had a voice in fixing the conditions of his service is founded on the position of absolutism assumed by the expert himself as a representative of industry?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think that is true.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe it will ever be accepted by the men until their right to a voice in things is recognized as well as in other conditions?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think not and I do not think it ought to be.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe that a proper corollary of scientific management would be a scientific method of distribution of the earnings or profits of the industry?

Mr. BRANDEIS. There is no such thing as a scientific distribution. When you get to the question of division of profits that is a question for the exercise of judgment and discretion, except so far as it may be a field for the exercise of power. But there ought not to be, to my mind, the slightest difference between the employer and the employee as to determining that they are going to earn the greatest amount they can; that is, to produce the greatest amount they can produce, consistently with the physical and mental health of the individual. That is a matter on which men ought not to differ in intent at all. Then having found that you can produce two, or in some instances three times as much as you did by some old rule of thumb method—when you find that out, then there is room for difference as to how the added profit shall be divided. Then the two sides should bargain with one another; but except as to the matter of dividing the profits the interests of employer and employee should be recognized as the same. No man ought to be required to work harder or in a different way from that which is consistent with the maintenance of health, but he ought to work as hard as he can consistently with that. There ought to be unity of purpose until you come to a division of the increased profits, and then the two sides should bargain with one another in a large-minded way. As I stated in answer to a question of Mr. Weinstock, I think the time has come when labor should get the larger share of the increased profit.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Science is quite sufficient in producing but falls down in dividing?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Absolutely. I do not think science knows anything about the division of the excess profit; that is, for question of human judgment and discretion.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Or inhuman in some cases?

Mr. BRANDEIS. We refuse to recognize that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There is one phase of the creation of foundations which I would like to have your opinion on, and that is not applied to any one, but to the idea of their creation. Do you believe a method of self-perpetuation of control is a safe principle as applied to institutions of that class?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Self-perpetuation—absolute self-perpetuation?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I am afraid of it, and yet I recognize the great difficulty in suggesting a substitute. I think that also is a very difficult thing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I do not question the difficulty thereof. It is only whether or not there is danger in that principle when improperly exercised.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have no question about that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It is the potential, and not the actual exercise at any given period.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think that is clear.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe that the possession of unlimited power—and I am using the word “unlimited” only in the sense of untrammelled power or unlimited wealth—destroys the sense of proportion in the individual possessing it?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If that is correct, do you hold—do you believe that a concentration of such power in the hands of any individual could be safely transmitted?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it can not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Does the possession of that sense of power, or its concentration, always of necessity go with the possession of wealth, in the same unlimited degree?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Oh, no. I think some people have a sense of power that is so potent that it overrides all other questions with them. In other people there is a sense of duty. They are weighted down by the responsibility of their position and it may affect them in a very different way. But the creation of great power ordinarily does prevent the exercise of proper judgment and it is not safe in a democracy.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not historic that the possession of the source of wealth has always created or given that power?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it has; and it is particularly dangerous when the power is transmitted from those who have amassed wealth to those who have not done anything to earn it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Who have not touched the ground themselves?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; and who have not had what is frequently the ennobling experience of creating it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. From your connection with investigations, I should be glad to have an expression from you on two conflicting opinions that have been given before this commission, because it seems to me that you have had unexampled opportunity for determining which of the two might have a foundation in fact. It has been testified to before this commission that control—financial control—of industrial and transportation interests can be traced to certain well-defined banking groups. Another witness criticized that statement as absurd. If you feel free to tell us from your experience and information I would be glad to know whether you think such control can be traced?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I believe it perfectly clear that it can be traced, and I believe the difference of opinion to which you refer is due to a difference of definition. Those who deny control are using that word “control” in a very restricted sense. They mean that these particular individuals have not definitely said, “This thing shall be done and that thing shall not be done.” But, as a matter of fact, control is exercised and exercised to an extraordinary degree by the existence of a great power whom people believe and usually have reason to believe, would be pleased or displeased with the adoption or rejection of a given course. Great power controls without issuing orders.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You were asked a little while ago as to what would be your style of preaching to employees, if you were a union man. I am rather curious to know one thing, because your experience has been wide in dealing with the two interests in the matter that is before us, and according to your own statement you entered into it originally on the ground of an adviser of the employer. The question was asked you about only the legal phase of this preaching, and I am going to ask only about certain legal phases of the other side. In your experience, have you ever known an instance where an employer was in any way disciplined by any association or combination—local or general, national or international—with which you are connected, for violation of law, even after he had been convicted by the courts for such law violation, let alone violation of labor contracts?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have known, in connection with the garment workers' protocol of employers being disciplined, not only where there was violation of law but where there was violation of rules of fair and honorable dealings with the union. A number of them have been disciplined by fines and a number of them have been disciplined by expulsion from the organization.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Good. Have you ever known of any other association of men that have done it?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do not now recall any instance of employers, either in organizations or outside of organizations, who have undertaken to discipline members of their craft for dealing unjustly with employees.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Brandeis.

Mr. BRANDEIS. There may be such, but I do not happen to recall them.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you not believe that a wide dissemination of that knowledge, that the association had done such a thing, would be of more value in the minds of laboring men in establishing honest methods of procedure than any other one agency?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do, and I think more than that. I believe that in regard to dealing with not only labor, but all problems where, for instance, capital is being unjustly attacked, as it is many times attacked, as well as justly, that there is no possible way of bringing about justice in the protection of classes, except the assumption by the class of the obligation of making the members of that class conform to proper moral standards; that the injustice that many railroads are suffering from to-day results from the transgression of individual railroads; that the injustice that bankers are suffering from, as a whole, is because of the transgression of individual bankers, and that this is due in large measure to the fact that there was not a recognition of the occupational or professional obligation. Each class has an obligation for its own protection, as well as that of the community, of being the one that sees to it that the higher standards of that organization are lived up to by its members. I do not think you can secure justice in any other way.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a fact, perfectly apparent to all familiar with the question, that many unions discipline every member that violates his agreement with his employer and often replace him if he has to abandon the service?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I have known one instance in connection with the boot and shoe workers' union where the union spent at that time $100,000 to fill its contract to supply workers where the workmen went out on a strike as a result of the union contract.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Mr. Brandeis, do you think that Government ownership of public utilities would be of any advantage to labor?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I am uncertain whether it would or not. It might, perhaps, produce at the time more content, but I am not certain that it would in the end produce more content. It would depend upon what government it was; what community, and how it was administered. I doubt whether the question could be answered in the affirmative or in the negative comprehensively.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. You do not know any advantages, for example, that the employees of the Post-Office Department have over employees of private express companies?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I should think, that on the whole, the post-office employee had, at all events, the advantage of being happier, more content, and that they have, on the whole, less of a feeling of not being treated fairly. I should say that the employees of the Federal Government have generally a sense of being fairly treated, and that they do not feel that they are subject to absolutist control. That is a very large element in their feeling happier. They feel they are a part of the organization, particularly where they have been selected under civil-service rules.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. One more question, please. In your opinion, has labor in this country anything to fear from immigration?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think it has in certain ways; but I believe that the proper method of meeting these dangers is not to restrict immigration except as to definitely unfit classes.

Chairman WALSH. Prof. Commons would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. I would like to ask a question on the legal aspect of this matter of the obligation of directors to their stockholders. Suppose the directors should start out to adopt a policy of paying considerably higher than the market rate of wages. Say that the wages were $2 or $3 a day and they should put the wages up to $5. Would a minority stockholder have a right to go into court and get an injunction against the directors on the ground that it was something like the dissipation of funds? That they were taking away from the stockholders property which they really had in trust for the stockholders? What is the law at the present time, or is there any law that would touch that?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes; I think there is a general rule of law that could be properly applied to the case to which you call attention. The rule is that the directors have, in the absence of a vote of the stockholders, the discretion as to the running of the business. The business is a business of money making and it can not be run for benevolence; but it is a business in which the directors have the discretion as to how they shall proceed in order to make money for the company. If the directors believe that the welfare of the business as a whole, present and future, will be best advanced by the payment of larger wages, and that not necessarily the profits of this year, but the profits of years to come—of the future—are going to be best advanced by paying wages far above the standard that ordinarily obtains, I think it is clear that the directors have, as a rule, power to compensate employees in that way. But it is not within their power to raise wages for the purpose of making presents to individuals, except where the additional payments are in pursuance of a plan to secure greater efficiency. You may call these additional payments bonuses or anything you like, if the purpose is to produce a more efficient and more successful organization in the long run, it is wholly within the power of the directors to make them.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would it be a question of fact?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would the courts pass upon it?

Mr. BRANDEIS. What the court would pass upon is whether the directors had reasonable ground to believe that the policy would be profitable. The court might come to the conclusion that the business policy was not correct; it might be proven at the end of five years that it was incorrect to pay such high wages; but that fact alone would be immaterial. The fact that the directors had reasonable ground to believe that the policy pursued was for the financial interest of the company and believe it to be so would justify their action.

Commissioner COMMONS. At what point could the court enjoin such action?

Mr. BRANDEIS. The court could enjoin such action if it was clearly an arbitrary and unreasonable thing to do, considering the financial interests of the company.

Commissioner COMMONS. If, for example, it was shown that dividends were not being paid, would that be evidence?

Mr. BRANDEIS. The mere cessation of dividends would not be proof that the course pursued was unwise. A manufacturer might say, "I am going to make changes in my business which will prevent me from paying any dividend this year and next year, but I expect in the future to earn three times as much as I did before."

Commissioner COMMONS. Would the same thing hold if the State should legislate a minimum wage? Would the court hold that if the legislation affected profits so that dividends could not be paid, would that be unconstitutional?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think the case of the minimum wage is even stronger for the validity of the act, but it presents a different question. What the legislature does in providing a minimum wage is not to compel the payment of any wage, but to prohibit a man doing that in business which is deemed dangerous to the public welfare. It is a prohibitory and not a compulsory law; it is not mandatory that particular wages be paid but a prohibition against employing a person unless at least the minimum wage be paid. There is no difference in principle in prohibiting a man from employing a woman at less than a certain wage, which is to be fixed by such a board as may be appointed, or than in prohibiting her from being employed more than eight hours a day or than in prohibiting the employment of girls under 16 years of age. In each case there is a prohibition of certain things, deemed dangerous to the public welfare. If one looks at the minimum wage law as a safety law, as a protective measure, its value seems clear. It does not compel a man to pay any certain wage; because he is not compelled to employ any person who is not worth, in his opinion, the amount of the minimum wage which is fixed.

Commissioner COMMONS. Assuming that a man has an established business that has been going on, under the existing conditions, and assuming that this minimum wage which is fixed is such a change in the existing condition that it puts him practically in a position of not being able to pay interest on the investment, or possibly on the bonds; could the court enjoin a law of that character?

Mr. BRANDEIS. Not merely because of that. Take the situation that was put to me yesterday by a gentleman high in station in New York, interested largely in the real estate business. He says that as a result of the Triangle Waist Co. fire certain legislation was enacted in regard to the safety of buildings which required changes in factories so extensive as to rob much property of its earning power. Nevertheless that law was constitutional if the requirements were necessary for the public safety. It may be unfortunate for the property owners but if there was reason to believe that those fire precautions were necessary to save life and limb the act would be perfectly constitutional. Precisely the same rule must be applied in regard to the minimum wage.

There is room for the exercise of a wise discretion in determining when and in what trade or community the minimum wage should be applied but the legislative power exists to provide that a business can not be carried on which is injurious to that community; and whether that injury comes through employing persons at wages which are less than a living wage and therefore results in injury to health or morals and to the race, or in increased taxation, or whether it comes from noxious smells or any other nuisance, that would seem to involve different facts but no difference in principle. The right exists generally to legislate so that those things shall not be done which injure the public welfare.

Commissioner COMMONS. I will ask my next question after the noon adjournment.

Chairman WALSH. There will be no session this afternoon. You may go ahead now, Mr. Commons.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would legislation be required in order to protect a board of directors which might decide to raise the wages above the market rate—above the market rate of wages, in order to protect such a board against an injunction that a court might issue on behalf of minority stockholders?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do not think any legislation would be necessary, or any legislation that you could pass would be valid. I mean this: If it is within the principle which I have stated—the principle of raising wages with a view of advancing the interests of the corporation as a whole, then there is no need for legislation. If the proposed legislation is for the purpose of enabling the managers of the corporation to make presents—that is payments which have no relation to an increase in the earning power, then no legislation would be valid which sought to authorize the giving away the money of any existing corporation without the unanimous consent of existing stockholders. There is ample power in the board of directors, as a rule, to provide methods of remuneration. Of course the power is sometimes limited by statute or by-laws; there may be all sorts of limitation which stockholders may have placed upon the power of their directors. In some instances there are restrictions placed by the organic law of the corporation; but as corporations are generally created, and as powers are ordinarily vested in directors in this country, the power does exist in boards of directors to adopt such method of remuneration as in the judgment of the directors will best advance the interests of the corporation, and that would permit paying very high wages—paying bonuses and the like—there is no such thing as a proper market rate of wages for all people, because people vary in efficiency, or at least in their possibilities of efficiency. If a man came to the conclusion that he would have nobody in his employ who was not worth $5 a day, he could undoubtedly succeed in getting men who were just as well worth $5 a day as his neighbors could get people that were worth but $2 a day. With the variable standard of efficiency there is in the strict sense no standard wage applicable to all men.

Commissioner COMMONS. I had thought of asking Mr. Brandeis questions on the boycott, on the open shop, and on the preferential union shop from a legal standpoint, but if you are going to close at this hour, I suppose we can not talk longer at this time, but I can ask him those questions at a later time.

Chairman WALSH. I understand that it will be impossible for Mr. Brandeis to appear again to-day.

Mr. BRANDEIS. I could, perhaps, answer the question as to the preferential shop.

Commissioner COMMONS. I wanted to ask with regard to the legal aspects of it. I understand that the opinion of the courts is that the closed-shop demands of unions is an illegal demand. I think that is the statement of the anthracite-coal strike commission. On the other hand, the records of the anthracite-coal strike commission take the ground that there should be only an open shop. The question is, Has the employer the right to maintain only a nonunion shop if he desires—that is, has he the right to refuse to recognize a union or employ union men? Further, if it is legal to have the closed shop, why should it be legal to prescribe a preferential union shop?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I think the preferential union shop—I have never heard any question raised, and I do not see how any question can be raised, as to the legality of the preferential union shop. The preferential union shop is this: It is a shop in which union standards and conditions prevail, and in which the employer agrees, other things being equal, that he will employ union men—that he will give the union man a preference over a nonunion man. Now, that preferential union shop has seemed to me, certainly in many trades, to be a necessity if we are to have an effective union. I had, in early dealings with labor problems, found this situation to be very common where there was a perfectly honest open shop—that is, where the employer was willing to deal with the union fairly and squarely, making a contract with the union and agreeing with that union that he would not change conditions in his shop except upon negotiation with the union, but allow men in that shop to be either union or nonunion men, the better that worked, the stronger was the tendency of the men to drop out of the union. They felt that they were getting all of the benefits of the union without having to submit to any of its burdens. So a relatively small part of the men had to bear the burden of the union, not only in money, but in the administrative work of the union and in submission to those restrictions which are put upon the members of the union for the common benefit. So in the perfect operation of the union shop, in those instances, conditions existed which undermined the union itself. The very perfection of the operation of the open-shop agreement worked to the detriment of the union. Furthermore, it was unfair and was demoralizing to the nonunion men to get the benefits of the union without in any way contributing either by restriction or by money.

The question then came up as to how you can secure to the employer and others certain liberty of action and at the same time maintain the union. Justice and practical experience showed the necessity of creating some incentive to join the union, and, on the other hand, some disadvantage in not joining the union. On the whole the most advantageous incentive was to give preference in employment to him who joined the union; to say to the man who joins that union, "I will give you preference, but you must be up to the standard; you must be as good as the other man." And if the union can not supply such men, then, that you may take some nonunion man. Under this system the closed shop is avoided. In the preferential union shop certain men are given preference over other men; and that is the principle which underlies the protocol in the garment workers' trade.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you advise unions now giving up the closed-shop idea and asking for the preferential shop?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I do; and I think such a course would remove to a large extent the opposition of employers to unionism, and their refusing to enter into agreements with unions.

(At this point Chairman Walsh retires and Commissioner Lennon takes the chair.)

Commissioner COMMONS. Is your reason legal or given on legal grounds?

Mr. BRANDEIS. It is partly legal, partly sentimental, and partly a recognition of economic rights and a sound social policy.

Commissioner COMMONS. Employers that now stand for the open shop, what is your advice to them?

Mr. BRANDEIS. I should say to those employers who stand for the open shop, that they ought to recognize that it is for their interests as well as that of the community that unions should be powerful and responsible; that it is to their interests to build up the union; to aid as far as they can in making them stronger; and to create conditions under which the unions shall be led by the ablest and most experienced men. A large part of all union activity to-day, and in the past, has been devoted to the struggle for existence; and that fact accounts also for a large part of union excesses. As nearly as possible union existence should be assured so that the efforts of the leaders might be devoted to solving the fundamental and difficult problems of discipline and organization, and the working out of other problems of the trades.

Acting Chairman LENNON. Professor, we would like to adjourn in a moment or two, and some of the other commissioners have given notice that they are going.

Commissioner COMMONS. I have enough to occupy all the afternoon, but I am not going to ask another question.

Acting Chairman LENNON. The commission will then stand adjourned until 10 o'clock Monday morning, January 25, 1915.

(At 12.45 in the afternoon of this Saturday, January 23, 1915, an adjournment was taken until Monday, January 25, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m., in the board of estimates' room at the city hall, Borough of Manhattan, New York City.)

EXHIBITS.

UNTERMYER EXHIBIT.

NEW YORK, February 5, 1915.

HON. FRANK P. WALSH,

Chairman United States Commission on Industrial Relations.

DEAR SIR: In compliance with the request of the commission contained in its communication to me I have had certain facts and figures compiled from official sources in answer to the testimony of Messrs. Schiff and Morgan and in support of the statement made by me at the opening of the investigation to the effect that the potential and eventual control of the majority of the great railroad systems of this country is under the domination of two great banking houses in the city of New York and their allies and associates.

This assertion was not based upon surmise, opinion, or suspicion. It is founded on provable facts and is supported, among other things, by the official findings of a committee of the House of Representatives, concurred in by 10 of the 11 members of that committee, including all the Democratic members and 2 of the 3 Republican members. It is based on the oral and documentary evidence furnished by the representatives of these banking houses and others.

The conclusion that there is such control was not intended to and does not involve an attack upon or criticism of the members of these banking houses. It is the fault of our governmental system and is due to the absence of proper regulative laws, such as exist in other countries. It is not necessary here to discuss the extent, if any, to which the influence of these gentlemen is responsible for the absence of such laws and for the grave abuses that have grown out of this defective system.

The observations made by me were entirely impersonal and I have yet to learn of any attempt to refute the facts—unless the very sweeping unsupported and inconsequential statement of Mr. Schiff, of Kuhn, Loeb & Co., to the effect that it was all “sheer nonsense” may be looked upon as rising to the dignity of an argument or refutation of the facts presented.

I take the opportunity in this connection of expressing my high regard for the character and public spirit of Mr. Schiff and for his exceptional judgment on subjects in which he is not obsessed by self-interest; but the situation affects too closely the people of the country and is too far-reaching in its results to be disposed of by the mere ipse dixit of one of the interested parties, however eminent and well-intentioned.

Mr. Morgan's statement that “If we dominate half the railroads of the country, I have never noticed it”—which is not what I said—reminds one forcibly of the like attitude and testimony of his distinguished father before the Pujo committee of 1913, as follows—

“Q. You do not think you have any power in any department of industry in this country, do you?—A. I do not.

“Q. Not the slightest?—A. Not the slightest.”

which was followed almost immediately by the following answers to the following questions put to him as to the way in which he compelled Mr. Thomas F. Ryan to surrender to him the control of the Equitable Life Assurance Society, involving the disposition of over $500,000,000 of money, securities, and other assets—

“Q. Did Mr. Ryan offer this stock to you?—A. I asked him to sell it to me.

“Q. Did you tell him why you wanted it?—A. No; I told him I thought it was a good thing for me to have.

“Q. Did he tell you that he wanted to sell it?—A. No; but he sold it.

“Q. He did not want to sell but when you said you wanted it he sold?—A. He did not say that he did not want to sell it.

"Q. What did he say when you told him you would like to have it and felt you ought to have it?—A. He hesitated about it and finally sold it."

The fact that Mr. Morgan, jr., has "never noticed" that his firm and that of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. together dominate a majority of the great systems—I did not say all of the railroads of the country—is neither persuasive nor surprising if he knows as much or as little about such conditions as he professes to know about the corporations of which he is a director.

You will recall my furnishing you a partial list of the great railroad systems that had come under the control of Messrs. Morgan & Co. as the result of our defective laws for the reorganization of insolvent corporations, among which were named the Reading, the Atchison, the Erie, the Southern, the Northern Pacific, the Pere Marquette, the Chicago Great Western, the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, and the Chesapeake & Ohio, besides a list of others of which control was acquired otherwise than through reorganization, among which may be named the New Haven, the Lake Shore, the Michigan Central, and others.

It would be interesting to inquire what part his firm took in the selection of the presidents, executive officers, and directors of these roads.

In Mr. Morgan's testimony before you on Monday he is reported as stating with respect to the control of these reorganized properties that—

"When you reorganize a railroad company it is necessary that the policy of that company for the first few years should be controlled. Consequently, on most all occasions in my experience in reorganization, there has been a voting trust which carries control of the company as a consistent policy throughout the first 5 years and sometimes it has been extended to 10 years, at which time the voting trust terminates, and when the voting trust terminates the company runs that road from that time on. After the reorganization the financial interests would feel that it was necessary for them to retain control."

A voting trust to whom? The list submitted shows that the voting trusts have put the selection of the directors absolutely in Mr. Morgan's firm. But the statement is only partly accurate. It is incomplete. A number of these roads have been reorganized by the banking houses to which I have referred without voting trusts but the officers and boards of directors have almost uniformly been designated by the banking house that has acted as reorganization manager, whether there was or was not a voting trust in their favor under which they did so. After the expiration of the voting trust the personnel of the board named by the bankers under the voting trust almost uniformly continues, except where changes have been made necessary through death or resignation and in those cases the bankers have dictated or participated in selecting the successors, so that in effect the management installed by them has continued.

Nor is it quite accurate to say that the voting trusts continue only for 5 or 10 years after reorganization. In the case of the Southern Railway, for instance, the voting trust to Messrs. Morgan and Baker, which in express terms placed the absolute control in their hands, continued for 19 years and until it was dissolved within the past year as a result of the agitation brought about by the disclosures of the Pujo investigation with respect to that property and to the effects of voting trusts generally.

In further support of the statement as to the potential power of these banking houses I submit to you the following data that has been collated as above stated, which was supplied from official sources in answer to the following questions:

1. The total railroad mileage in the United States.
2. A list of all railroads in the United States over 100 miles.
3. A list of the interstate railroads, separately indicated.
4. A separate list of the great systems—say the roads of 1,000 miles and over.
5. A list of directors of the large roads (to show their interlocking character) and whom they represent.
6. A list of all the roads reorganized since 1890.
7. The names of the committee and banking house, together with the names of the voting trustees.
8. A list of the roads that are now in the hands of receivers and those that are undergoing reorganization, whether through receivership or readjustment, which would include the Rock Island and the Missouri Pacific, together with the names of the committees connected with them and the banking house.

Those parts of these statistics that are material to the present discussion may be briefly summarized as follows;

1. There are 56 railroad systems in the United States of over 1,000 miles in length each.

2. These great systems together own 203,335 miles out of 253,303 miles of railroad in the country that are represented in all by 290 railroad companies.

3. There have been 81,851 miles of road reorganized since 1890 in insolvency proceedings, of which I find that over 50,000 miles was accomplished under the direction of these two banking houses.

4. There are now 43,299 miles in the hands of receivers or otherwise undergoing reorganization, readjustment, or change of management, of which I find that 31,000 miles and upward are headed for like control, of which the Missouri Pacific, Wabash, and the Wheeling & Lake Erie are illustrations. All three of them are confessedly going into the hands of Kuhn, Loeb & Co. and the interests they represent.

5. These figures do not include systems such as the New York Central, the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy, the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, the Illinois Central, the Louisville & Nashville, the Lake Shore & Michigan Southern, and the Michigan Central, with a total mileage of 29,389.26, the ultimate financial management of which is wholly or partially dominated by these interests and their recognized associates; nor does it include the many other properties in which they have a potent voice; nor the tens of thousands of miles of road that are dependent for existence upon the patronage of the great systems thus controlled.

The smaller roads are largely "feeders" to the great systems and are dependent on the latter for business. The small roads must have the good will of the great systems. To that extent the latter dominate, so that if we want to determine where lies the potential power over the railroads and over the banks and industries that depend upon them, we must ascertain the source of control of the great systems. It should rest with the stockholders, but in point of fact they are a negligible quantity.

6. At page 147 of the Pujo report we find the following finding that was concurred in by 10 of the 11 members (including all the Democratic members and 3 of the 4 Republican members) of that distinguished committee of the House of Representatives as the result of many months of painstaking investigation:

"Your committee finds that vast system of railroads in various parts of the country are in effect subject to the control of this inner group—a situation not conducive to genuine competition."

Under the heading of "Railway reorganizations as an instrument of concentration" the committee says (p. 149):

"In that way and as the result, also, of reorganizations in which there was no voting trust, but in which the initial officers and directors were named by the bankers as reorganization managers, banking domination of the following railroad systems was secured by Messrs. Morgan and Kuhn, Loeb & Co.:

"First. The Baltimore & Ohio, where Kuhn, Loeb & Co., with Speyer & Co., were the reorganization managers, the plan of reorganization being approved by J. P. Morgan & Co., and Mr. Coster, of that firm, becoming a voting trustee.

"Second. The Chesapeake & Ohio, where the reorganization managers were Drexel, Morgan & Co., as the present firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. was formerly named.

"Third. The Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton, where Morgan & Co. were reorganization managers and Mr. Morgan is a voting trustee, the voting trust being still in force.

"Fourth. The Chicago Great Western, where Morgan & Co. were the reorganization managers and Mr. Morgan and his associate, Mr. Baker, are voting trustees, the voting trust being still in force.

"Fifth. The Erie, where Morgan & Co. were the reorganization managers and Mr. Morgan became a voting trustee.

"Sixth. The Northern Pacific, where Morgan & Co. were the reorganization managers and Mr. Morgan became a voting trustee.

"Seventh. The Pere Marquette, which was reorganized by Morgan & Co.

"Eighth. The Southern, which was reorganized by Morgan & Co., Mr. Morgan and Mr. Baker becoming voting trustees and still continuing as such.

"Ninth. The Reading, which was reorganized by Morgan & Co., Mr. Morgan becoming a voting trustee.

"Tenth. The Union Pacific, which was reorganized by Kuhn, Loeb & Co."

7. Mr. George M. Reynolds, the president of the Continental & Commercial National Bank of Chicago, which is the second largest banking institution in this country, testified before that committee, among other things, as follows, on the subject of concentration of the control of credits and properties (p. 105 of the report):

"Q. What would you say as to that concentration of the control of money and credit being a menace to the country?—A. That involves a very deep question. Personally, I am inclined to believe that an excess of power of any kind in the hands of a few men might properly be called a menace. I do not mean to say that the people who had that control and power have used it improperly. I do not mean to say that at all.

* * * * *

"Q. Taking the present situation, as you find it, Mr. Reynolds, what is your judgment as to whether that situation is a menace?—A. I am inclined to think that the concentration, having gone to the extent it has, does constitute a menace. I wish again, however, to qualify that by saying that I do not mean to sit in judgment upon anybody who controls that, because I do not pretend to know whether they have used it fairly or honestly or otherwise."

S. Mr. George F. Baker, the life-long business associate of Mr. Morgan and one of the two most powerful factors in the railroad and financial world, testified as follows on the general subject of the control of credits, as represented by the domination over the railroads, banks, and trust companies (p. 106 of the report):

"Q. I suppose you would see no harm, would you, in having the control of credit, as represented by the control of banks and trust companies, still farther concentrated? Do you think that would be dangerous?—A. I think it has gone about far enough.

"Q. You think it would be dangerous to go farther?—A. It might not be dangerous; but still it has gone about far enough. In good hands, I do not see that it would do any harm. If it got into bad hands, it would be very bad.

"Q. If it got into bad hands it would wreck the country?—A. Yes; but I do not believe it could get into bad hands.

"Q. You admit that if this concentration, to the point to which it has gone, were by any action to get into bad hands, it would wreck the country?—A. I can not imagine such a condition.

"Q. I thought you said so?—A. I said it would be bad; but I do not think it would wreck the country. I do not think bad hands could manage it. They could not retain the deposits nor the securities.

"Q. I am not speaking of incompetent hands. We are speaking of this concentration, which has come about and the power that it brings with it, getting into the hands of very ambitious men, perhaps not overscrupulous. You see a peril in that, do you not?—A. Yes.

"Q. So that the safety, if you think there is safety in the situation, really lies in the personnel of the men?—A. Very much.

"Q. Do you think that this is a comfortable situation for a great country to be in?—A. Not entirely."

9. Among the documents I have submitted you will find a list of directors which, when taken in connection with the charts and lists attached to the Pujo report, and the table at pages 92-100 of that report, will give you a faint conception of the extent of the control to which I have referred. If you will look at Exhibit 134-C of December, 1912, contained in volume 2 of the testimony of that investigation, under the heading of "Explanation of table of interlocking directorates," you will get further enlightenment as to the extent of such control. These tables were not compiled out of the inner consciousness of the members of the Committee on Banking and Currency. They were made up from data furnished by the banking houses, including the two houses to which I have referred.

The domination of these same interests and their associates—more particularly the Morgan-Baker interests—over the coal industries of the country, and especially in the anthracite region, is still more impressive than is their control over the railroads. They have been potent factors in the ultimate decision of the policy to be pursued with respect to every great general coal and railroad strike for the past 10 years.

The history of the New Haven road furnishes a fair illustration of the extent of the autocratic power of these gentlemen over the properties that they thus dominate without holding substantial pecuniary interests in the securities. They select the executive officers, who in turn hold themselves accountable to them instead of to the directors and shareholders. I believe it is broadly and literally true, as stated by Messrs. Schiff and Morgan, that in some cases this responsibility is reluctantly assumed and still more reluctantly exercised, notwithstanding the vast patronage that it involves in the way of marketing the securities of these companies and of controlling their vast purchases. It is the fault of the system, which renders it practically impossible for the widely scattered shareholders to assume control of their properties. My chief purpose is again and again calling attention to this situation is to endeavor to secure a reform of the system that will put the shareholders in control of their properties and scatter this dangerous concentration of power. It is increasing with startling rapidity, especially in the railroad world, as is apparent from the figures above quoted.

It indirectly involves an autocracy over our industries and moneyed institutions and a potential power over our political life that can not be tolerated. We may assume that the power is at the moment being wisely administered. We are not prepared for that kind of an autocracy, no matter how administered. The ramifications of such control may be endless. The patronage that can be dispensed or withheld and can make or unmake other and tributary industries, and that can prevent competition and further railway construction renders the development of the present methods too unsafe. Railroad control over our political life in the past has been vicious. With the increase and concentration of that power in ambitious or unscrupulous hands it would become dangerous to our institutions.

I do not mean to imply that that sort of criticism applies to present conditions nor that the properties are now being exploited as in the past, for I am satisfied that the worst of these scandals is over, at least for the time being, and that we are approaching an era of higher sense of responsibility.

The remedy for this increasing banking domination lies in more effective public control, in the reform of our methods of selecting directors, and a better form of representation for stockholders, and in paying directors adequately for their services and holding them to a higher degree of responsibility.

I would briefly summarize the relief that is needed in this connection as follows:

First. The enactment of a national corporation law under which all interstate corporations would be required to incorporate and which will provide the following additional safeguards for stockholders:

(a) The right to minority representation, which will divide the stock into as many parts as there are directors to be elected. If there are nine directors to be elected, one-ninth of the stock may elect one director; two-ninths may elect two directors, and so on. The majority would always control, as it should; but the minority will be represented. That will give the stockholders the hope and incentive to combine for representation.

(b) Proxy voting should be abolished. Stockholders should vote either in person or by mail and directly for the candidates, instead of intrusting their proxies to unknown men to vote for undisclosed candidates. The election should be under the supervision of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

(c) The management should nominate its candidates 90 days before the election. The stockholders should have the right to nominate 30 days before the election. The lists of all candidates nominated on the various tickets should be sent to the stockholders, who should select their representatives.

The power to enact such a national law with respect to interstate corporations can no longer be questioned. I believe it exists also independently of the commerce clause of the Constitution and can be resorted to with respect to intrastate railroad corporations under the post-offices and post-roads clause of the Constitution.

Second. There should be a separate law for the reorganization of insolvent corporations similar to the British reconstruction act and to the law prevailing on that subject in Germany. It should provide for an official receiver to be appointed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, thus superseding the present scandalous methods of appointing receivers. We had the same difficulties with respect to banks until the system was changed. I would liken this procedure to that now applicable to the winding up of national banks and of State banks under the laws of New York. The plan of reorganization should be subject to the approval of the court and of the Interstate Commerce Commission, which would protect the rights of minorities and would, I hope, result in abolishing the present self-styled, self-constituted reorganization committees that are set up by the bankers to execute their will. In this connection I beg to direct your attention to pages 148-156 of the Pujo report, where the present system is fully set forth and its defects pointed out.

Third. There should be a smaller number of directors, with greater concentration of responsibility. They should be paid substantial salaries, and, if need be, a small interest in the net profits over and above a given amount, as is customary in the continental countries. They should be prohibited from speculating in the stocks of their own companies, and short selling by a director of the stock of his corporation should be a felony.

Fourth. No securities should be issuable except with the approval of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Fifth. The funds of interstate railroad corporations should be deposited only in incorporated banks and not with private bankers.

Sixth. The system of fiscal agents should be abolished and the securities of corporations should be sold under proper safeguards by public offerings or by a form of competitive bidding to be prescribed by the Interstate Commerce Commission.

With the inauguration of these reforms I believe that the development of our railroads will proceed with better satisfaction to the public than under Government ownership and that banking control will be reduced to a minimum.

Very truly, yours,

SAML. UNTERMYER.

QUESTION No. 1.

The total railroad mileage in the United States on June 30, 1913, as filed with the Interstate Commerce Commission, was 249,803 miles. These are the latest figures obtainable from official sources. From unofficial data we would judge that about 3,500 miles of additional mileage was laid from June 30, 1913, to December 31, 1914.

Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic R. R.—The properties of the Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic R. R. Co. were sold at foreclosure sale on June 5, 1914, for $4,641,000. The property was bid in by Martin D. Wyly and Frederick Beltz, jr., representing the general protective committee. The sale was confirmed by Judge Pardee on June 17, 1914. Proposed successor company: The Atlanta, Birmingham & Atlantic Ry. Co. was incorporated in Georgia, August 22, 1914, with E. T. Lamb as president (receiver of the railroad company), and the Georgia Railroad Commission, in August, 1914, authorized the new company to issue $30,000,000 common and $10,000,000 preferred stock; also $3,000,000 5 per cent bonds. Official notice of reorganization was filed October 2, 1914, in the office of secretary of state of Georgia, this notice stating that the railroad company had been withdrawn from the hands of the receiver. On November 20, 1914, however, an order was signed by Judge Pardee in the United States district court at Macon, Ga., with the consent of the committees representing holders of the receivers' certificates and the bondholders, again formally placing the road in hands of F. T. Lamb as receiver. The purchasers of the railroad property notified the court that on account of present financial conditions they were unable to complete the purchase. Committee for receivers' certificates: Owing to the default in payment of principal of the $4,700,000 one-year 5 per cent receivers' certificates due July 1, 1913, the following committee agreed to act for the holders: Howard Bayne, George C. Clark, jr., Harold B. Clark, Lewis B. Franklin, and Carl E. Steere, with G. E. Warren, secretary, 60 Broadway, New York, and Shearman & Sterling and Spooner & Cotton as counsel. Depository: Columbia Trust Co., New York. Over 80 per cent of the receivers' certificates have been deposited with this committee. Committee for first-mortgage fives: S. H. Fessenden, Philip Stockton, and F. H. Farrar. Old Colony Trust Co., depository. Committee for joint collateral notes and first-mortgage fives: George C. Clark, chairman; George C. Clark, jr., secretary; Equitable Trust Co., New York, and American Trust Co., Boston, depository. General protective committee: E. S. Marston (chairman), John I. Waterbury, S. S. Palmer, New York, and Samuel Carr, Francis R. Hart, and Frederick Ayer, Boston.

Boston & Maine R. R.—In June, 1907, the New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R. Co. acquired $10,994,800 of the capital stock of the Boston & Maine R. R., which was subsequently exchanged, share for share, for stock of the "New Haven Co." In consequence, however, of agitation in the Massachusetts Legislature with respect to "foreign" control the stock was sold in June, 1908, to John L. Billard. Additional stock was subsequently acquired in the same interests, and in February, 1909, authority was granted by the Connecticut Legislature for a charter for a corporation under the style of the Billard Co., with power to purchase, hold, pledge, and sell shares of stock and other securities of the Boston & Maine R. R. In June, 1909, the Massachusetts Legislature passed a law authorizing the Boston Railroad Holding Co. to hold the securities of the Boston & Maine R. R., and on October 6, 1909, that company took over the $10,994,800 Boston & Maine stock purchased from the Billard Co. at $140 per share. As of June 30, 1914, the Boston Railroad Holding Co. owned $21,918,900 common and $654,300 preferred stock of the Boston & Maine R. R. Co. The Boston Railroad Holding Co. was, in October, 1914, placed in the hands of Frank P. Carpenter, Henry B. Day, Charles P. Hall, James L. Doherty, and Marcus P. Knowlton as trustees, for the purpose, amongst others, of disposing of its holdings in Boston & Maine stock. In connection with the Boston & Maine situation W. B. Lawrence, the largest holder of the stock, aside from the Boston Railroad Holding Co., is quoted as saying: "I am against a re-organization of the Boston & Maine. I want a receivership. It must consist of three men—three honest men—with the present president of the road at the head, doing the directing." (Boston Post, Jan. 20, p. 3.)

Buffalo & Susquehanna Ry.—The company having defaulted May 1, 1910, on the interest due on its $6,000,000 first-mortgage 4½ per cent bonds, Harry I. Miller was appointed receiver on May 2, 1910, by the Supreme Court of the State of New York, and on May 3, 1910, was appointed receiver in Pennsylvania by the Court of Common Pleas of Potter County. Bondholders' protective committee: William Salomon (chairman), Gordon Abbott, Alex. Brown, Benjamin Strong, jr., and Asa S. Wing; George G. Henry, secretary, 25 Broad Street, New York. Depository: Bankers' Trust Co., New York.

Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R.—During the month of May, 1913, it became evident that financial embarrassment of the St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. Co., the owner of all the outstanding common stock and over 75 per cent of the preferred stock of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. Co., would lead to the appointment of receivers of the property of the St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. Co. and the consequent appointment of receivers of the Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. In anticipation of the impairment of the company's credit which would follow, and in view of the condition of its property and affairs, a creditor filed a bill in the United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois praying for a receivership of the company's property, pursuant to which William J. Jackson, vice president of the company, and Edwin W. Winter, of New York, were appointed receivers May 27, 1913, took possession as of midnight that date, and are operating the property. Protective committee for trust certificates and stockholders: In May, 1913, the following committee agreed to act for the protection of the holders of St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. trust certificates for Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R. preferred and common stock and of the preferred stockholders of Chicago & Eastern Illinois R. R.: Alvin W. Krech (chairman), Henry H. Porter, W. Emlen Roosevelt, Gordon Abbott, W. Redmond Cross, Horace J. Morse, Henry A. Vernet, with Richard R. Hunter as secretary. Depository: Equitable Trust Co., New York. Counsel: Murray, Prentice & Howland. Protective committee for Evansville & Indianapolis R. R. first sixes and first consolidated sixes: Default having occurred in the July 1, 1914, interest on both these issues the following committee was formed for the protection of holders: Frederick H. Shipman (chairman), W. B. Cardozo, E. W. Gladwin, E. H. Ladd, jr., R. M. Smith, with Geller, Rolston & Horan counsel and Edwin Gibbs, secretary, 22 William Street, New York. Depository: Farmers' Loan & Trust Co., New York. Protective committee for holders of mortgage debt and equipment obligation: John W. Platten (chairman), James C. Brady, Franklin Q. Brown, Frederick H. Ecker, Robert Fleming (London), Donald G. Geddes, Otto H. Kahn, William C. Poillon, with Calvin Brewer, secretary, and Kuhn, Loeb & Co. as bankers for the committee. Depository: United States Mortgage & Trust Co., New York. Counsel: Spooner & Cotton. This committee in March, 1914, asked for deposit of refunding and improvement bonds. Protective committee for Chicago & Indiana Coal Ry. Co. first fives: W. W. Jacobs (chairman), James B. Mabon, Edwin S. Hunt, R. H. Carleton, J. S. Farlee, with Charles E. Sigler, secretary, 54 Wall Street, New York, and Sullivan & Cromwell, New York, as counsel. This committee, on June 20, 1914, in view of the impending default in the July interest, called for deposit of the bonds. Time for deposit expired December 1, 1914. In January, 1915, the Metropolitan Trust Co., of New York, as mortgage trustee, brought a suit to foreclose the Chicago & Indiana Coal Ry. mortgage of 1885. This suit was brought at the instance of the protective committee of Chicago & Indiana Coal Ry. bondholders, acting through their counsel, Sullivan & Cromwell. Separate receivers for coal properties: In November, 1914, United States district court at Chicago appointed Francis S. Peabody, Jackson K. Dering, and Jabez Wooley separate receivers for the coal properties. As a result of these appointments the leases under which the Illinois and Indiana mines owned by the road were operated by the coal companies have been canceled. The special receivers now operate properties for the road.

Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis R. R.—The circuit court at Springfield, Ill., on July 31, 1914, appointed Bluford Wilson, of Springfield, Ill, president of the road, and William Cotter, of New York, receivers for company. General and refunding bondholders' committee: Owing to default in June 1, 1914, interest on the general and refunding four-and-a-halves, the below-named committee urged deposit of these bonds with Bankers' Trust Co., New York, depository. Committee: Frederick J. Lisman, chairman, and Alfred Shepherd, with Graham Adams as secretary, 30 Broad Street, New York, and White & Chase, counsel. The agreement provides that in case of a vacancy in the membership of the committee the successor of Frederick J. Lisman shall be designated by F. J. Lisman & Co., New York, and the successor of Alfred Shepherd by the directors of the Car Trust Realization Co. (Ltd.), Great Britain. The committee may add to its number. The agreement gives the committee the customary powers for the protection of the bondholders and provides that any plan of reorganization presented by the committee shall become binding on all depositors when assented to by certificates representing 51 per cent of the bonds, deposited hereunder, but that each dissatisfied depositor shall be allowed 30 days in which to withdraw. If the holders of more than 49 per cent in principal amount of the outstanding certificates of deposits shall so dissent, the plan will not become effective. Time for deposit was limited to December 15, 1914, since which date no deposits have been received, except upon such conditions as committee has imposed. A substantial majority of the bonds has been deposited. Prior-lien bondholders' committee: Default having been made in payment of September 1, 1914, interest on the Chicago, Peoria & St. Louis Ry. of Illinois prior-lien four-and-a-halves, the below-named committee urged deposit of these bonds with the Equitable Trust Co., New York, depository. Committee: Sidney C. Borg, of Simon, Borg & Co.; Henry E. Cooper, vice president of the Equitable Trust Co., New York; Thomas Denny, of Denny, Pomroy & Co.; Robert Struthers, jr., of Wood, Struthers & Co., with J. N. Babcock, secretary, 37 Wall Street, New York, and Leventritt, Cook & Nathan as counsel. Time for deposit was limited to November 30, 1914; since which date no deposits have been received except on terms imposed by committee.

Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R.—The Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. having failed to declare a dividend on its common stock in 1914, the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., the holding company, was left without resources with which to pay the May, 1914, coupons on the collateral trust fours of 2002. In view of the impending default in this interest a bondholders' protective committee, consisting of James N. Wallace, chairman; Charles Hayden, James Brown, Bernard M. Baruch, Henry Evans, Frederick Strauss, with Joline Larkin & Rathbone and Cravath & Henderson as counsel, and C. E. Sigler as secretary, 54 Wall Street, New York, was formed, and in order to secure concerted action requested deposits of the bonds with the Central Trust Co. of New York, depository. The formation of this committee and the deposit of bonds was protested by N. L. Amster, of Boston, who subsequently, in the interests of the undeposited bonds, formed a second protective committee, consisting of himself as chairman, L. Laflin Kellogg, George Warren Smith, Warren C. Crane, Frank W. Bauder, Courtlandt Linkrom, Alfred K. Keppelman, Edwin S. Dickerson, and George G. Prentice. Owing to the default in the payment of the May, 1914, interest on the collateral trust fours, the Central Trust Co. of New York, as trustee of these bonds, brought foreclosure suits on September 3, 1914, in the United States district court, and a foreclosure decree was signed October 10, 1914, by Judge Mayer, who directed that the stock of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. pledged as collateral for these bonds be sold at auction in the interests of the bondholders by Bronson Winthrop as special master. In connection with this sale the "Wallace" protective committee (which ultimately represented a majority of the bonds) announced a plan of reorganization, which provided for the purchase in a single block of the stock pledged (which had a total par value equal to the face value of the outstanding bonds), and for the distribution of it to the depositing bondholders on the basis of 10 shares of stock of a par value of $100 each for each $1,000 bond, the depositing bondholders to pay the nondepositing bondholders their share of the proceeds of the sale of the stock, and to receive the excess stock in proportion to their holdings. This plan of selling the stock en bloc was opposed in the courts by the minority bondholders represented by N. L. Amster, who contended it was unfair to them. The court of appeals on November 19, 1914, reversed Judge Mayer's decision, giving it as their opinion that the undepositing (minority) bondholders had a right to be made party defendants to the foreclosure suit. Eventually an arrangement was made between the two committees (Wallace committee and Amster committee) which allowed the stock to be sold. This arrangement was made on order of court, and provided that whilst the stock may be sold en bloc all the shares applicable to the undeposited bonds shall be turned over to a special master, appointed by the court, and be distributed to the bondholders who had not deposited their holdings to pay their proportion of the committee and foreclosure expenses amounting to 4½ cents per share. On December 22, 1914, this stock ($71,353,500) was sold to the "Wallace" committee for $7,135,350, equivalent to $10 per share. This sale was confirmed by Judge Mayer on January 6, 1915. No bondholder will be entitled to exchange his bonds for stock after February 27, 1915; after that date bondholders must accept for their bonds their proportionate share of the proceeds of the sale. The special master must be notified on or before February 10, 1915, of intention to subscribe for unexchanged stock of the railway company.

Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry.—On December 22, 1914, the control of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. passed into the hands of the holders of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co. collateral trust fours—see statement above. In March, 1914, Edw. B. Smith & Co., Philadelphia and New York, issued the following notice to holders of Choctaw, Oklahoma & Gulf R. R. general fives, due 1919; Choctaw, Oklahoma & Gulf R. R. consolidated fives, due 1952; Choctaw & Memphis R. R. first fives, due 1914, and Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Choctaw collateral trust fours: "In view of the uncertainties surrounding the whole Rock Island proposition, which has caused holders of the above securities to express to us concern as to their status, we feel, upon information, that the situation demands concentrated action for mutual protection. Committees have been formed to protect junior securities, whose interests may conflict with these underlying issues. Under the circumstances we urge holders of the Choctaw issues to communicate with us promptly, looking to united action." The $2,500,000 6 per cent bank loan, maturing December 31, 1914, was extended to April 30, 1915, at 6 per cent. This loan was negotiated to guide the company over the period of heavy payments, beginning with July 1, 1914. The date of the annual meeting which has several times been postponed, has again been postponed, this time to March 15, 1915. A reorganization committee, it is stated, may be formed to undertake the work of readjustment. The method expected in Wall Street to be used is for the stockholders of the company to agree to raise a large part of the new capital required as the consideration for retaining an interest in the property. The Phelps-Dodge interests, who are considered the leading interests in the company, although understood to be against a further investment in the company, are looked upon as the most likely source of new capital.

Cincinnati, Bluffton & Chicago R. R.—This road was sold at receivers' sale on October 15, 1914, to Fred A. Dolph, of Chicago, representing a syndicate of creditors. The price to be paid is $350,000. Judge Cook, in the circuit court, gave Mr. Dolph four months to make final payment. The receiver will operate the property until the sale is fully consummated. A new company, it is stated, will probably be organized some time prior to February 15, 1915. On March 14, 1908, John C. Curtis was appointed receiver in a creditor's suit.

Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry.—Judge Hollister, in the United States court in Cincinnati, on July 2, 1914, because of the defaults in interest payments below mentioned, appointed Judson Harmon and Rufus B. Smith as receivers of the property on application by Bankers Trust Co., of New York, trustee. The defaults on July 1, 1914, were: Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton first and refunding mortgage unguaranteed bonds, $1,677,000; Cincinnati, Indianapolis & Western Ry. first and refunding fives, $4,722,000; Indiana, Decatur & Western Ry. fives, $3,162,000. The committee which represented the old 4½ per cent collateral trust notes exchanged under the readjustment of 1909 for general mortgage bonds has been reorganized, and in circular of October 2, 1914, to holders of bonds, said: "In view of the appointment of receivers of the railway company the committee requests that bondholders furnish it with their names and addresses and the amounts of their holdings. The committee will keep in touch with the progress of the receivership, and if advisable will later call for the deposit of bonds. Bondholders are reminded of the existing contract with the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., providing for the purchase or exchange of their bonds not later than during July, 1916, and the committee will be prepared to advise with bondholders in regard to the consummation of said agreement." (Signed: Charles H. Sabin, chairman; Harry Bronner, Samuel L. Fuller, J. H. McClement, and Gordon Abbott, committee, with Arthur B. Hatcher, secretary, 140 Broadway, New York, and Joline, Larkin & Rathbone, counsel.) A committee, consisting of Wilmer Palmer, Osman F. Rheinhard, and Rudolph Kleybolte, representing a large part of the $216,000 outstanding Kleybolte 4½ per cent equipment notes of 1905, called for the deposit of the notes, with the Bankers' Trust Co., New York, as depository under a protective agreement dated November 2, 1914. A circular dated November 2, 1914, says, in substance: "On October 1, 1914, the receiver of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry. Co. defaulted on the principal of the $54,000 of notes maturing October 1, and also the interest due on all the outstanding equipment notes. On the same date the company, through its receiver, paid the interest and principal of all its other outstanding equipment notes, maturing on that date, thus preferring said notes to those held by yourselves. The default in the Kleybolte equipment notes is placed upon the fact that the Pere Marquette R. R. has failed to make the payments due under contract of July 20, 1908, whereby about one-half of the equipment securing the issue was sold to that company with the sanction of the United States circuit court, but contrary to the provisions of the trust deed, and without the knowledge of the trustee." Owing to default in the payment of November 1, 1914, interest on Cincinnati, Findlay & Fort Wayne Ry. first fours, the below-mentioned committee asked for the deposit of bonds on or before January 15, 1915, with the Bankers' Trust Co., New York, depository. Committee: F. N. B. Close, chairman; Sidney C. Borg, Henry F. Whitcomb, Albert H. Wiggin, with P. D. Bogue as secretary, 16 Wall Street, New York, and Alfred A. Cook counsel. The receivers on September 10, 1914, applied to the United States district court for permission to issue $3,000,000 receivers' certificates for improvements and equipment. The receivers, however, early in October, 1914, in view of the financial situation, decided to postpone application for permission to issue the above amount of certificates until some later date, when it is hoped conditions may have improved. The Interstate Commerce Commission on July 30, 1914, made an order announcing that an investigation of the road will be made in connection with a similar one into the affairs of the Pere Marquette R. R. An agreement was made July 1, 1909, between J. P. Morgan & Co. and the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co., under which the latter will acquire, at expiration of seven years from that date, at a price then to be agreed upon or determined by arbitration, the controlling stock of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry. Co. During said seven years the controlling stock is to be vested in three voting trustees, one to be the president for the time being of the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. In this connection a plan was affected for adjustment of future interest charges, and the payment or adjustment of the floating debt of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry. Co., and providing approximately $7,000,000 for improvements and working capital. Under this plan the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. guarantees $12,500,000 of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry. first and refunding 4 per cent bonds, dated July 1, 1909, and took up at maturity the $11,557,000 of that company's 4 per cent notes, due July 1, 1913, secured by deposit of $13,000,000 of the first and refunding bonds, and now holds the notes and collateral. Also, upon the acquisition under the agreement of the stock of the Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton Ry. Co., the Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Co. is obligated either to purchase at 85 or guaranty $20,000,000 of that company's general mortgage bonds, due July 1, 1939.

Colorado Midland Ry.—On December 13, 1912, President George W. Vallery was appointed receiver by the United States district court at Denver on application of Central Trust Co., of New York, acting at the request of the protective committee. In view of the default by the company on one of its outstanding notes, a committee was formed in November, 1912, consisting of James N. Wallace, chairman; James N. Jarvie, Harry Bronner, B. Aymar Sands, Francis Leyland, Clark Williams, and W. de Lancey Kountze, requesting the holders of the first mortgage fours of 1897 to unite for mutual protection by depositing their bonds with the Central Trust Co. of New York, depository. The Swiss Bank Verein, London, England, acts as London depository. C. E. Sigler, 54 Wall Street, New York, is secretary.

Council City & Solomon River R. R.—Jerome D. Gedney was appointed receiver in October, 1907, by the court of chancery of New Jersey.

Denver & Rio Grande R. R.—It is stated that "the board of directors of the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. has authorized the announcement that the interest which will fall due September 1, 1914, upon Western Pacific Ry. first-mortgage bonds will be paid, but that if the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. is to continue its support of the Western Pacific Ry., some plan of readjustment of Western Pacific Ry. finances and the relation of the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. thereto must be devised, which will be acceptable to the holders of the bonds, and that a call for the deposit of these bonds will be put forth at an early date, by a committee of responsible bankers, looking to the adoption of a plan which will at once lighten the burden which the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. is now carrying, to place the financial structure of the system upon a basis of recognized solvency and credit, and as far as may be practical provide means for the development of the Western Pacific Ry."

Denver, Laramie & Northwestern R. R.—On June 12, 1912, the company was placed in the hands of receivers on complaint of F. A. Bridge, as a creditor, bondholder, and stockholder, in the district court, city and county of Denver, Colo. The Continental Trust Co. (Allan F. Ayers, representative) and Marshall B. Smith, of Denver, Colo., were appointed as receivers and assumed charge of the properties June 13, 1912. On March 7, 1913, at the request of the below-mentioned bondholders' protective committee, representing a large majority of the bonds, the Bankers' Trust Co. of New York, trustee under the mortgage, filed a complaint in foreclosure proceedings and asked for the appointment of receivers. The two preceding cases were consolidated with the Bankers' Trust Co., and the same receivers were appointed and are now in charge of the properties. The trustee has not, as yet, asked for a foreclosure decree. Committee: William Barth, J. R. Pearson, W. E. Green, William Semke, Stansbury Thompson, J. H. Bender, Denver, Colo.; J. F. Wallace, A. R. Oppenheim, New York; Fred B. Sillsbee, Charles B. Martin, Chicago, Ill.; Otter Huber, Rock Island, Ill.; I. W. Crumly, Colby, Kans.

Fort Smith & Western R. R.—In November, 1910, holders of the securities of the Fort Smith & Western R. R. and the San Bois Coal Co., were asked to deposit their holdings with a committee composed of W. L. Brown, A. W. Mellon, Colgate Hoyt, W. H. Canniff, W. G. Mather, J. J. Sullivan, George S. Russell, James H. Hoyt, S. H. Tolles, C. C. Bolton, and A. C. Dustin. In February, 1911, circulars in the shape of an agreement to deposit bonds with the Superior Savings & Trust Co., Cleveland, and vesting in the above-named committee the power to take absolute charge of the business were sent to bondholders of the Fort Smith & Western R. R. and the San Bois Coal Co. The agreement effective for three years, was signed by over 70 per cent of the bondholders, and conferred on the committee the power to vote all the stock of the signers of the agreement. The agreement was extended for two years to January 1, 1915. The stock of the San Bois Coal Co. was deposited with the Bankers' Trust Co. of New York, for the benefit of first-mortgage bondholders. The agreement also authorized the committee to sell, exchange, or dispose of the property of the Fort Smith & Western R. R. Co., the bonds deposited, or the San Bois Coal Co., as it may consider best, although the understanding is that no sale or exchange is to be made, nor money borrowed in excess of $100,000, without the unanimous vote of the committee.

Illinois Southern Ry.—A friendly reorganization, as of June 1, 1911, was consummated about December 1, 1911, whereby holders of the $4,600,000 first-mortgage 4 per cent bonds, dated December 1, 1903, exchanged their holdings for 30 per cent ($1,380,000) of new first-mortgage 5 per cent bonds and 30 per cent ($1,380,000) of new income 5 per cent bonds. In addition to the new first-mortgage bonds issued under the plan there were issued $354,000 for the construction of a new incline on the east bank of the Mississippi River and for other corporate purposes. The company induced the holders of 1,528 first-mortgage bonds to temporarily carry their December 1, 1913, coupons for the benefit of the company. The company has sufficient funds on hand to pay the balance of these December coupons, but if this payment was made it would leave it almost bare as to working capital and without funds to pay the June 1, 1914, coupons. It was therefore deemed desirable by the directors to make no disbursement, either on account of the balance due on the December 1, 1913, interest, or on the June 1, 1914, interest, and to keep what money the company had for additional working capital. The majority of the bondholders have been consulted and approve of these arrangements.

International & Great Northern Ry.—Judge Burns, in the United States court at Houston, Tex., on August 11, 1914, appointed James A. Baker, of Houston, and Cecil A. Lyon, of Sherman, Tex., as receivers of the property at the instance of the note holders' protective committee, see below. President Thomas J. Freeman stated it was impossible to meet either interest or principal of the notes due August 1, 1914, and as there was no market for the bonds a default resulted. The executors of the J. Gould estate consented to the plan for extending the notes for two and one-half years at 6 per cent, but the unsettled financial situation brought about by the European war and a less favorable outlook for the cotton crop along the line caused the plan to fall through. Note holders' committee: Alexander J. Hemphill, Alvin W. Krech, Benjamin Strong, jr., S. H. Voorhees, Franklin Q. Brown, R. Lancaster Williams, Frederick Strauss. Depositary: Guaranty Trust Co., New York. On July 31, 1914, this committee asked for the deposit of the $11,000,000 three-year 5 per cent notes, due August 1, 1914, in order to effect under what was believed to be advantageous conditions an extension thereof to February 1, 1917, with interest at 6 per cent. Unforeseen circumstances brought about a receivership of the property and made the plan impracticable of execution at the present time. Holders of notes were requested to deposit them at once with the depositary. To November 15, 1914, 90 per cent of the notes had been deposited with the committee.

Kansas City, Clinton & Springfield Ry.—Default having been made in the April, 1914, interest on the first mortgage 5 per cent bonds, protective committee was formed, consisting of E. V. R. Thayer (chairman), Alfred D. Foster, F. R. Hart, and F. L. Higginson, with Frank H. Damon as secretary, and Story, Thorndike, Palmer & Dodge as counsel. Bondholders were urged to deposit their holdings with Bankers' Trust Co., New York, or Old Colony Trust Co., Boston, depositaries. In the early part of May, 1914, this interest was paid with funds provided by the receivers of the St. Louis & San Francisco R. R.

Kansas City, Outer Belt & Electric R. R.—On October 31, 1912, Thomas A. Bigger was appointed receiver. Receiver's certificates to the amount of $40,000 have been issued to pay taxes and provide for care of property.

Louisiana & Northwest R. R.—On August 22, 1913, President George W. Hunter was appointed receiver by Judge Foster in the United States district court at New Orleans, on application of the Baldwin Locomotive Works.

Macon & Birmingham Ry.—S. F. Parrott, vice president, was appointed receiver of company on February 1, 1908, upon the application of the Old Colony Trust Co., Boston, trustee of the first 5 per cent mortgage. In September, 1910, J. B. Munson was appointed receiver to succeed S. F. Parrott.

Marietta, Columbus & Cleveland R. R.—D. B. Torpy, a director of the company, was on July 10, 1914, appointed receiver on application of the Columbia Trust Co., New York, trustee of the first mortgage 40-year fives, on which no interest has been paid.

Missouri & North Arkansas R. R.—On April 1, 1912, Federal Judge Trieber appointed W. S. Holt, George L. Sands, and Jesse McDonald as receivers of the property, on application of the St. Louis Union Trust Co., the trustee of the first mortgage, dated July 1, 1906. On March 4, 1914, John Scullin was appointed receiver to succeed George L. Sands, resigned.

Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf Ry.—President William Kenefick was appointed temporary receiver December 11, 1913, for the properties of the Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf Ry. and the Missouri, Oklahoma & Gulf R. R. by Judge Hook in the Federal court at St. Louis, on application by the Baldwin Locomotive Works, a secured creditor to extent of approximately $206,000. The November, 1913, and subsequent coupons on the first mortgage bonds are in default. On January 12, 1914, L. S. Posner, of New York, and Alexander New, of Kansas City, Mo., were appointed receivers in place of William Kenefick, who asked to be relieved of the duty. Judge Hook, in the United States district court at Kansas City, on October 27, 1914, heard the application of the receivers to issue $1,700,000 certificates for improvements, equipment, etc. As they supplant the lien of the bondholders, the court will not grant the application for their issuance until consent in writing of a majority of bondholders is presented.

Missouri Pacific Ry.—The undersigned are prepared to act as a proxy committee for stockholders at the forthcoming annual meeting. Committee: Alex. J. Hemphill, Otto H. Kahn, Seward Prosser, James N. Wallace, and Robert Winsor, with Charles E. Sigler, secretary, 54 Wall Street, New York. It is reported that an official of the company, on January 19, 1915, stated to Kuhn, Loeb & Co. and Blair & Co., of New York, that the Deutsche Bank of Berlin are expected to become financial managers of the company and to provide funds to meet the maturing obligations of the road.

New Mexico Central R. R.—In December, 1914, the district court at Santa Fe, N. Mex., appointed Ralph C. Ely, Deming, N. Mex., as receiver, succeeding Charles Murray.

New Orleans, Mobile & Chicago R. R.—The Federal court at Mobile, Ala., on December 19, 1913, placed the property of company in the hands of President William F. Owen, as receiver on petition by the Metropolitan Trust Co., of New York, as trustee under the first and refunding mortgage, the coupons due July 1, 1913, on the outstanding bonds remaining unpaid. Owing to the default in the July 1, 1913, interest the following committee was appointed: John W. Platten, chairman; James G. Cannon, Robert Fleming (London), Frederick William Scott, and T. Nelson Strother, depositaries; United States Mortgage & Trust Co., New York, and Mercantile Trust & Deposit Co., subdepository, Baltimore. C. H. Murphy, 55 Cedar Street, New York; Beekman, Menken & Griscom, counsel, New York.

New Orleans, Texas & Mexico R. R.—On July 9, 1913, the United States district court at New Orleans appointed John D. O'Keefe, of New Orleans, and Frank Andrews, of Houston, Tex., permanent receivers for company on application of the New York Trust Co. On July 25, 1913, Mr. O'Keefe tendered his resignation as receiver of the Beaumont, Sour Lake & Western Railway and Orange & Northwestern Railroad Co. This left Frank Andrews as sole receiver of the last two mentioned companies, and also of the St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway Co. Mr. O'Keefe continues as sole receiver of the New Orleans, Texas & Mexico Railway in Louisiana, with headquarters at New Orleans. The United States District Court for the Southern District of Louisiana in October, 1914, authorized Receiver O'Keefe to issue not exceeding $3,500,000 one-year 6 per cent certificates, dated October 15, 1914. Of these certificates the receiver was to issue sufficient to retire the $2,000,000 outstanding series A certificates, due October 15, 1914, and $300,000 St. Louis, Brownsville & Mexico Railway certificates. The remainder are reserved for further order of the court. Holders of the old outstanding certificates were offered in exchange therefor new certificates on the basis of $1.025 face value of new certificates for each $1,000 face value of the old certificates, being the equivalent of approximately an 8½ per cent interest basis for the new certificates. Under the order of the court the new certificates are made a lien on the property of the company, prior to the outstanding first mortgage bonds. Judge Foster in the Federal court at New Orleans in August, 1914, in the suit brought by the New York Trust Co., trustee, has ordered foreclosure sale of the road.

New York, New Haven & Hartford R. R.—At a meeting of the stockholders on April 21, 1914, the directors were authorized to complete negotiations with the Department of Justice for a peaceful solution of the so-called "New England" railroad situation, and to arrange for the segregation of the various properties that were under dispute. The department filed its petition in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of New York on July 23, 1914, and the company filed its answer on September 17, 1914. An agreed decree was entered October 17, 1914, the result of which is shown in the company's annual report to its stockholders for the year ended June 30, 1914.

Ohio River & Columbus Ry.—The common pleas court at Georgetown, Ohio, on October 8, 1914, appointed Secretary and General Manager Charles J. Finger as receiver of this company on application of ex-Gov. Judge Harmon.

Pere Marquette R. R.—Owing to final refusal of Michigan State Railroad Commission to permit the company to carry on arrangement which it had made for borrowing money to meet maturing obligations, it became necessary that receivers be appointed, and on April 5, 1912, in the United States district court at Detroit Judge Angell placed the property in the hands of Newman Erb, New York; Frank W. Blair, Detroit, and Dudley E. Water, Grand Rapids, Mich., as receivers. On April 9, 1912, Frank W. Blair was also appointed ancillary receiver by United States District Judge Landis, at Chicago. On August 27, 1912, S. M. Felton was appointed coreceiver, succeeding Newman Erb, who resigned. On June 3, 1914, Paul H. King, of Grand Rapids, was appointed chairman of the receivers, to succeed S. M. Felton, who resigned. Frank W. Blair also resigned as receiver, effective September 30, 1914. No successor has been appointed. Judge Landis, in the Federal court at Chicago, on May 29, 1913, granted permission to the Bankers Trust Co., New York, and Scott, Brown & Co., South Bend, Ind., to file suit for foreclosure of the improvement and refunding general mortgage. Later he granted leave to consolidate the suit with that brought by the American Brake Shoe & Foundry Co., filed in April, 1912, in which receivers were appointed. by them to be paid out in connection with the construction and acquisition of new lines. The dismissal of the suit is part of the plan of the receivers to disclaim liability of the St. Louis & San Francisco R. R. Co. on the $28,582,000 outstanding New Orleans, Texas & Mexico division bonds.

Tennessee Central R. R.—On December 31, 1912, W. K. McAlister and H. B. Chamberlain were appointed receivers by Judge Sanford in United States district court at Knoxville, Tenn., on application of the Mercantile Trust Co., St. Louis. On April 1, 1914, the receivers were authorized to issue $330,000 one-year 6 per cent certificates. Of these, $180,000 were sold, and $150,000 pledged as collateral for a loan by receivers. Protective committee: In view of the receivership the following protective committee was formed in January, 1913, requesting deposits of general mortgage 5 per cent bonds of 1954 with the Guaranty Trust Co., of New York, depository. A. J. Hemphill, chairman; G. H. Harris; Breckinridge Jones; W. T. Rosen; and Albert H. Wiggin; with L. B. Franklin, secretary, 140 Broadway, New York, and Roberts Walker and Van Vorst, Marshall & Smith, as counsel.

Toledo, St. Louis & Western R. R.—Judge Killits in United States district court at Columbus, Ohio, on October 23, 1914, appointed President W. L. Ross receiver. The application was made by Horatio C. Creith, of H. C. Creith & Co., Columbus, Ohio, contractors, on a claim of $10,711, for material and labor. It is alleged that the floating debt exceeds $400,000. Bondholders' committee: Default having occurred on the payment of the August 1, 1914, coupons on the collateral trust 4 per cent bonds, the below mentioned committee requested holders of series A and series B to deposit the same with the Union Trust Co., New York, depository, in order that their interests might be adequately protected. Committee: Edwd. G. Merrill, president of Union Trust Co., New York, chairman; R. Walter Leigh, of Maitland, Coppell & Co.; Roberts Walker, of White & Case; and A. V. Morton, vice president of Pennsylvania Co., for insurance on lives and granting annuities, Philadelphia; with Louis C. Krauthoff, as counsel, and G. K. B. Wade, as secretary, 80 Broadway, New York. The time for making deposits expired December 18, 1914. Over 80 per cent of the bonds has been deposited. Stockholders committee: At the request of a very large majority of the holders of the preferred and common stock, the following have agreed to act as a protective committee to safeguard the interests of the said stockholders. Deposits of stock will be asked for in due course. Committee: Jules S. Bache, chairman; Walter S. Crandall; Edmon G. Hammersley; Colgate Hoyt; and Walter C. Taylor; with E. P. Goetz, as secretary, 42 Broadway, New York. In January, 1915, the above committee stated that a substantial amount of the stock has been deposited. Also that conditions are such that protective measures should be taken at once. Further deposits without delay were urged. Empire Trust Co., New York, is depository. The time for making deposits is limited to expire February 1, 1915, after which date no further deposits will be received, except upon such conditions as the committees may impose.

Trinity & Brazos Valley Ry.—On June 16, 1914, on petition of the Old Colony Trust Co., Boston, trustee of the first mortgage bonds, alleging that company had defaulted on interest due January 1, 1914, the road was placed in the hands of J. W. Robins, president, as receiver. The receivership is friendly. Trackage agreements have been abrogated and service terminated by company between Houston and Galveston, between Dallas and Fort Worth, Fort Worth and Cleburne, and Dallas and Waxahachie. Receiver Robins has announced that all parties to the trackage contracts have agreed to their abrogation, making it immediately effective. This will result in saving of $210,825 yearly to road.

Valdosta, Moultrie & Western R. R.—Judge Thomas in the superior court at Valdosta, Ga., on August 23, 1914, on application of the Valdosta Bank & Trust Co., trustee for the bondholders, under suit to foreclose the mortgage, appointed B. P. Jones permanent receiver. On petition of the minority stockholders A. L. Davis and C. I. Harrell were appointed coreceivers, and Frank Roberts and W. B. Coneley advisory receivers and sales commissioners. Judge Thomas, on July 29, 1914, ordered the foreclosure sale of the road on December 1, 1914, in the suit brought by B. P. Jones as holder of the $300,000 bonds. Mr. Jones obtained a verdict for the amount loaned, with interest at 8 per cent. Stockholders and creditors will, it is stated, appeal and carry the case to the supreme court.

Wabash, Chester & Western R. R.—Judge Bernreuter in the circuit court at Chester, Ill., on July 15, 1914, appointed J. F. Gilster, of Chester, as receiver of the property in the foreclosure proceedings brought by Edwards Whitaker and St. Louis Union Trust Co., mortgage trustees. Taxes and bond interest are in default, the interest due January 1, 1914, on the $300,000 first-mortgage bonds, it is said, remaining unpaid, as well as the interest for 20 years passed on the $390,000 first consols. For two years past the road has failed to earn even its operating expenses, and President C. B. Cole and associates have been carrying it.

Wabash, Pittsburgh Terminal Ry.—On May 29, 1908, the United States circuit court at Pittsburgh, Pa., appointed Francis H. Skelding and Henry W. McMaster as receivers of the property. On March 30, 1912, F. H. Skelding resigned as coreceiver. On December 18, 1912, an order was made appointing Horace F. Baker receiver to succeed Henry W. McMaster, who resigned. The bill of complaint stated that the company had defaulted on the payment of the principal and interest of a $300,000 7 per cent note made November 30, 1906, to the Wabash Railroad Co., and was unable to meet the interest due June 1, 1908, on the $30,236,000 first-mortgage fours. Protective committees have been formed as follows: First-mortgage bondholders' committees—(1) James N. Wallace, chairman; Haley Fiske, Paul Morton, Gordon Abbott, George P. Butler, Harry Bronner, D. Crawford Clark, Charles C. Jackson, Asa S. Wing, with Franklin Babcock, secretary, 54 Wall Street, New York. Joline, Larkin & Rathbone, counsel. Depositaries: Central Trust Co., New York, and Old Colony Trust Co., Boston. (2) Opposition committee—James C. Chaplin, chairman; William R. Nicholson, Clarence L. Harper, Meigs H. Whaples, Richard Sutro, with William C. Taylor, secretary, 37 Wall Street, New York. Samuel Untermeyer, counsel. Depositaries: Columbia Trust Co., New York; Colonial Trust Co., Pittsburgh; Land Title & Trust Co., Philadelphia; and Connecticut Trust & Safe Deposit Co., Hartford. Second-mortgage bondholders' committee: Alex. J. Hemphill, chairman; H. S. Redmond, A. J. Miller, A. H. Wiggin, New York, with Lewis B. Franklin, secretary, 140 Broadway, New York. Hornblower, Miller & Potter, counsel. Depositary: Guaranty Trust Co., of New York and London, England. Foreclosure: The Mercantile (now Bankers) Trust Co., as trustee under the first mortgage brought suit in the United States court at Pittsburgh, Pa., on September 2, 1908, to foreclose the mortgage, which court on January 3, 1913, ordered foreclosure sale of the property, with an upset price of $6,000,000. Reorganization and merger plan: Early in May, 1913, Daniel B. Ely & Co., of New York, issued in pamphlet form their plan for the reorganization of the company, and the Wheeling & Lake Erie R. R. under title of Wheeling, Lake Erie & Pittsburgh R. R. Co. The pamphlet presents two plans which differ merely in the manner of raising the $25,500,000 necessary new cash. Plan No. 1 calls for the sale of $30,000,000 first and refunding mortgage 5 per cent bonds. The alternate plan provided in view of the then market conditions, that in place of selling the first and refunding bonds there should be sold $21,000,000 3-year 6 per cent notes, secured by pledge of said bonds, and that for the remainder of the cash there should be paid an assessment of 11 per cent, for which there would be given at 86 $5,965,000 first and refunding mortgage bonds, stamped as incomes for seven years. Government investigation: Chairman Adamson, of the House Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, on July 16, 1914, announced that he had received assurances from the Interstate Commerce Commission that it would make an investigation into the affairs of the company as soon as it had completed its inquiry into the Pere Marquette R. R.

Wabash Railroad.—On December 18, 1911, receivers were appointed by the Circuit (now District) Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri, of all the railroads and property, and default having been made on January 1, 1912, in the payment of the interest which fell due on that date upon all first-refunding and extensions-mortgage bonds, an action was instituted in the above-named court for the foreclosure of the first refunding and extensions mortgage, and a receivership was extended to the foreclosure action and still continues. A decree for the foreclosure of the mortgage was entered by the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of Missouri on January 30, 1914, and has also been entered in all courts of ancillary jurisdiction. Edward B. Pryor is now sole receiver. Judge Adams in the United States district court of St. Louis on January 30, 1914, ordered the foreclosure sale of the road. Upset price, \$34,000,000. Charles H. Krum, of St. Louis, was appointed special master to execute the sale. Readjustment committee: Winslow S. Pierce, chairman; Robert Goelet, Thomas H. Hubbard, Alvin W. Krech, Johannes Luden, Robert Fleming, with H. R. Winthrop, secretary, and Equitable Trust Co., New York, depository. Murray, Prentice & Howland and Pierce & Greer, counsel. First-refunding and extensions-mortgage bondholders' committee: James N. Wallace, chairman; Henry R. Carse, John J. Mitchell, Robert L. Montgomery, H. K. Pomroy, William A. Read, J. Herndon Smith, Alex. M. White, Willard V. King, and Albert H. Wiggin, with Franklin L. Babcock, secretary. J. P. Cotton, jr., counsel. Central Trust Co., New York, depository. Stockholders' protective committee: J. Horace Harding, chairman; Franklin Q. Brown, Charles H. Keep, Frank B. Keech, Arthur Koppell, Philip Lehman, and Frank K. Sturgis, with Pemberton Perinan as secretary, and Carter, Ledyard & Milburn as counsel. Columbia Trust Co., New York, depository. Noteholders' committee: The receivers of the company having defaulted in the payment of the principal of the \$5,000,000 extended $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent notes, due May 1, 1913, the following committee representing a majority of the notes agreed to act for the protection of the noteholders: John W. Platten, chairman; Otto T. Bannard, and Henry R. Ickelheimer, with Calvert Brewer, 55 Cedar Street, New York, secretary, United States Mortgage & Trust Co., New York, depository. The committee advanced the amount of the May 1, 1913, coupon to depositing noteholders who desired it. Judge Lacombe, in the United States district court in New York on January 11, 1915, by consent of all parties, dismissed the cross bill of the Bankers' Trust Co. in the suit brought by the Central Trust Co. to foreclose the \$5,000,000 $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent notes of 1905, payment of which was extended to May 1, 1913. First-refunding and extensions 4 per cent bonds; \$35,602,000 of these bonds (being the entire amount issued, except those owned by the Wabash R. R. Co., and either held in its treasury or pledged as collateral security for certain of its obligations) have been listed on the New York Stock Exchange. The entire amount was deposited and pledged by the Wabash R. R. Co. with certain bankers on or about February 11, 1911, as further security for an obligation of the Wabash R. R. Co. incurred in connection with the purchase of \$8,000,000 of 3-year 5 per cent notes of the Wheeling & Lake Erie R. R. Co. By the terms of the agreements under which said bonds were pledged the pledges thereof were entitled, upon default being made in the payment of the principal of said obligation or of the interest thereon, to sell all or any part of the securities held as collateral, and default having been made by the Wabash R. R. Co. in the payment of the principal of said obligation, which became due and payable on August 1, 1913, all of the securities held as collateral were offered for sale at public auction in the city of New York, and were sold and are in the hands of bona fide holders for value and by the terms of the foreclosure decree above mentioned the holders thereof are entitled to enforce the aforesaid bonds together with the coupons annexed thereto, maturing January 1, 1912, and subsequently against the Wabash R. R. Co. and its property.

Watauga & Yadkin River R. R.—W. J. Grandin was appointed receiver of company on November 12, 1914.

West Side Belt R. R.—On June 22, 1908, F. H. Skelding and H. W. McMaster were appointed receivers of the property. On March 30, 1912, F. H. Skelding resigned as coreceiver. On December 18, 1912, Horace F. Baker was appointed receiver to succeed Henry W. McMaster, who resigned. In August, 1912, Judge Young, in the United States district court at Pittsburgh, Pa., entered a decree directing the sale of the property to take place October 29, 1912, under the judgment of the Pittsburgh Construction Co., at an upset price of $1,500,000. On September 16, 1912, Judge Orr entered a decree in the same court reducing the upset price from $1,500,000 to $1,250,000. The lien of the construction company of about $483,000 has been taken over by the reorganization committee of the Wabash Pittsburgh Terminal Ry. Co. in order to give the committee an opportunity to arrange a plan of reorganization which may make it unnecessary that the property be sold. No sale had taken place to January 23, 1915.

Western Maryland Ry.—The interest due January 1, 1915, both on the $10,000,000 5 per cent notes of 1912 and on the $6,000,000 unsecured 6 per cent notes (all of which mature July 1, 1915), was deferred. The company invited the cooperation of the note holders to the end that the comprehensive plans for a financial readjustment may be more speedily and effectively consummated. The committee named below is accordingly urging the immediate deposit of all the notes with the January, 1915, coupon attached at the Bankers' Trust Co., New York, depository, under agreement dated December 14, 1914. As of January 1, 1915, over 85 per cent of the aggregate amount of the notes had been deposited. Note holders' committee: Frederick T. Gates, chairman, Ivy L. Lee, Alvin W. Krech, Edgar L. Marston, and Edward D. Adams, with Hunter S. Marston, secretary, 24 Broad Street, New York, and Lawrence Greer, counsel. Under date of December 14, 1914, a circular was issued by the note holders' committee. Among other things the circular stated that the company has had under consideration for some time past plans of financial readjustment, embracing the separation of the properties of the system into three distinct units, viz, the railroad lines, the terminal properties, and the coal properties, and the establishment of appropriate capital resources for future needs and development. The progress of these plans has been temporarily checked through the outbreak of the war in Europe, and the company has determined that a postponement of the entire consummation of its plans is necessary, pending the restoration to more normal conditions.

Western Pacific Ry.—The following announcement was made on August 6, 1914: "The board of directors of the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. has authorized the announcement that the interest which will fall due September 1, 1914, upon Western Pacific Ry. first-mortgage bonds will be paid, but if the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. is to continue its support of the Western Pacific Ry. some plan of adjustment of Western Pacific Ry. finances and the relation of the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. hereto must be devised which will be acceptable to the holders of the bonds, and that a call for the deposit of these bonds will be put forth at an early date by a committee of responsible bankers, looking to the adoption of a plan which will at once lighten the burden which the Denver & Rio Grande R. R. is now carrying to place the financial structure of the system upon a basis of recognized solvency and credit, and as far as may be practical provide means for the development of the Western Pacific Ry."

Wheeling & Lake Erie R. R.—On June 8, 1908, Judge R. W. Taylor, in the United States district court at Toledo, appointed B. A. Worthington receiver for the company, on application made by the National Car Wheel Co., a creditor to the extent of $87,910. On July 21, 1910, receiver purchased at foreclosure sale the property of the Toledo Dock & Coal Co. for $63,400, it being deemed advisable to retain control of this dock property on the Toledo Harbor. In June, 1912, William M. Duncan was appointed receiver to succeed B. A. Worthington, who resigned. In December, 1912, Judge Day, in the United States district court at Cleveland, granted the request of minority stockholders of the Wheeling & Lake Erie R. R. Co. to make the Wabash R. R. Co. a party defendant in the Wheeling & Lake Erie receivership suit. Stockholders' protective committees: J. R. Nutt, William J. Mather, George T. Bishop, Cleveland; John W. Platten, New York; with Calvert Brewer, 55 Cedar Street, New York, and John M. Garfield, Cleveland, Ohio, as secretaries. United States Mortgage & Trust Co., New York, and Citizens' Savings & Trust Co., Cleveland, depositories. Frank H. Ginn, counsel, Cleveland. The following constitute a temporary stockholders' committee: Joseph Ramsey, jr., and Ralph E. Slavens, New York, and J. & J. Taussig and Wernse & Diekman, St. Louis, Mo. Decision: Judge Day, in the United States district court at Cleveland, Ohio, on January 5, 1914, sustaining the contention of the minority stockholders, held illegal and void the contracts of 1902 and 1904, under which the Wheeling & Lake Erie and Wabash R. Rs. were to turn over to the Wabash Pittsburgh Terminal Ry. 25 per cent of the gross receipts on all traffic interchanged. Judgment was also awarded for $578,193 against the Wabash and the Wabash Pittsburgh Terminal Ry., lessening by that amount the sum (said to be about $1,000,000) due by Wheeling & Lake Erie to those companies. The court also upheld the validity of the $3,000,000 notes issued in 1905, which were secured by deposit of general mortgage bonds, and deposited as part collateral for the Wabash loan, the latter having been purchased at auction on August 1, 1913, by the Kuhn, Loeb & Co. syndicate that made the loan. Foreclosure sale: Judge Day, in the United States district court at Cleveland, Ohio, on April 1, 1914, ordered the foreclosure sale of property; upset price $20,000,000. The upset price was increased from $12,000,000 at the request of the minority stockholders. The property was advertised to be sold at auction in Cleveland on September 25 under foreclosure of the general mortgage of 1905. The sale was to be made subject to the several prior lien mortgages executed by the company and its predecessor prior to August 1, 1905, and subject also to all equipment trust agreements, including the receivers' equipment trust, dated March 1, 1913. No bids were received on September 25, 1914, the upset price, $20,000,000, being declared too high. The sale was postponed indefinitely and the matter referred back to Federal Judge Clarke for further action. Upset price reduced: In December, 1914, press dispatches stated that Judge Clarke had fixed $18,500,000 as the price at which the road may be sold.

Williamsville, Greenville & St. Louis Ry.—The United States district court at St. Louis, Mo., on September 6, 1913, appointed R. E. Slowey, of Greenville, Mo., as receiver. The road was sold at foreclosure sale on November 10, 1914. The Ozark Valley R. R. Co. has been incorporated as the probable successor to the Williamsville, Greenville & St. Louis Ry.

Wisconsin, Minnesota & Pacific R. R.—In September, 1912, a protective committee was formed requesting the deposit of bonds with the Central Trust Co., New York, depository, or Martin's Bank (Ltd.), London, as agent for depository. Committee: James N. Wallace (chairman), Sidney C. Borg, Charles R. Cox, R. W. Leigh, and L. B. Schlesinger, with F. L. Babcock, secretary, 54 Wall Street, New York, and L. C. Krauthoff, C. A. Severance, and A. A. Cook, as counsel.

Wisconsin & Michigan Ry.—Effective February 1, 1912, S. N. Harrison, of Peshtigo, Wis., was appointed receiver pursuant to order of the district court of the United States.

Rock Island Co.—The following committee in February, 1914, urged deposit of the common and preferred shares with the Bankers' Trust Co., New York, depository: William A. Read, Arthur Curtiss James, William Church Osborn, Ogden Mills, Francis L. Hine, Andrew J. Miller, Benjamin Strong, jr., and Festus J. Wade, with F. W. Mowle, 28 Nassau Street, New York, as secretary, and B. W. Jones, 16 Wall Street, New York, as assistant secretary. Counsel: Hornblower, Miller & Potter and Cadwalader, Wickersham & Taft. Mr. Mille is a member of the firm of Boissevain & Co. and represents the large Dutch holdings. The above stockholders' protective committee sent in November, 1914, a circular to holders of certificates of deposit of the preferred and common stock announcing its intention to disband. Tentative plan abandoned: The stockholders' protective committee, William A. Read, chairman, on July 21, 1914, announced: "A tentative plan for the reorganization of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co. was adopted by the bondholders and stockholders' protective committees on June 19, 1914. The plan contemplated that about $30,000,000 should be raised by subscription by the bondholders of the railroad and the stockholders of the Rock Island Co. to a proposed 7 per cent preferred stock of the railway. At the request of the committee a revised balance sheet and estimate of earnings has been prepared by the officers of the railway to conform, in their opinion, to the accounting rules of the Interstate Commerce Commission as revised and made effective July 1, 1914. This statement was presented on July 17, 1914, and after careful consideration the stockholders' protective committee has deemed it inadvisable to proceed with the tentative plan. The syndicate which was formed to underwrite the plan, and which was oversubscribed, has declined to proceed and has been dissolved." Investigation: Inquiry by the Interstate Commerce Commission at Washington into the affairs of the Rock Island System was commenced October 16, 1914, before Commissioner Clements and Chief Counsel Folk. Inquiry is the result of introduction in House in February, 1914, of a resolution calling for information as to "nature of control exercised by said holding companies," Rock Island Co. and Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific R. R. Co., over the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co.; the amount of profit made by the promoters of said transactions and banks or financial institutions connected therewith, and the effect of these transactions upon the status of the Chicago, Rock Island & Pacific Ry. Co."

NEW YORK, March 9, 1915.

MR. LEWIS K. BROWN,

Secretary United States Commission on Industrial Relations, Transportation Building, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SIR: In reply to your letter of the 23d of February, which has not been answered earlier on account of my absence, I would say:

1. Minimum yearly income for unskilled labor.

We assume this refers to outside labor, $514.80. Inside labor, also unskilled, would be at least 20 per cent higher.

2. Statement showing policy of company with reference to the amount of compensation given by the company in case of accidents, covering loss of limbs, eyes, permanent disability, or loss of life.

Our various interests operate under compensation acts in all States except Pennsylvania, in which State accidents covering loss of limbs, eyes, and permanent disability are dealt with individually. In case of loss of life the beneficiaries of every employee receive compensation from our relief fund in addition to what is paid by insurance companies in cases of liability.

3. Wages paid monthly to miners and rate per ton upon which wages are based.

Hand mining, $0.72 run of mine; machine mining, $0.53 run of mine; wages paid semimonthly.

4. Working hours of drivers, dumpers, and other unskilled labor.

Working hours of drivers, dumpers, motormen, spraggers, and unskilled labor, 8 to 10 hours.

5. The minimum rent rate for company houses and the percentage of cost upon which the rent is figured.

The minimum rent on six-room company houses is $5 per month, including water. House rents are not arrived at on percentage basis of their cost of construction. A house to-day costs double what it did 10 or 15 years ago. All wages paid have advanced from 65 to 100 per cent. The cost of construction of miners' houses has increased at least 100 per cent. Rents have advanced about 30 per cent.

We trust the above affords the information you desire.

Very truly, yours,

EDWARD J. BERWIND.

Agreement entered into June 17, 1912, by and between the National Liberal Immigration League of New York, party of the first part, and Bela A. Sekely, of New York, party of the second part, witnesseth:

First. Party of the second part agrees to endeavor to raise financial support for the National Liberal Immigration League and party of the first part agrees and obliges itself to pay to party of the second part commissions as stated in the following paragraph for each and all contributions and donations secured by party of the second part.

Second. It is mutually agreed by the contracting parties that party of the first part will pay to party of the second part the following commissions on each of the donations and contributions secured by party of the second part:

(a) On sums over $10,000 (ten thousand dollars), a commission of 10 per cent (ten per cent);

(b) On sums over $5,000 (five thousand dollars) up to $10,000 (ten thousand dollars), a commission of 15 per cent (fifteen per cent);

(c) On sums over $1,000 (one thousand dollars) up to $5,000 (five thousand dollars), a commission of 20 per cent (twenty per cent);

(d) On sums amounting to $1,000 (one thousand dollars) or less, a commission of 25 per cent (twenty-five per cent);

(e) On all contributions and donations made by parties after one year has elapsed since their first contribution was made, party of the first part will pay to party of the second part a commission of only 10 per cent (ten per cent), irrespective of the size of such contributions or donations.

Third. It is mutually understood and agreed that when a single contribution is made by business concerns known as trusts or holding companies, this contribution comprising the contributions of several subsidiary companies of such trust or holding company (like the United States Steel Corporation), then the amount of such contribution is to be subdivided by the number of companies belonging to such trust or holding company and the percentage of commission is to be determined by and to be paid on each of the average amounts shown by the subdivision stated above.

Fourth. Party of the first part agrees to pay to party of the second part a weekly sum of twenty-five dollars ($25) to cover his personal expenses, the total of such payments, however, to be deducted from the total of commissions due to party of the second part.

Fifth. Party of the first part agrees to pay the traveling expenses for party of the second part and such necessary business expenses as typewriting, etc.

This agreement can be discontinued by either party in giving two weeks' notice to the other party.

MY DEAR MR. SEKELY: I am going shortly to Liverpool, as everything depends on the decision taken there. I will do my best—as far as argument and persuasion can go.

Received your friendly lines the 5th inst. I hope by this time you have received from Mr. Waron or otherwise the $30.

Very glad to hear that you will go often to the office.
 I enjoyed the trip in the steamer where I could do good service by refraining from sitting at table at night for supper. No more so, since I must count the sous and the pfennigs.

Let us hope, with kind regards for you and Mr. Berlin,
 Yours,

I hope you will obtain from Mr. O'Brien to sign a letter to the signatories, which I will send by next mail. The object of the letter in question is to notify our signatories that we will append their names to our arguments.

OCTOBER 14, 1913.

SUSQUEHANNA COAL Co.,
 907 Arcade Bldg., Philadelphia, Pa.

GENTLEMEN: There are now eight new restrictive bills before Congress. One of them, introduced by Representative Roddenbery, provides for an educational test, increase of head tax from $4 to $25, possession of $100, and a physical test like that imposed on recruits for the Navy.

Worst of all these bills is the new Dillingham measure, providing that not more than 10 per cent of the number of any nationality in this country shall be admitted in any one year.

As soon as the regular session of Congress opens there will be started a bitter fight on immigration. We must be prepared, and the most effective way is to strengthen the hands of this league, which is the official organization of the liberal immigration movement. To do this is the duty of every citizen who believes in keeping the gates of America open to deserving immigrants.

This league has no lobby in Washington and never has had one. It has always worked openly in legitimate and commendable ways, by educating public opinion, by holding meetings in various parts of this country, and sending delegations to Washington when necessary. We believe this honest expression of enlightened public sentiment will in the end triumph over the methods of the restrictionists. But we must present a united front, and to that end we ask you to send your contribution, as you did last March.

Very truly, yours,

NATIONAL LIBERAL IMMIGRATION LEAGUE.

Rough drafts used as basis for letter to Andrew Carnegie, appealing for contributions and indorsing National Association of Manufacturers:

DEAR SIR: May I for a moment claim your kind attention to the character and labors of the National Liberal Immigration League?

The chief aim of our league is to preserve for our country the benefits of immigration while keeping out undesirable immigrants.

Amongst our definite achievements, I may say that since December, 1905, our league has, by means of open agitation, through mass meetings and the distribution of argumentative literature, defeated all anti-immigration bills, beginning with the Gardner bill, No. 8495, introduced that year, which provided for a $40 head tax. Conspicuous amongst such bills defeated by us was the Hayes bill of 1910.

All along we have ceaselessly been advocating the distribution of immigrants and labor, improvements in steerage conditions, and increased facilities for the naturalization of aliens worthy of that privilege, while on the other hand it has been our continued aim to promote good citizenship and patriotic sentiment amongst immigrants.

Up till recently we were receiving from a steamship line (name) $15,000 per annum, which, however, scarcely covered our running expenses, considering the vast amount of literature we print and distribute during the year. But the steamship line in question no longer see their way to keep up their contribution, and so we are compelled to fall back for support upon appeals to private citizens. We are confident that the responses will come in according to our deserts.

As a friend of our cause, as shown by yourself in your letter to our president, February 2, 1911, we would appeal to you to head our list of subscribers.

Sincerely, yours,

The league, however, is fully inclined to indorse the National Council for Industrial Defense, organized and conducted under the leadership of the National Association of Manufacturers. We are convinced that their activities are beneficent to labor as well as to capital, to employees as well as to employers.

Yours, very truly,

The foregoing paragraph was evidently an afterthought.

DEAR SIR: This morning I said to Mr. Boas that I am continually assailed by creditors to whom we are indebted for rent, printing, etc. I added that it had been suggested to me to send these people to him, but he had always acted so kindly and gentlemanlike that I found it my duty to spare him any trouble. He suggested to me to address to you the following cablegram:

"We owe over seven thousand dollars in salaries, rent, printing, etc. Unless we pay immediately, we will be sued and put in bankruptcy, with disagreeable consequences for all concerned." which I did.

NOVEMBER 23, 1910.

MESSRS. JAPHOT & SAGET,

Compagnie Generale Transatlantique, Rue Auber, Paris, France.

GENTLEMEN: We arrived safely on the 22d instant. I was permitted to leave the steamer without any formality, as an American citizen; but my baggage naturally went with the rest to Ellis Island, causing me some annoyance and loss of time. On the 24th I went to Washington to see the Secretary and hand him over a letter from the secretary of our league, of which I inclose copy. I inclose also clipping from the Sun on this subject. The same has been appearing throughout the press generally, even in the Call, which is the Socialist paper.

Though I am personally not unknown to the Secretary, still I took with me my friend, Mr. William S. Bennet, who is prominent in the Republican Party. The Secretary assured us that he and the President are anxious to prevent the breaking of family ties of American residents, but the law must be obeyed, according to the decision given by the Solicitor, as per inclosed. But he will do his best to make the application as rare and as lenient as possible.

As to the consequences of the last election, I was told at Washington that they would be felt in the tariff question, the Democrats being since long declared against the tariff, if not unanimously, at any rate in an overwhelming majority. As to the immigration question, there are Democratic restrictionists as well as liberals, and to be more correct, they go according to the manifestation of public opinion.

I will urge all my friends to start a tremendous agitation throughout the country, beginning in December and continuing through January. I shall be very glad to receive your contribution as soon as possible, as I am compelled to make inroads now before the end of November in the supplies which are to last until August, 1911.

Respectfully, yours.

NB-SRP.

The following letter is from Mr. Rene Sagot to Mr. Behar, responding to the latter's letter of November 23, 1910:

PARIS, 30th December, 1910.

Dear Mr. BEHAR:

I was glad to hear that you had a good crossing on the Chicago and that you landed safely on the other side.

I suppose my chiefs have now written to you. Anyhow I most thank you for the very interesting literature you have forwarded to me.

Would you mind in future addressing your correspondence to my chief alone and not mention my name on the address, as I am far from being on the same footing in the firm.

Wishing you a happy, healthy, and prosperous new year, believe me, dear Mr. Behar,

Yours, very truly,

RENE SAGOT.

Mr. E. L. BOAS,

Resident Director and General Manager Hamburg-American Line, 45 Broadway, New York.

DEAR MR. BOAS: Your wire arrived too late to secure to-day the information you want on Charles Nagel, but I shall do my best to write you fully to-morrow. The inclosed article appeared in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat on January 19.

Yours, very truly,

J. PANNES.

The following is a copy of a newspaper dispatch printed in the St. Louis Globe-Democrat:

NAGEL SLATED FOR CABINET POSITION—SECRETARY OF COMMERCE AND LABOR PORTFOLIO FOR NATIONAL COMMITTEEMAN—HIS NAME ON THE LIST—TAFT PLANS TO KEEP IT THERE, ACCORDING TO RELIABLE REPORT—NO PULLING FOR HIM—ST. LOUISAN'S WORK ATTRACTED ATTENTION OF PRESIDENT-ELECT LONG AGO.

(Special dispatch to the Globe-Democrat.)

WASHINGTON, January 18.

From a source whose reliability can not be brought into question, it was learned to-day that the name of Charles Nagel, of St. Louis, appears at this time on the tentative list of the Cabinet of President-elect Taft. The place opposite the name of Mr. Nagel is that of Secretary of Commerce and Labor.

From the same source comes the story that Mr. Taft, having completed a tentative draft of his Cabinet slate, does not propose to change it before his departure for Panama. He will upon his return take up with Senator Knox, who is to be his Secretary of State, some of the Cabinet places which have not been definitely offered to the men picked out for them. Close up to March 4, when he is to be inaugurated, the President elect will make his final revision in the light of some inquiries which Mr. Knox is to make for him.

WANTED MISSOURI TO HAVE PLACE.

It develops that early in his consideration of his Cabinet the President-elect determined that Missouri should have a place. One of the fond desires of Mr. Taft was to carry Missouri. He felt that there would be a labor defection which would make him suffer in some parts of the country.

Mr. Roosevelt, during the campaign, twitted Mr. Taft repeatedly about carrying Missouri, telling the candidate that he might make a good race (the President was always confidence of Mr. Taft's election, and said so to all who asked him), but he never would duplicate his own performance in introducing the "mysterious stranger" into the Republican camp. When the slow returns made it apparent that Taft had carried Missouri there was a rapid-fire exchange of pleasantries between the two.

HEARD GOOD ABOUT NAGEL.

Mr. Nagel was brought to the favorable attention of Mr. Taft during the administration of Mr. Roosevelt. Mr. Taft was several times the guest of Mr. Nagel. Mr. Taft often heard eulogistic references to Mr. Nagel from Mr. Roosevelt. While the national campaign was on, the best of reports came from Chicago as to the intelligent advice which Mr. Nagel was able to give to the campaign managers. Not only was he referred to in many steps taken in the Middle West, but he had a controlling voice, so it was said, in many of the general policies adopted in the national campaign.

It was also asserted to-day that no member of the Taft Cabinet will come into his place with less of wiring pulling and solicitation in his behalf. It is said that after a dignified presentation of Mr. Nagel's name from the right quarters no campaign was carried on in his behalf, and that the only further representations made were at the solicitation of Mr. Taft, who sought additional information.

ONLY ONE ADVERSE REPORT.

The only adverse movement in connection with Mr. Nagel's name was that which involved bringing the President-elect's attention to the fact that Mr. Nagel's law firm had as clients a big brewery concern, and also, at one time, the Standard Oil Co. This information was conveyed to Mr. Taft by one of his senatorial friends with whom he went over his tentative Cabinet list. Recently the President-elect has fully informed himself as to the reports. After weighing them carefully, he is said to have fully determined that Mr. Nagel's high personal character and the character of his law service has been such as in no way to disqualify him for the service which Mr. Taft seeks at his hands.

Although Mr. Nagel's name has been frequently associated with the place of Secretary of the Interior, it is said that place will go to R. A. Ballinger, of the State of Washington.

TREASURY PORTFOLIO UNFILED.

AUGUSTA, GA., January 18.

That the President-elect has not determined who is to be his Secretary of the Treasury is indicated by the circumstance that he to-day had a conversation with J. Shaffer, president of the Chicago Post, regarding the qualifications of the several Chicagoans whose appointment has been urged by Schaffer, who came here at the special request of the President-elect for this conference. He says Mr. Taft is giving careful attention to the Treasury portfolio, and that he may not decide the matter until immediately before his inauguration.

Walter S. Dickey, Republican State chairman of Missouri, will talk politics with Mr. Taft to-morrow.

The following letter is upon the official letterhead of the Hamburg-American Line, and discloses the campaign to make Mr. Charles Nagel Secretary of Commerce and Labor of President Taft's Cabinet:

DEAR MR. BOAS: The inclosed abstract from the Book of St. Louisans contains condensed information on Mr. Nagel's professional and political career, also of the career of his former partner, Judge Finkelnburg.

Mr. Nagel is an intimate friend of Mr. Adolphus Busch and is attorney for the Anheuser-Busch Brewing Association.

I am now waiting for additional information from Mr. Joseph A. Wright, an attorney, with whom I am very well acquainted and on whose discretion I can rely absolutely.

Information secured from other sources is too general in its nature and, I suppose, of no use to you. I refer to the general statements that he is highly respected, upright, a conservative, etc.

The inclosed clipping is from to-day's Globe-Democrat.

I hope to have other particulars to-morrow morning in time for the mail, which reaches New York on Saturday afternoon.

Yours, very truly,

NAGEL QUILTS PIERCE CASE—FILES FORMAL NOTICE OF WITHDRAWAL IN MISSOURI SUPREME COURT—HIS CONNECTION WITH SUIT—ACTION IS NO SURPRISE, BUT MAY HAVE BEEN HASTENED BY TALK OF A CABINET OFFICER.

(Special dispatch to the Globe-Democrat.)

JEFFERSON CITY, Mo., January 20.

Charles Nagel, of the firm of Nagel & Kirby, of St. Louis, who is said to be on the Taft Cabinet slate for Secretary of the Department of Labor, to-day filed with the clerk of the Supreme Court of Missouri formal notice of the withdrawal of his firm as associate counsel for the Waters-Pierce Oil Co., which in the ouster suits was shown to be largely owned by the Standard Oil Co. The notice of withdrawal was sent by mail.

When Gov. Hadley, then attorney general, filed his oil suits to oust the Standard Oil and Republic Oil Cos. from the State and to revoke the charter of the Waters-Pierce Co., the latter a Missouri corporation, Charles Nagel was to have been general counsel for the Waters-Pierce Co. His outlined policy of defense did not suit Mr. H. Clay Pierce, president of the board of directors of the company, and Judge John D. Johnson was made general counsel and Judge Sam Priest his associate. Nagel was retained in a minor capacity and took little part in the hearing of the oil cases before Commissioner Anthony. About his only connection with the case was in consultation and in making a final argument of about an hour before the commissioner in St. Louis when the case was submitted on the testimony.

Although Mr. Nagel stated some time ago that he meant to withdraw from the case, the fact that President-elect Taft has slated him for a Cabinet position as a reward for his good work for Republicanism in Missouri while serving as national committeeman may have hastened his action.

Here is a biographical writeup of Mr. Charles Nagel:

(From Book of St. Louisans, published by the St. Louis Republic, 1906. Data for biographical sketches furnished by the parties themselves.)

NAGEL, CHARLES, lawyer, born in Colorado County, Tex., August 9, 1849; son of Dr. Herman and Fredericka Nagel; educated in country school in Colorado County, Tex.; academic course in private school and high school, St. Louis, two years' course in St. Louis Law School, and one year in University of Berlin, where studied Roman law, political economy, etc.; married, first, Louisville, Ky., 1876, Fannie Brandeis; one child, Hildegard, living; married, second, St. Louis, 1895, Anne Schepley, four children, Mary S., Edith, Charles, and Anne Dorothe. Returned to St. Louis after studying abroad in 1873, and engaged in practice; associated at different times with various partners, and January 1, 1903, became partner in firm of Finkelnburg, Nagel & Kirby, which changed, on the withdrawal of Judge Finkelnburg, June, 1905, to Nagel & Kirby. Since 1875 has been professor at St. Louis Law School. Has been a member of the board of trustees, public library, trustee Washington University; member of board of control of St. Louis Museum of Fine Arts; member St. Louis Turner Society, Republican. Mr. EMIL L. BOAS,
Resident Director and General Manager Hamburg-American Line,
45 Broadway, New York City.

DEAR MR. BOAS: Mr. Wright could not let me know until to-day the result of his inquiries about Mr. Nagel. Mr. Wright says that in the opinion of Mr. Nagel's intimate friends he is well fitted for the post and not likely to favor legislation restricting immigration, since Missouri and the Southwest are in great need of immigrants.

This and the information already sent you is all I can secure at present. If you wish me to try for more definite information, I shall do my best to find out more.

Yours, very truly,

J. PANNES.

Here is a most illuminating and interesting letter from Mr. Behar, managing director of the National Liberal Immigration League, to Mr. Emil L. Boas, resident director of the Hamburg-American line:

JANUARY 24, 1908.

Mr. EMIL L. BOAS,
Resident Director Hamburg-American Line,
35 Broadway, New York.

DEAR SIR: The league has so far succeeded in checking the efforts of the restrictionists, but the foes of immigration are the kind of people whose energy is increased by opposition, and whose earnestness and enthusiasm grow by defeat. The Junior Order tents have multiplied in Pennsylvania and in other parts of the country, and the delegates of the Immigration Restriction League and of other restrictive organizations are agitating everywhere.

We have sent to Washington a number of delegations composed of members of various nationalities, but the delegates were not really chosen by bodies of their own nationality. If we are to continue the campaign successfully we must penetrate into the masses and interest them to send delegations and instruct Congress that they are opposed to further restriction of immigration.

Our agitation should be carried on in the following ways:

First. Through mass meetings organized in all important centers—voting resolutions.

Second. Through delegations to Congress and to all important conventions.

Third. Through public lectures and through special delegates visiting men's and women's clubs throughout the country.

Fourth. Through delegates visiting the societies of various nationalities, as Italians, Hebrews, Hungarians, etc., including the unions, for the purpose of advocating liberal immigration.

Fifth. Through literature. The league ought to continue to send pamphlets and other publications to the Members of Congress and other notable citizens and to the public in general.

Sixth. Through correspondence. We have to send appeals and communications to some 15,000 influential persons, most of them clergymen.

In order to prove effective, the propaganda must be carried on steadily all the year round. It would require vast financial resources to cover adequately all the above-enumerated points. However, if we had a definite sum of money to spend annually, we could arrange a plan for a systematic campaign, selecting the most important means of agitation. The formulation of such a plan is obviously impossible when we have no idea to what amount we may commit ourselves. We therefore suggest that a regular subvention would greatly enhance the value of our activity.

Hoping you will take this matter into consideration for the present year, I remain,

Sincerely, yours,

Managing Director.

NATIONAL LIBERAL IMMIGRATION LEAGUE.

(For the proper regulation and better distribution of immigration.)

Headquarters, No. 150 Nassau Street, New York City. Telephone, 4762 Beekman. P. O. box, 1261.

GENTLEMEN: Since 1906 this league has kept America's door open to deserving immigrants. Without it, as Members of Congress and others have repeatedly asserted, laws would have been enacted to shut out yearly hundreds of thousands of immigrants, whose labor is so much needed for our great industries.

In addition this league has constantly advocated remedial legislation, such as Federal distribution of immigrants, deportation of criminals, and other measures that would take away the evils of immigration while preserving its great blessings.

We also do educational work by distributing our literature among libraries and debating societies, from whom we receive daily requests for pamphlets. In this way we are building up a public opinion in favor of liberal immigration among future citizens.

INDUSTRIAL CONTROL AND PHILANTHROPIC FOUNDATIONS. 7757

Our league had fully carried its claims for support from all public-spirited citizens, and especially those who are connected with industries whose existence is made possible by the influx of alien unskilled labor that can not be replaced by the native element. In default of such support we will not be able to keep up our work, and the Immigration Restriction League, of Boston, will have the field to itself.

Mr. B. A. Sekely, our field representative, will call on you, and we bespeak your kind consideration on his behalf.

Yours, very truly,

EL-NCM.

FURTHER PROCEEDINGS RELATING TO COLORADO STRIKE, LARGE FOUNDA-

(For exhibits under this subject, see Vol. IX, pages 8378 to 8430)

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

NEW YORK CITY, January 25, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. Will the house please be in order, and will the audience kindly maintain as perfect order as possible?

Mr. Rockefeller.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state your name?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. John D. Rockefeller, jr.

Chairman WALSH. And where do you reside, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. 10 West Fifty-fourth Street.

Chairman WALSH. New York City?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. New York City.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is rather difficult to describe, Mr. Chairman. I spend a large part of my time in directing, with others, the various foundations which my father has established and in giving time to questions of investment.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Rockefeller, the commission has received the document entitled "Information Furnished by the Rockefeller Foundation in Response to Questionnaires Submitted by United States Commission on Industrial Relations." We thank you for this. Each member of the commission has been furnished one, and one has been furnished to the record, so that it is made already a part of the record of the commission.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Thank you. I was going to ask that that might be done, so as to make the record complete. I appreciate that.

(The document referred to by title above is printed at the end of this subject as "Rockefeller, jr., Exhibit No. 1.")

Chairman WALSH. For the present I will touch upon some general topics.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, may I say just a word?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; certainly.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The commission has been so courteous as to send me several weeks in advance the general questions which it proposed to take up at this session. I greatly appreciated that courtesy. It has given me an opportunity to consider very carefully the important matters to which the questions refer, and I have thought that it might best suit the purposes of the commission if I were to present a somewhat careful consecutive statement, which I have prepared in writing, and with your permission, Mr. Chairman, I should be glad to be allowed to read that statement at this time.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. Just proceed, Mr. Rockefeller.

(Mr. Rockefeller, jr., read as follows:)

The commission has asked my views as to what extent the stockholders and directors of a corporation are responsible for the labor conditions which exist in it and for the social conditions which are produced; how generally and in what manner such responsibilities are assumed by stockholders and directors; and in actual practice how and upon what general basis the labor policies of large corporations are determined.

The responsibility of stockholders is practically limited to the elections of directors. They have no power to elect officers, to employ labor, to make contracts, or to intervene directly in the management of the business. A large stockholder, however, is able to exercise considerable moral influence over the directors and officers and is responsible for exercising that influence properly.

The directors are responsible for the general conduct of the business; they have the power to elect officers and to determine the policies of the business. All large business has to be organized. The responsibility has to be divided and vested in various officers, and the officers have to be given powers commensurate with their responsibilities. These responsibilities are, in general, divided in such a way that the directors attend principally to the financial affairs of the corporation, leaving the actual conduct of operations to the officers.

Labor conditions, so far as they are within the control of a corporation, are matters for which the officers of the corporation are primarily responsible and with which they, by reason of their experience and their first-hand acquaintance with the facts, are best qualified to deal.

Labor policies are initiated and determined by the officers, whose efficiency is largely measured by the harmony and good will which they are able to maintain between the company and its employees. It is not customary to submit labor policies to a board of directors for action. Conference regarding them is often had with the directors or executive committee at the instance of the officers, and suggestions are made to the latter by both these bodies. A business to be successful must not only provide to labor remunerative employment under proper working conditions, but it must also render useful service to the community and earn a fair return on the money invested. The adoption of any policy toward labor, however favorable it may seem, which results in the bankruptcy of the corporation and the discontinuance of its work is as injurious to labor, which is thrown out of employment, as it is to the public, which loses the services of the enterprise, and to the stockholders, whose capital is impaired.

Social conditions surrounding an industry depend upon many factors other than labor conditions. The responsibility of a corporation located in a thickly settled and highly organized community depends upon the relative importance of the corporation to the other factors in the community. Where the activities of a corporation are carried on in new and undeveloped sections of the country social conditions are largely influenced by the attitude of the corporation and its officers, and the corporation is required to provide for many things which in a more settled community would be taken care of by the community as a whole.

Since these questions have a special significance, in so far as I am concerned, because of events in Colorado, I feel that I owe it to the commission to make a statement in reference thereto which will help to further answer the questions asked.

Anyone who has followed the controversy which has arisen out of the Colorado situation will have observed that no effort has been spared to make it appear that I have attempted to exercise a kind of absolutism over the coal industry in Colorado, and particularly that I have sought to dictate a policy of non-recognition of unions. An attitude toward industry and toward labor such as is here implied is so abhorrent to me personally and so contrary to the spirit of my whole purpose and training that I can not allow these allegations to pass unnoticed without at least outlining my responsibilities as I have viewed them and my obligations as I have sought to discharge them. While it has been said that I have exercised an absolute authority in dictating to the management of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., it has also been said that I have been too indifferent, and that as a director I should have exercised more authority. Clearly, both can not be true.

What are the facts? First, with reference to my attitude toward labor unions: I believe it to be just as proper and advantageous for labor to associate itself into organized groups for the advancement of its legitimate interests as for capital to combine for the same object. Such associations of labor manifest themselves in promoting collective bargaining in an effort to secure better working and living conditions, in providing machinery whereby grievances may easily and without prejudice to the individual be taken up with the management. Sometimes they provide benefit features, sometimes they seek to increase wages, but, whatever their specific purpose, so long as it is to promote the well-being of the employees, having always due regard for the just interests of the employer and the public, leaving every worker free to associate himself with such groups or to work independently, as he may choose, I favor them most heartily. Combinations of capital are sometimes conducted in an unworthy manner, contrary to law, and in disregard of the interest both of labor and the public. Such combinations can not be too strongly condemned nor too vigorously dealt with. Although combinations of this kind are the exception, such publicity is generally given to their unsocial acts that all combinations of capital, however rightly managed or broadly beneficent, are thereby brought under suspicion. Likewise it sometimes happens that combinations of labor are conducted without just regard for the rights of the employer or the public, and methods and practices are adopted which, because unworthy or unlawful, are deserving of public censure. Such organizations of labor bring discredit and suspicion upon other organizations which are legitimate and useful, just as is the case with improper combinations of capital, and they should be similarly dealt with. I should be the last, however, to allow the occasional failure in the working of the principle of the organization of labor to prejudice me against the principle itself, for in that principle I strongly believe. In the further development of the organization of labor and of large business the public interest, as well as the interest of labor and capital alike, will, it seems to me, be best advanced by whatever stimulates every man to do the best work of which he is capable; by a fuller recognition of the common interest of employers and employed; and by an earnest effort to dispel distrust and hatred and to promote good will.

As respects the question of the recognition or nonrecognition of labor unions in Colorado, my attitude has been in conformity with the views I have expressed relative to the responsibilities of stockholders, directors, and managers. The hiring and discharging of men and the framing of agreements as respects the same are functions which I have regarded as rightfully belonging to the management and not to the stockholders or directors. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. has been managed on this principle. The decision of the officers with respect to the recognition of the union was reached without any consultation or communication with me, and I had no knowledge of their decision until after the strike had been declared.

The correspondence between myself and the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. during the strike has been produced before this commission and is now public. If one thing more than another is shown by the letters exchanged, it is that, as respects conditions of employment and the interest of the company's employees, I have sought to inform myself and have not hesitated to make suggestions looking toward more adequate representation on the part of the employees and participation by them in the determining of matters pertaining to their working conditions. It is not less apparent, however, that I have studiously avoided anything that might afford ground, either to the employees, the management, or the public, for the belief that in any particular I was seeking to dictate a policy or to arbitrarily control any situation. The only coal property in Colorado in which we are in any way interested is the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. In addition to this company, there are many other coal mining companies in that State, in none of which either we or the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. have any interest whatsoever, and a large number of these companies were involved in the strike. For me to have attempted to dictate a policy or control the situation would have meant an assumption of authority far beyond what the investment which I represent in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. would have justified, and, if tolerated by the management of that company, would have been resented by the other companies involved in the dispute.

Since we first acquired an interest in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in 1902, the company has paid out in wages to its employees over $92,000,000. During the same period we have received dividends amounting to $371,000 on our investment in the company's capital stock. Therefore our stock interest in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. has yielded a return of about two-thirds of 1 per cent per annum on an actual cash investment of about $6,000,000. It should be stated that we hold, in addition to the stocks above mentioned, a block of bonds, but that our entire investment in the stocks and bonds of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. has yielded during a period of twelve years not more than 3½ per cent per annum. Yet during that time, instead of exploiting the industry, as has been frequently stated, we have supported a policy of development by devoting surplus earnings to improvements, thereby increasing employment, and generally extending the business, rather than paying dividends.

In testifying last year before the congressional committee which investigated the Colorado strike, Mr. James Dalrymple, coal mine inspector of the State of Colorado, said:

"I believe it fair to give credit to those operators who have cooperated with this department in making improvements recommended beyond the requirements of the present mining law. In acknowledging the concessions made by them, it must be further added that there is no authority embodied in the law by which these conceded improvements could have been enforced, no matter how essential they were to protect the life and health of the employees. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. ranks first in making improvements not compulsory or demanded by the law; it complied cheerfully with most of our recommendations."

Doubtless mistakes have been made and conditions are still imperfect. I have no desire to defend any conditions that are justly subject to criticism; I only ask that the responsibility for them be apportioned fairly. The problem now is for all concerned to develop increasing good will and to improve conditions as far as may be possible. To that end my thoughts and activities have for some time been devoted.

As to the strike itself, its many distressing features have given me the deepest concern. I frankly confess that I felt there was something fundamentally wrong in a condition of affairs which rendered possible the loss of human lives, engendered hatred and bitterness, and brought suffering and privation upon hundreds of human beings. Without seeking to apportion blame, I determined that in so far as lay within my power I would seek means of avoiding the possibility of similar conflicts arising elsewhere, or in the same industry in the future. It was in this way that I came to recommend to my colleagues in the Rockefeller Foundation the instituting of a series of studies into the fundamental problems arising out of industrial relations, which resulted in securing the services of Mr. Mackenzie King, former minister of labor of Canada, to direct the studies.

The correspondence will show that, in addition to having taken steps as early as the beginning of June last, to secure Mr. King's services, I also sought and obtained advice with respect to machinery for the prevention and adjustment of industrial differences, to which I invited the consideration of the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. In early August I wrote the president of the company, forwarding, with my indorsement, a letter from Mr. King, written in answer to my request, outlining a plan previously discussed to establish—

"A board on which both employers and employees are represented, and before which, at stated intervals, questions affecting conditions of employment can be discussed and grievances examined."

In reply to this communication the president of the company indicated that measures of the kind I had suggested were in contemplation, but that their adoption while the strike was on would only serve to embarrass their successful introduction. He further indicated that, when the strike was terminated, steps would be taken immediately to secure to the employees of the company a more direct representation of their views as regards grievances and conditions affecting their employment.

The strike was called off December 10, 1914. On December 16 Mr. David Griffiths, formerly State coal-mine inspector of Colorado, was appointed an intermediary between the company and its employees respecting matters of mutual interest.

On January 5 a notice was posted at all the company's mines inviting the employees at each of the mines to assemble in mass meeting to select by ballot one representative to every 250 employees in each camp, to represent the men at a joint meeting of themselves and the executive officers of the company in Denver "for the purpose of discussing matters of mutual concern and of considering means of more effective cooperation in maintaining fair and friendly relations."

In the published notice of these meetings it was stipulated that in order that the men might feel the greatest freedom in making their selection they should choose their own chairman and neither superintendents nor pit bosses should attend.

The notice added: "The person selected to attend the Denver conference shall be the duly accredited representative of the employees, not only at the first joint meeting, but at all subsequent joint meetings and in all matters of cooperation between the company and its employees until the employees in like meeting shall designate some other person to represent them. It is therefore highly important that the employees choose with the utmost care the one of their number in whom they have most confidence."

I have received from the president of the company a telegram informing me that this joint conference was held at Denver on the 19th instant, that the meeting had proved most satisfactory to all concerned, and that its spirit had convinced the management that it would lead to more active cooperation between the company and its employees in the future.

Thus it will be seen that the company has already taken steps to initiate a plan of representation of its employees. It is my hope and belief that from this will develop some permanent machinery which will insure to the employees of the company, through representatives of their own selection, quick and easy access to the officers with reference to any grievances, real or assumed, or with reference to wages or other conditions of employment.

In the improvement of industrial conditions in the State of Colorado, which all hope for, I am sure that the friendly cooperation of the commission of which Mr. Seth Low is chairman, recently appointed by the President of the United States, will be of assistance to all the mining companies of the State. Shortly after this commission was appointed and following conferences had at his invitation I wrote Mr. Low on December 30, asking him to assure the President of my desire and purpose to cooperate with the commission which he had appointed.

In conclusion, Mr. Chairman, quite apart from any particular situation, may I express in utter frankness the views which as an individual and a citizen I hold toward the problems into which your commission has been appointed to inquire? I believe that the ultimate object of all activities in a republic should be the development of the manhood of its citizens, that such manhood can be developed to the fullest degree only under conditions of freedom for the individual, and that industrial enterprises can and should be conducted in accordance with these principles. I believe that a prime consideration in the carrying on of industry should be the well-being of the men and women engaged in it, and that the soundest industrial policy is that which has constantly in mind the welfare of the employees as well as the making of profits, and which, when the necessity arises, subordinates profits to welfare. In order to live, the wage earner must sell his labor from day to day. Unless he can do this, the earnings from that day's labor are gone forever. Capital can defer its returns temporarily in the expectation of future profits, but labor can not. If, therefore, fair wages and reasonable living conditions can not otherwise be provided, dividends must be deferred or the industry abandoned. I believe that a corporation should be deemed to consist of its stockholders, directors, officers, and employees; that the real interests of all are one, and that neither labor nor capital can permanently prosper unless the just rights of both are conserved.

I further believe that, in matters pertaining to industrial relations, the public, quite as much as the parties engaged in industry, is entitled to confidence and consideration. Industrial relations are essentially human relations, and human relations should be not less the concern of the State as a whole than of individuals engaged in industry. My appreciation of the conditions surrounding wage earners and my sympathy with every endeavor to better these conditions are as strong as those of any man. I believe it to be the duty of every citizen to do all within his power to improve the conditions under which men work and live. I believe that that man renders the greatest social service who so cooperates in the organization of industry as to afford to the largest number of men the greatest opportunity for self-development, and the enjoyment by every man of those benefits which his own work adds to the wealth of civilization. If, with the responsibilities I have and the opportunities given me, I am able to contribute toward promoting the well-being of my fellow men through the lessening of injustice and the alleviation of human suffering, I shall feel that it has been possible to realize the highest purpose of my life.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made more than one copy of the paper which you have just read?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Has it been printed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not been published, but it has been given to these gentlemen [indicating newspaper men].

Chairman WALSH. It was given to the press?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Would you now kindly furnish a copy for each member of the commission?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think we have them here [handing a number of copies to the chairman]. If that is not sufficient I should be glad to furnish others, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. The house will be in perfect order, because we are going to proceed immediately with the balance of the examination. Please maintain perfect order. In what corporations are you personally a director, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Manhattan Railway Co., the Merchants' Fire Association, and the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Any others?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No others.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been a director in the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western Railway?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have.

Chairman WALSH. You are retired from that, are you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I retired from that within the last six months.

Chairman WALSH. And the American Linseed Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Retired from that also?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Retired from that also.

Chairman WALSH. In what other corporations do you own or represent any considerable amount of stock or bonds?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That, Mr. Chairman, would be very difficult to answer offhand. I might secure for you such information, but I have not it in mind.

Chairman WALSH. Could you mention the principal ones in which you represent any considerable amount of stock and bonds; and I use the words "principal ones" in point of amount as well as employment of workers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I represent certain investments on behalf of my father with his other associates. I also represent certain investments on behalf of the several foundations with which I am connected. As you will understand from the list which was printed in one of the questionnaires that was submitted by the commission, the list even of the holdings of the Rockefeller Foundation is very considerable. The other foundations have large holdings. My father's interests are also in addition. It will be very difficult to point out in a direct answer to your question. Can't it be taken possibly from this list of securities published in the questionnaire?

Chairman WALSH. Well, my question was, leaving that for the present, whether or not you could name here now the larger interests in which you represent any considerable amount of stock—perhaps the basic industries—steel, lumber, oil, transportation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, the railroad securities, Mr. Chairman, as you observe from examining this schedule submitted, are very numerous. There are also a number of oil securities. There is no timber, that I recall, in this list. I have forgotten the other heading you mentioned.

Chairman WALSH. Mines.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think there—I do not recall at the moment any mining interests at all in this list; but the lists are rather long, and I do not try to keep them fresh in my mind—the various items of investment.

Chairman WALSH. The list you refer to now is the list submitted in answer to the written questionnaire given to the record in which the foundation itself holds securities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I am leaving the foundation for the moment and just applying it to the other securities, for instance—but, before I leave that, you say there are no mines represented, so far as you recall, in the list submitted—that is, in the foundation list of securities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall any; but I do not keep that list entirely in mind.

Chairman WALSH. What is the Colorado Industrial Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can only say, generally, it is one of the companies included in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a holding company that holds stock in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not tell you that Mr. Chairman. My recollection is not clear on that.

Chairman WALSH. I notice there is a contribution from that source—the Colorado Industrial Co. Will you kindly at the noon recess ascertain, if possible, at your office what that company represents?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I shall be glad to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Of what does the property of that company consist—the Colorado Industrial Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Doubtless the annual report of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. would cover that question.

Chairman WALSH. Well, you may obtain it from there or any other place that you see fit.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Colorado Industrial Co.?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Are you familiar with the corporation known as the Colorado Supply Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I know that is one of the corporations which is owned by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. That is my understanding.

Chairman WALSH. And will you kindly see whether or not the stock of the Colorado Supply Co. is held or controlled in any way by the Colorado Industrial Co—unless you can say it offhand?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, I could not, offhand. Is the Colorado Supply Co.'s stock controlled by the Colorado Industrial Co.? Is that it?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Owned or controlled.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I might say, in general, Mr. Chairman, that the different names and different companies which go to make up the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. are to some extent the outgrowth of a combination or a bringing together of several smaller companies which took place before we became interested in the company; and my impression is that the Colorado Industrial Co. was a company formed in connection with the reorganization—the financial reorganization—of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in order to supply the mortgage which would cover the entire properties—my recollection would suggest—and make possible the further financing of the company. It was simply a plan—a part of a plan—to put the company on a secure and adequate financial basis. That is my recollection. It has no significance as a separate company. And the Colorado Supply Co. is simply, as I recall it, one of the smaller of several companies which is owned—the stock is owned—either by the Colorado Fuel Co. or the Colorado Industrial Co., and which I do not recall; but it is not significant. I do not know whether that sufficiently covers your inquiry. I can get more specific information.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I will ask you a question or two and see if we can get it here, and not put you to the trouble, if possible, of getting it out for us. Does the Colorado Industrial Co. perform any other function that that you have mentioned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I couldn't say offhand, but my impression is it does not.

Chairman WALSH. What is the capital stock of the Colorado Industrial Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I couldn't tell you that, sir. You see, even with a list of that size it is impossible for me to keep the figures in mind; and I have to refresh my mind from time to time as these matters come up.

Chairman WALSH. Could you state where the stock of the Colorado Industrial Co. obtained its value?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, if I may ask your indulgence a moment—the question of the different companies and the different bonds pertaining generally to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was a question that came up in my examination before the committee of the House—the committee of Congress of the House—last year, and I think I can give you, in just one word, those facts which are here, if you care to have me, stating what the different bonds are.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if you can give that in a very short space, it will be all right. Otherwise I should like to proceed with the examination.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I can, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. This refers to the different mortgages, some six or more in number, but it does not indicate any relation between the two. It shows the funded debt of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. general 5 per cent bonds, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.'s general mortgage 6 per cent bonds, the Colorado Industrial Co. first mortgage 5 per cent bonds—these are giving the names of the different bonds of the company; the Rocky Mountain Coal & Iron Co. first mortgage 5 per cent bonds; the Grand River Coal & Coke Co. first mortgage 6 per cent bonds; the Pueblo Realty & Trust Co. mortgage 6 per cent bonds. That covers the different mortgages that form a part of the general interest of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. My question was, if you know, where does the stock of the Colorado Industrial Co. obtain its value?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not answer that offhand, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly get that information for the commission?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Gladly.

Chairman WALSH. And at the same time of what does its property consist. What is the business of the Colorado Supply Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, generally I assume to supply or provide the supplies which are necessary in various localities where the mining industry of the company is carried on.

Chairman WALSH. It is the corporation that maintains and operates the supply stores at the various plants of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., is it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is as I understand it, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And do you recall its total capital stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I am sorry I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please explain to the commission as definitely as possible the character of your connection with the corporations in which you are directly interested—excluding the foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean, as director, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir. That is, I take it you have no direct connection except as director. If you are an executive officer or manager in any other corporation, of course, that would be included; but I am assuming those you have mentioned are the ones in which you are directly interested.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The assumption is entirely correct, Mr. Chairman. My duties in connection with the three companies which I have mentioned are simply the duties of any director, and those I undertook to outline in the paper which I have read. I shall be glad to reread that portion.

Chairman WALSH. If you will kindly and briefly restate it—your particular duties in connection with the corporations in which you are directly interested, other than the foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, the duties of a director, as I conceive them, are the same in any corporation in which any man happens to be a director.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly describe those briefly. Do you meet with some other gentlemen and pass upon reports or what do you do? Just generally give a brief description of what you do in connection with these corporations in which you are particularly interested.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What I particularly do?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; what you do personally.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The fire insurance corporation in which I am a director has its monthly meetings. I attend whenever I find it possible. I talk with the president of the company at his convenience or mine, if either cares to advise with reference to matters which would properly be taken up by a director or a stockholder.

In the Manhattan Railway Co.—that company is a leased company—the elevated railway being leased to the Interborough Co., which operates it; and the directors have only to see that the terms of the lease are complied with. Those meetings, I think, are quarterly. I attend those whenever I can.

As regards the other company, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., when we first became interested in that company the directors' meetings were held in New York. The financial condition of the company required careful and prolonged attention. For a number of months we gave almost constant thought—myself and my colleagues, with our counsel—to devising a plan—sound financial plan—which would put the company on a sound financial basis. We had various meetings from time to time of the directors. That was finally accomplished after a number of months of prolonged and careful study. Later the meetings of the directors were discontinued in New York, and since have been held in Denver. According to the by-laws of the company there is an annual directors' meeting which is stated to be held immediately following the annual meeting of stockholders. Monthly directors' meetings are to be held as required. Of course, the eastern directors have not been able to attend those monthly meetings. According to a by-law of the company, when any matters have been passed upon by the western directors without a quorum, or requiring the signature—the ratification of additional directors than those present in the West—by by-law it is made proper for the minute book to be sent to any other directors absent from the meetings, who read the minutes and, if they approve, sign their names thereto. That covers the question.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly refer to the portion of the document furnished—the original document furnished to the publication, the press notice issued December 7, 1914? I believe it is indexed here.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Issued by what, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. I suppose by one—it is the one that announces the appointment of Mr. Ivy L. Lee by Mr. Jerome D. Greene, on page 82.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. In what way, briefly, is its publicity furnished to the press, such matters as this?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. On behalf of the foundation?

Chairman WALSH. Yes—such as this. I am not saying on whose behalf it is, but here is a communication which reads, "26 Broadway, New York, December 7, 1914," and begins, "Mr. Jerome D. Greene." How was that given out?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, that was prepared in our office. Mr. Greene, I think, himself gave it out. Mr. Greene has been, for several years, a member of our personal staff; at the same time he has been filling the position of secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, which position was created as the foundation was created, after he had come with us. The demands of the position have been rapidly increasing, and it was no longer possible for him to fulfill those demands and carry on his work in connection with our other affairs, and it became desirable, therefore, that he should devote himself exclusively to the work of the foundation as its secretary. He therefore resigned from my father's personal staff and took the position, giving his entire time to it—the position of secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation. We then selected Mr. Ivy Lee to become a member of our personal staff, and his appointment dated from the same date as Mr. Greene's resignation.

Chairman WALSH. The question was, Mr. Rockefeller, who wrote the article?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think Mr. Greene wrote it. It was a matter that was discussed in our office by my associates and myself as to how most appropriately to advise the public of this change, in justice to both gentlemen, that their positions might be understood.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I notice the statement is made there that Mr. John D. Rockefeller, having retired from active business 15 years or 20 years ago, his staff, of which Mr. Lee becomes a member, are his immediate advisers in matters both of business and philanthropy, and are his direct representatives in the various corporations in which he is financially interested and on the large philanthropic boards which he has created.

Now, I will ask first, would you mention who are the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, and will you kindly give me the names of the gentlemen who are upon that staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Starr J. Murphy, Mr. Ivy L. Lee, and myself.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Gates upon that staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Gates was for many years. About two years ago he resigned.

Chairman WALSH. What connection has Mr. Gates with the business interests mentioned here at the present time, if any?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean the interests of the foundation?

Chairman WALSH. No, sir; just the purely business interests.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My father's business interests?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Only such relations as because of an association of 20 years he is interested to contribute.

Chairman WALSH. Is he upon a salary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not. We regretted greatly to have him withdraw from the association. He insisted that he required more freedom and leisure, that he would be glad to continue in the philanthropic works which he had helped to develop, but that he positively declined to accept a salary or to be related to the business except as he might care from time to time to cooperate purely in a voluntary way.

Chairman WALSH. Would you kindly name any other gentleman who has been a member of the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, your father, during the year 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Jerome D. Greene.

Chairman WALSH. He was the only other individual who during that year—I believe you have stated Mr. Lee was not upon that staff—he was the only other individual during that year. I believe you have stated Mr. Lee was not upon that staff.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He was not.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Starr J. Murphy a director in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is his place of residence, please?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Montclair, N. J.

Chairman WALSH. And where is his office?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. 26 Broadway.

Chairman WALSH. During 1914 were you a director, Mr. Rockefeller, in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. During the year 1914 was Mr. Jerome D. Greene a director in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes. I may say, if you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, with reference to Mr. Greene, that when he came into the office he went into that position, among others—the Manhattan Railroad is another.

Chairman WALSH. I wish to inquire particularly in regard to this so we can keep the continuity up.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I simply meant to say that he gave his time more to the foundation work than to those others, so that he has not had the personal knowledge or touch with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. as a director that those who have been longer in the directorship have had.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Ivy Lee occupy any position with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. prior to December 7, 1914, when he became a member of the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I correct you there, Mr. Chairman? It was January 1, 1915, that he became a member.

Chairman WALSH. The announcement was December 7.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I stand corrected.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. To take effect January 1. Mr. Lee had no connection with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. other than that he was cooperating with the operators' committee of three operators in Colorado in helping to present the facts which they knew and collated regarding the conditions in Colorado that they might be made public.

Chairman WALSH. Did the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller receive salaries or compensation in any form as such?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Murphy does.

Chairman WALSH. Anyone else?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Lee does.

Chairman WALSH. Anyone else?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The only other member is myself. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. You do not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did Mr. Lee, during the year 19—when did the salary of Mr. Lee commence with that personal staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. January 1, 1915.

Chairman WALSH. 1915. Prior to that time had he received any salary so far as you know from any corporation in which you represented your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is quite a simple matter, Mr. Chairman. We had felt as individuals, or stockholders, as directors in the Colorado, Fuel & Iron Co. last spring, that the public was not getting the facts. For many years large corporations and individuals have been criticized for their taciturn policy. Many times we have been so criticized. We have maintained a policy of—

Chairman WALSH. Will you excuse me, please, until I sign a voucher?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Certainly. I beg your pardon.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you may proceed, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was just saying it had been the policy of most large corporations and individuals to maintain silence with reference to their affairs. I think the public feeling has been growing of late years that that attitude toward the public was unwise, and that the public was entitled to know about large concerns, whether private or public. The importance of that policy has been growing and we have felt for some time that we should adopt the modern policy of greater publicity.

We, therefore, when this situation in Colorado developed last year, finding that there was much said that was not true, and that it was difficult to get the facts before the public, we felt it our duty as individuals and stockholders and directors in the company to do what we could to get the facts before the public, and I personally took pains to inquire as to who could assist in what I believed was an important public work. After careful inquiry I was told of Mr. Lee, whom I saw with my colleagues, and asked him if he could undertake to assist the operators' committee and ourselves in the matter of properly presenting the facts in this situation. Of course, Mr. Lee could only consent with the consent of the president of his company, whom I saw, and he graciously consented. Mr. Lee spent his vacation and extra time in cooperating with us and the fuel company, I think, from early June of last year, in an earnest, straightforward effort to put the facts before the public.

Mr. Lee had nothing to do with assuming responsibility for the facts regarding Colorado. He simply acted in behalf of the operators' committee who were themselves informed of the facts, putting in shape the material they had in hand. He assumed no responsibility for the accuracy of the statements and they went out over their names. Does that cover it, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, Mr. Rockefeller, but did Mr. Ivy Lee receive any compensation or salary from any corporation in which you were interested as a representative of your father during 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Pardon me, I meant to add that. I made the arrangement with Mr. Lee myself, and I advised Mr. Welborn, in whose—in the interest of whom with the other operators I was also working, that we regarded the matter of such importance that while it might be the operators would pay the whole expense, that any part they could not pay we would be glad to pay. That was the arrangement made.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, but did Mr. Ivy Lee receive any salary or compensation from any corporation in which you are a representative of your father, during the year 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not trying to evade, but maybe I am stupid.

Chairman WALSH. Please keep your mind on that question.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The cost of the publications has been paid by the operators. Mr. Lee's personal compensation has been paid by my father. What adjustment the operators may be disposed to make, I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. What compensation was paid to Mr. Lee for the work he did during the year 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My recollection is—Mr. Chairman, if you feel that it is a question I ought to answer in this public way—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. One thousand dollars a month.

Chairman WALSH. One thousand dollars a month?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is my recollection.

Chairman WALSH. Was that money paid by your father, on behalf of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., as a contribution to that company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was paid by my father as a contribution to the general public situation, which he felt it was his duty to make any proper contribution toward.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any charge made against the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. for the money your father paid to Mr. Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was not. My letter to Mr. Welborn stated, frankly and clearly, that I assumed the operators would pay what they could, and whatever they could not pay that we would pay. I have made the payment on my father's behalf to Mr. Lee, and I have not had opportunity yet to see the officers of those several companies to see what portion of the money, if any, they feel they can bear. But the arrangement was satisfactory to us, whichever way it worked out, because we felt that it was an important matter and in the common and public interest.

Chairman WALSH. Have you charged against the Victor-American Fuel Co. or the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co. or the Colorado Iron Co. any money whatever to pay the compensation of Mr. Ivy L. Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir. My letters very clearly stated it would be a matter for those gentlemen to decide entirely as to what they felt they could pay.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand you to say that you have not yet had an opportunity to ascertain whether or not they were going to return any of that money?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; because I have not seen them. If they can contribute, all right; and if they do not feel they can, the account is settled and satisfactory to us.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Lee have any other or further connection with your father or any of the companies in which you represent your father than that you have stated?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir. I never knew Mr. Lee personally, or knew of him, until last June, when I was seeking a man that had experience along those particular lines.

Chairman WALSH. Where was the policy of publicity which was finally entered upon by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co., and the Victor-American Fuel Co. finally determined, in New York or Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That question I could not answer; I was not a party to it.

Chairman WALSH. You were not present when the policy was determined, you have stated, of giving more publicity to the conduct of the corporations and of getting the best man available for that purpose?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir; I was present as a member of my father's staff when the eastern directors and representatives of my father personally discussed the desirability of this matter. But I never have discussed the matter with the gentlemen representing these various companies in Denver. I wrote them, stating our views as a result of the conferences had in our office between my colleagues and myself.

Chairman WALSH. That is, as to the publicity campaign or policy and the method of carrying it out? That was determined by the personal staff of your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; the idea of appropriate publicity originated there; but as to how it should be carried out was a matter which the three operators in Colorado and Mr. Lee worked out among themselves.

Chairman WALSH. I made my question too broad, perhaps. The policy was adopted by the personal staff of your father, and the determination to employ some good person to carry on the work was also thus adopted?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; the general policy of adequate publicity.

Chairman WALSH. But, then, as a member of your father's staff you made the arrangement with the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I merely asked his consent to allow Mr. Lee to render this additional service.

Chairman WALSH. Then who made the agreement with Mr. Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did.

Chairman WALSH. As to the work he was to do and the compensation which he was to receive?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Only generally.

Chairman WALSH. I mean generally, of course; not the details that went into the bulletins.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not only that, but I did not pretend to lay out the program; that was for him to suggest. That is why we employed him, because we believed he could make those suggestions. But the general policy that publicity was desirable—fair, honest, and open publicity—was originated in our office, and the arrangement with Mr. Lee was made by myself, as I have stated.

Chairman WALSH. Following the agreement that you made as to the general policy—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). The general policy, I want to make clear, was that there should be adequate and proper publicity. How that should be accomplished was a matter that Mr. Lee subsequently took up.

Chairman WALSH. Did you give Mr. Lee any instructions, after you employed him, as to where he was to go, for instance, for his information?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. When we employ people we expect them to be competent along the lines as to which we have no knowledge; we look to them for information and suggestion. I was not able to make suggestion to Mr. Lee as to how to effect that publicity. I looked to him for suggestions, and he was free to do what was necessary and proper, and he so acted.

Chairman WALSH. Then you did not give him any instructions, is your answer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not; I was not competent to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Did any of the other officers undertake to give him any directions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Did he go to Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He did.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any understanding, when he was employed, as to the means he was to take to acquire information?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall that. It was left entirely to Mr. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. Was it determined by the personal staff of Mr. John D.

Rockefeller that bulletins should be issued from time to time purporting to give, or endeavoring to give, what might be called the truth as to the Colorado situation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was a suggestion made by Mr. Lee; not by us. We were not familiar with matters of that kind. We felt that he was competent and that it was perfectly safe to leave the matter with him.

Chairman WALSH. Was that suggestion made before or after he was employed—that suggestion of Mr. Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, Mr. Chairman, when we first met Mr. Lee—our first conference with Mr. Lee was for the purpose of getting suggestions from him as to how adequate and proper publicity might be brought about. We did not at that time know that we could avail ourselves of his services. Our thought was more to ask him how such a thing could be done and what he could suggest. As a result of that first conference it developed that it might be possible for Mr. Lee to undertake the work, and we subsequently took the matter up, as I have stated, with the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

Chairman WALSH. Did your father keep a set of books covering the expenditures, such as the payment of a salary to Mr. Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is perhaps in his regular accounts. It was a regular expense, simply an ordinary office expense.

Chairman WALSH. An ordinary office expense of what office?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of his office; because this publicity, we felt, was so important for ourselves, as well as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., that we, as I stated, stood ready to pay the whole cost, or such part of it as the other gentlemen felt they could not pay.

Chairman WALSH. What is the name of the individual that keeps the books?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There are half a dozen gentlemen.

Chairman WALSH. Who is the head of that department that keeps the books in which the charge was made, or the item entered, covering the salary of Mr. Ivy Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Jenkins is the gentleman in charge of the book-keeping.

Chairman WALSH. When you say that it was in Mr. Rockefeller's office, is that the office in which are kept track of and managed his general investments?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My father's personal business. That is all I have anything to do with or his staff—his personal business, his private affairs.

Chairman WALSH. Then, am I to understand that anything Mr. Lee did in Colorado toward publicity, his compensation for that came from your father, and that it was charged in the books of your father's general private business?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, that is accurate, but it is not quite comprehensive.

Chairman WALSH. Any explanation that goes with it, kindly give it now.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think one should bear in mind what was done—what was contained in the letter I wrote to Mr. Welborn, in which I spoke of our feeling that publicity was very desirable for the sake of the Colorado situation and our general interests, and I said "the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the other operators, we expect, want to pay their share of this expense. We assume they may want to pay it all, they will if they can, but we regard the matter as so important and of such public interest that whatever expense they do not feel able to pay—"

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Who do not feel able to pay?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The three operators acting as the operators' committee and representing the operators—"whatever portion of the expense they do not feel able to pay we will pay." It has happened that they have paid the cost of the publications. It has happened since I made the arrangement with Mr. Lee and was responsible to him on behalf of whom it might concern that I have paid him with my father's funds. What portion of that compensation the operators may feel they are able to pay back I do not know. If they pay back nothing then the account will stand as it is. So it appears that we have paid Mr. Lee's salary to date with that understanding—

Chairman WALSH. With the understanding that it was charged to your father's private business?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know just where it was charged, Mr. Chairman. It was charged, I presume, to office expenses. I do not keep track of the books, but it was an ordinary expense that we passed in the ordinary way.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly obtain from Mr. Jenkins, whom I believe you stated was the head of the bookkeeping department—we do not want to call him personally—a statement as to how this charge was made?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I will gladly do so.

Chairman WALSH. That is, as to what account?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. On January 1 what connection was established between Mr. Ivy L. Lee, the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller—any corporations in which Mr. John D. Rockefeller or yourself is interested, including business and philanthropic organizations? Begin with the first, please—the staff.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression is that Mr. Lee was automatically put into such positions on boards as Mr. Greene had resigned from. The only two I recall are the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the Western Maryland Railroad.

Chairman WALSH. How about the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller; did he become part of that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is what the notice states, that he did.

Chairman WALSH. I am asking you to repeat that, if you please.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He became a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, to take the place of Mr. Greene.

Chairman WALSH. And the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; as representing my father, as were my father's other representatives.

Chairman WALSH. He owned no stock in that himself?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; he owned no stock himself.

Chairman WALSH. And he merely has representation, or qualifying stock now?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What connection, if any, did he assume with what is known as the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No connection, no official connection, or connection as a director, but our office staff is a sort of family affair. We talk over all kinds of matters of our common interest. We have not drawn sharp lines between business and philanthropic interests. We have developed both among us as a part of our common daily work, and we discuss in the office any matters of any kind that may seem to be of interest.

Chairman WALSH. So, am I to understand from that, that while Mr. Ivy L. Lee is not a trustee of the Rockefeller Foundation and has no official connection with it and no salaried position with it, yet nevertheless, on account of his being on the staff of your father, you do discuss with him the affairs of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know that I have, but I should not hesitate to discuss with him such matters or the affairs of the Rockefeller Institute or the General Education Board, or any other matters that might come up in the day's business for discussion or action.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall any conversations which you have had in the meetings of the trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation in which Mr. Lee participated?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, I could not; I would not be able to recall that, Mr. Chairman, because we are constantly meeting informally in the office and discussing one matter and then another, but it is hardly possible that we do not discuss various matters in connection with the foundation with Mr. Lee—the various questions I could not specify, but we would feel entirely free to do so. That is what a member of the staff is expected to do, confer on any matters that come up.

Chairman WALSH. So that Mr. Lee would have an influence in shaping the activities of the Rockefeller Foundation, due to the fact that he was a member of your father's staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He would have just as much influence as any competent, intelligent, able-minded man would have whom we might ask to meet and confer with us.

Chairman WALSH. He would not have any more influence on account of being a member of your father's staff than would any other outside man of ability and integrity that you might confer with?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Whose judgment we might seek.

Chairman WALSH. Whose judgment you might seek?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, I think that is a fair statement.

Chairman WALSH. Now, as to the directors of the Rockefeller Foundation; are you one, Mr. Rockefeller? I believe you are.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And your father is a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is a director.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. F. T. Gates is a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you have already stated that Mr. Gates at the present time has no official connection with any of the corporations in which your father is interested?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think I stated that; if I did, I must correct the statement. I said that Mr. Gates was no longer a member of our office staff, as he had been for many years; he is no longer under salary, at his own request. Mr. Gates has continued as a director, in the Western Maryland Railroad, as a representative of my father, where he has been for many years. I think that is the only business directorate which he retained. Several times he has expressed his desire to resign, but we have asked him to continue, and he has been willing to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Outside of his compensation for attending directors' meetings of that one corporation does Mr. Gates receive any salary from your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not since he insisted that his salary should terminate, several years ago. We have urged him to accept a salary, because we have been desirous of continuing to avail ourselves of his services.

Chairman WALSH. Does he receive salary from any corporation in which your father is interested?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. H. P. Judson, I notice, is also a member of that board of directors; what is the business or profession of Mr. Judson?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Judson is president of the Chicago University.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Wickliffe Rose I see mentioned.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Rose is secretary of the International Health Commission. It was he who conducted the work of the eradication of the hookworm disease in the South on behalf of the health commission which was established by my father some years ago.

Chairman WALSH. That Mr. Wickliffe Rose?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is the name of the organization you say he is the head of?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is the executive secretary of the International Health Commission, which is, as described in the answer to these questionnaires, one of the organizations which has been created by the Rockefeller Foundation, directing its attention largely to matters of health and sanitation.

Chairman WALSH. As executive secretary he receives a salary from that activity?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. C. W. Eliot?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Ex-President Eliot, of Harvard University.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. A. B. Hepburn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Chairman of the board of directors of the Chase National Bank of this city.

Chairman WALSH. Is he engaged as a director in any industrial corporations that you know of—any large industrial corporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean that we have an interest in?

Chairman WALSH. No, sir.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. You might answer that part of it, however, and save asking you again.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what large industrial companies is Mr. A. B. Hepburn connected with as a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I understand he is to testify later, Mr. Chairman. I am afraid he will have to speak for himself, because I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Who is S. Flexner—Dr. Flexner?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is the head of the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research—Dr. Simon Flexner.

Chairman WALSH. On a salary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Starr J. Murphy—if you have told us what his business connection was with your company, I have forgotten it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is a member of my father's personal staff.

Chairman WALSH. And he receives a salary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He does.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. C. O. Heydt?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Heydt has been associated with me as private secretary for a number of years.

Chairman WALSH. He is your private secretary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. J. D. Greene, you have mentioned.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Greene is secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. And a salaried man?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As secretary of the foundation he receives a salary.

Chairman WALSH. Did he receive a salary as a member of the personal staff of your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, yes. I am the only one who is not included in the salary roll of the personal staff.

Chairman WALSH. Well, none of these gentlemen, as I understand you have already answered, receives any salary from the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Except Mr. Greene. He is the secretary of the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. None of the others?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. None of the others.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Lee have any connection of any sort with the Rockefeller Foundation during the year 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, he has no connection now, Mr. Chairman, and—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I understood you to testify that he had no connection now, except as you described as you might meet with him as any other outsider whom you might call in who had judgment—I recall. Did he have any connection with the foundation during the year 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He did not.

Chairman WALSH. The three members of your father's general staff that were connected with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and with the foundation during the year 1914, were yourself, Mr. Starr J. Murphy, and Mr. Jerome D. Greene; that was all?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was all, and that was, of course, a natural outgrowth of the fact that we were representing my father in any matters that he was interested in.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, as I understand—is your father a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You represent him on that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. We three represent him.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I don't recall—when did you become interested in the Colorado situation industrially? I mean in the properties out there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In 1902; it has been about 12 years.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you regularly receive regarding the labor conditions in the corporations in which you are interested either directly or as the representative of your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is not customary in any corporations I have ever been connected with as director to receive regular information regarding labor matters.

Chairman WALSH. Do you receive reports from any of the corporations in which you are a director, which gives you direct information in regard to labor conditions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have never known of a director who received such reports; not in my experience; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you make it a practice to visit the plants of the corporations in which you are interested and make personal inquiries and observations regarding conditions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In so far as possible.

Chairman WALSH. Please mention any that you visited during the year 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. None.

Chairman WALSH. Please mention any that you visited during the year 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I state, Mr. Chairman, that of the three corporations I am director of one is an insurance company, so there would not be much to inspect. The other is the Manhattan Railway Co., and, of course, I ride in that system from time to time, it being in New York; and the third is the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. How many mines have the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression is about 24 mines in operation a year or more ago when the times were normal.

Chairman WALSH. Located in what States, during the year 1914, were the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I can not say other than Colorado. I think they are largely concentrated there. I would not be prepared to say there were not some over the border line, but my impression is they are all in Colorado.

Chairman WALSH. Do they not also operate mines in the State of Wyoming?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Coal mines?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, they may, but I don't know, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do they operate iron mines in the State of Wyoming?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think they do.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. As a director of that company have you received—as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., have you received reports from time to time from the executive officials of your company in the State of Wyoming?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression is that the large supply of iron ore which the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. uses in its steel plant comes from its mines in Wyoming, and that those iron mines are under the general care of the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. We have no specific reports with reference to that.

Chairman WALSH. The reports you get upon the financial condition, as well as the activities of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in the State of Wyoming, come to you from, or did come to you for the past five years, did they not, from the following gentlemen: L. M. Bowers, chairman; J. F. Welborn, president; F. T. Gates, vice president; J. A. Writer, auditor; and Joseph Chilberg, sales manager?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Usually, Mr. Chairman, and I think solely, from Mr. Bowers, the former chairman of the board, and Mr. Welborn, the president of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Have you with you, Mr. Rockefeller, or have you been asked to produce, the report made by Mr. L. M. Bowers, as chairman, and also signed by Mr. J. F. Welborn, F. T. Gates, J. A. Writer, and Joseph Chilberg, of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., to its stockholders in the year 1909?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not been asked to produce the report and have not it with me.

Chairman WALSH. Does the company make reports to its stockholders every year?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It makes reports, I presume, at the annual stockholders' meetings, Mr. Chairman. I have never attended but one stockholders' meeting. They occur, as I have stated, in Denver.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe, Mr. Rockefeller, that the stockholders of a corporation, aside from the directors, have any responsibility in regard to labor conditions in the industrial concerns in which they own stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I stated, Mr. Chairman, in my original paper, that while the powers of the stockholders are limited to the electing of directors, a stockholder certainly, if he has any amount of stock, has a moral responsibility and a moral influence over directors and officers, which he needs to use with care and with thought and in justice.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been present at any of the meetings in Colorado at any time since the time your interests acquired the ownership out there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I have been several times to Colorado in the earlier days of our acquiring the interest, and went about quite extensively at that time.

Chairman WALSH. When was the last time that you were personally in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Just about the time of the financial reorganization. I think it was about 10 years ago.

Chairman WALSH. Have you inspected any factory or mine or railroad in any of those industries in which you are a director during the past 10 years, personally?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I have stated, Mr. Chairman, the insurance business does not lend itself to current inspection.

Chairman WALSH. Well, leave out the insurance feature of it and answer the rest, to save time.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You have asked a general question and I want to answer it fully. The Manhattan Railway Co. I ride on from time to time. That is in New York City. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. I have not visited in the last 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. When you ride on the Manhattan Railroad Co., do you make some inquiries into the condition of the labor of the road?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman, because, as I have said, the Manhattan—the elevated railway—is leased to the Interborough; the Interborough operates it. The duties of the directors of the Manhattan Railway are confined to seeing that the terms of their lease are lived up to, so that the question of operating the road is not a question which would come to the directors.

Chairman WALSH. During the past five years, have you, as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., received any specific reports regarding labor conditions in the mines of the company in Colorado or Wyoming?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not been customary, Mr. Chairman, to send specific formal reports. I have received through the several officers of the company, as is shown by our correspondence, information from time to time which they thought it was desirable that we should have, and which we desired to have; but there has never been any specific formal method of currently informing the directors in the East of labor conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Verbally, has any officer of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. made a statement to the eastern directors as to labor conditions, living conditions in the camps of the company in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. When either of the officers that you have mentioned have been in the East we have discussed the general affairs of the company, and such matters have doubtless come up, as they would with other matters of importance in connection with the company.

Chairman WALSH. Were those statements of the executive officers taken down in shorthand?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not been customary to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Then there is no statement in the office in New York—during the past 10 years there has been no statement in the office in New York as to the labor conditions in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There has been the correspondence, Mr. Chairman, which would touch upon that, together with the other divisions and other phases of the companies—we have had constant correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. Has this commission received all of the correspondence with respect to labor conditions in Colorado through the original letters received and copies of letters sent, in its hearing in Colorado, so far as you know?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Through the periods covered, so far as I know.

Chairman WALSH. Does that include all the correspondence that has been had between the New York office and the Colorado office during the past 10 years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman. Of course, there has been constant correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. Including, among other things, a reference to labor conditions.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My recollection as to correspondence running over a period of 10 years would be quite vague; but it has been customary, in correspondence as well as in conference, to touch upon the various matters of interest in connection with the company.

Chairman WALSH. In the year 1914, was there correspondence between the New York office and the Colorado office with reference to labor conditions in the plants of your company in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume that there was, Mr. Chairman. I have not sorted out the correspondence to see the exact dates, but that is the way we have gotten our information currently.

Chairman WALSH. Has the commission called upon you for that correspondence, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly, at your convenience, Mr. Rockefeller, produce all the correspondence between the New York office and your Colorado office in which any reference is made to labor conditions in Colorado or Wyoming during the years 1913-14?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (making note). During 1914?

Chairman WALSH. From the 1st of January, 1913, up to and including the 1st day of January, 1915.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Exclusive, I presume, of such letters as already have been presented to you in Denver?

Chairman WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

(See Rockefeller, Jr., Exhibit No. 2.)

Chairman WALSH. What general principles, other than what you have stated in the document which you read this morning, have controlled in determining labor conditions in corporations in which you are interested?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I undertook to present those principles pretty fully, Mr. Chairman. I do not think I could add to that statement. I would be happy to read it again if you so desire.

Chairman WALSH. Not unless you care to, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Or some member of the commission cares to have it read.

I have noted here one very short statement, very concisely put, by your father in his Random Reminiscences of Men and Events, as follows:

"The best of philanthropy, * * * the investment of effort or time or money, carefully considered with relation to the power of employing people at a remunerative wage, to expand and develop the resources at hand, and to give opportunity for progress and healthful labor where it did not exist before."

What efforts have been made by the directors in New York for applying that principle to the State of Colorado and also to the State of Wyoming?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The effort has been made to the extent, Mr. Chairman, of practically no returns on the investment during the period of 12 years, and to put all the surplus earnings back into the development of the company.

As I pointed out in my statement, during a period of 12 years the company has paid over $92,000,000 to the employees of the company in wages, and my father has received on his interest in the stock of the company $371,000. My only fear as a director has been that the many stockholders in the company might very justly find fault with the trustees of the property for having expended so large an amount of the current surplus earnings in the development of the property, in increasing the wages and in providing, as they could, for the employees, instead of making any return other than the slight return to the stockholders I have mentioned, which is inconsequential. I fear we have been open to criticism very sharply on that ground.

Chairman WALSH. Is there an added value, or has there been during the past 12 years, to your real ownership of wealth growing out of these properties, aside from that represented by dividends upon its capital stock and interest from its bonds?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If anyone can show such added value and would make us an offer of anything approaching what the properties originally cost, we would be only too happy to do business, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I read from the alleged report—first, I will ask you whether or not the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. does not own a very large amount of coal lands that are not being commercially exploited at the present time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is true.

Chairman WALSH. What area does it own in the State of Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Does it also own a large amount of iron land that is not being commercially exploited at the present time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not in mind the extent of the iron holdings.

Chairman WALSH. Does this company own a tinplate plant whose book value is $1,332,000, in the State of Colorado, that is not being operated now?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As to whether it is being operated now or not, I could not tell you. I think that there is, among the various steel industries, a tin plant.

Chairman WALSH. Has it been operated?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say yes. But I would not be accurate on that matter.

Chairman WALSH. Do your companies consider any added value to the property through the subject of the imposition or failure to impose taxes upon the property? For instance, if it owns large areas of property of great potential value when it is worked, do they consider what might be called the added wealth of that property in paying taxes while it is being held for future development?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If in the meantime, Mr. Chairman, the company is driven into bankruptcy, that prospective profit that might be derived for many years to come would not be of any great comfort.

Chairman WALSH. But I asked whether or not that was considered in estimating the value of property?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know, but it would be so slight that it would not be consequential, in my judgment.

Chairman WALSH. When you went into the field in Colorado, or your interest went into the field in Colorado, it was with the intention, of course, of commercializing and exploiting the property and bringing it to its highest reasonable state of development, was it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, our investment there was not entered into from the start of the enterprise—we did not sit down and determine that we would go to Colorado and develop the coal mines and the steel industry in Colorado. But we rather bought a small original stock interest, and when the situation as regards the financial condition of the company was unsatisfactory, it became necessary for us to cooperate with the other stockholders in reorganizing the finances. And in that way our interest was increased. We did not set out to enter that business. We did originally set out in the buying of iron ores in the State of Minnesota to get into that business and to develop it, but that was not our purpose here. It was simply a stock investment, as a result of which we were drawn into a larger relationship and as a result of which there came upon us the necessity for cooperating with the other stockholders in undertaking to build up the business. But in so far as our responsibility is concerned, our desire and purpose has been to do all in our power, as stockholders and directors, in developing the business in the State in the common interest.

Chairman WALSH. Before you went in there, plainly speaking, they owed you money? Before you made that stock investment?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not just catch the bearing of that question.

Chairman WALSH. Did the properties owe you money; did you hold the bonds, interest-bearing bonds, of the company before you made any stock investment in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression is that there was an investment in stock first.

Chairman WALSH. What is the total capital stock of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not tell you that offhand, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I could not. I do not keep those figures in mind.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any change in the amount of stock since the year 1909?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, that I could not tell you, offhand, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you, if I can refresh your memory by calling your attention to what seems to be a report of your officers to the stockholders, in which the capital stock of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is given as follows:

Common stock.....	$34, 235, 500
Preferred stock.....	2, 000, 000
Total.....	36, 235, 500

Do those figures appear familiar to you, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, if they appear in the report signed by those gentlemen whose names you have just read, I should regard them as accurate, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. This report is copied into a State document in Wyoming and is purported to have been——

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). It is easy to get those figures from the annual report, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And it purports to be signed by L. M. Bowers, chairman; J. F. Welborn, president; F. T. Gates, vice president; J. A. Writer, auditor; and Joseph Chilberg, sales manager.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If the original of that document is so signed I should feel perfectly safe in putting confidence in the amount, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Without construing lack of confidence in the report of itself, inasmuch as it does come in a second-hand way, I thought I did ask you to furnish, but will you please furnish us these reports to stockholders from the year 1908 to the year 1914, both inclusive?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I didn't understand that you had made that request.

Chairman WALSH. I thought I had.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think not, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I intended to do so.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What reports do you refer to?

Chairman WALSH. Reports made by the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to the stockholders for the years 1908 to 1914, both inclusive.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean annual reports, I suppose, or any other reports?

Chairman WALSH. Annual reports?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume we have them on file.

Chairman WALSH. I intended to ask for them, and thought I had.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I think you did not, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Has the 1915 report been issued yet, the report for 1915?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The report is issued after the annual stockholders' meeting, which occurs in, I think, October.

Chairman WALSH. I do not want any confusion by my naming reports for 1914 or 1915. If the report for 1914 comes in in 1915, I would like to have that if it is ready?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; you want the latest report?

Chairman WALSH. The latest report.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I understand.

(Ten Annual Reports of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. for the fiscal years ended June 30, 1905, to June 30, 1914, inclusive, published at Denver, Colo., were subsequently submitted in printed form.)

Chairman WALSH. What is the total bond issue of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I would be glad to get for you from the reports. I do not bear it in mind, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. You could not recall it at the present time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I could not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you observe that in the report for 1909 that the capital was given, as I have stated, in round figures, thirty-six million and a quarter, and in that report this statement was also made:

"Net appreciation from 1880 to 1909, on iron ore, coal properties, developed and undeveloped, equipment at mines, steel and other plants, railroads, rolling stock, etc., $19,308,327.40."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I probably observed it when I looked over the annual report. I do not bear it in mind now, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. When you stated that the total return upon the investment of the group of which you have spoken was $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent on the stock and bonds, you did not take into consideration that appreciation in the value of the property which, if your report is correct, amounted to \$19,308,000 and odd?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, a business man does not usually count his profits until he has them in hand. And those are profits which may or may not be realized. It would depend upon whether or not there proved to be coal in those mines, perhaps, as to whether they were worth anything. We hope they are and we believe they are.

Chairman WALSH. Do not your executive officers have a method for appraising real estate like they have for appraising equipment at the mines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume they do.

Chairman WALSH. Steel stock on hand, rolling stock, and other matters.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER. I presume that that is the method which has been employed there.

Chairman WALSH. And you pass upon those and accept those as a verity?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You are asking about the return on our investment, Mr. Chairman. I think my statement is still entirely accurate, that the return which we have received has been less than 3½ per cent of the entire investment. I was not including—it would not occur to me to include returns which might some day come in. In the meantime we might have discontinued our interest in the company so that the return would not accrue to us.

Chairman WALSH. In giving the value of the property, however, Mr. Bowers includes that, does he not, in his annual report for 1909, the appreciation in its real value during those years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not get, Mr. Chairman, the bearing of that statement, which I do not doubt is true, if it is in that report.

Chairman WALSH. It may not have any bearing. I am simply asking you for the fact.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If it appears in that statement, then he so includes it, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. What is your information—has that property increased in value during those years approximately $20,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume, Mr. Chairman, that any natural resources which are being drawn upon in constantly increasing quantity would increase in value. Other than that I can not say definitely about the amount of increase or the appropriateness of that estimate. But I assume if it is made—if those men made it, it is according to the best of their judgment accurate.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you have stated that a business man would not take such increase in value into consideration, if I understood you, for the reason that before the increase was realized he might be out of the corporation, he might dispose of his holdings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I did not quite state that, Mr. Chairman. I stated he did not count the profits except as they came into his hands, that is, prospective profits which the business man hopes exist. I was speaking of the profits that could be counted, that had been realized, not of the prospective profits. I think you will agree that there are two quite different matters.

Chairman WALSH. I do.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Certainly a business man takes into consideration, as the holder of real estate does, as the holder of any business does, appreciation in the valuation of the property which he may be related to, because of the increase of the demand for the commodity and because, as with real estate, of the development of the community in connection with that real estate, and so on.

Chairman WALSH. Have any portion of the earnings been put back into the property during the 12 years that you have had investments there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. All of the surplus earnings, such as there have been, which have not been paid in dividends, have been so put back, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, that adds to the value of the property.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, yes; but, Mr. Chairman, in so far as those surplus earnings have gone into increased wages and into improved living conditions and things of that sort, of course, while they add to the property they do not add to its monetary value.

Chairman WALSH. Does a business man who controls a company or who owns a large amount of stock in a company, whether he directs it or controls it or not, take into consideration the statements of the executive managers of the business of his company in disposing or not disposing of his stock and securities, the alleged fact that the property within a certain number of years has increased twenty millions of dollars in value?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think he would take into consideration, in contemplating his continuance in the property, or the sale of his interest, what he thought the prospects were of his realizing on his investment. And while, of course, such a statement as you have read shows an increase in the value, it may be fifty or a hundred years before those coal properties will require to be developed in order to supply the demands of that locality, in which event the return to the stockholders of to-day would be indefinitely postponed.

Chairman WALSH. Then, as I take it, this statement contained in this report, if it is so contained, that the net appreciation from 1880 to 1909 on iron ore and coal properties, developed and undeveloped, equipment at mines, steel and other plants, railroads, rolling stock, etc., $19,308,000 you hold merely in the nature of an estimate of value that the property may have at some later period, as suggested by you, perhaps 50 or 100 years hence.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As value which exists, but which can not be realized on until the property is developed. That is the sort of information which is appropriate and accurate in valuing the property. But I do not believe that the stock market, those who buy and sell stock, would pay very much attention to such data in connection with the value to-day of that stock.

Chairman WALSH. The sum approximately of $19,308,000 added to the book value of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in or about the year 1909.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If the statement so indicates it was, Mr. Chairman. But I have no personal recollection of the date, but I assume that the valuation was entirely correct and conservative, if made by those gentlemen.

Chairman WALSH. That is that amount of real wealth added when a sale takes place?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. A sale of what—the stock?

Chairman WALSH. A sale of the stock or of the properties.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If the sale of the properties were effected, that would enter in.

Chairman WALSH. I will let it stand at that, Mr. Rockefeller, for the present. If a sale of the properties took place, what would be told the buyer was the value of the stock, I mean was the value of the property of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The value of the property, the book value of the property, but the buyer would be very careful, if he was simply buying a stock interest, to consider what the stock value was, which is an entirely separate thing from, and, as you know, has no immediate relation to the intrinsic value of the property.

Chairman WALSH. It can be controlled by many other artificial matters other than the real value of the property and its intelligent and honest operation.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think those who know more than I do about buying and selling stocks would tell you that the intrinsic value of a property has not any close relation to its present market value.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask you this one question at this point which was handed to me by another commissioner. Does the valuation of $36,000,000 include the appreciation of $19,000,000, and was the 3½ per cent figured on this appreciated value?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, the 3½ per cent was the actual money which was returned to my father in dividends on the stock and in interest on the bonds which he held. It has no relation whatever to the value, the intrinsic value, the potential value, the book value of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Does that answer your question, Mr. Weinstock? If not, you may interpolate a question. I thought that answered the question fully.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; that is not quite clear in my mind. The point, Mr. Rockefeller, is whether this 3½ per cent paid out, practically paid to capital, was figured on the original investment, or was figured on the present appreciated value of the mines.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Weinstock, the 3½ per cent is the actual cash that has been paid in to my father as an owner of certain stocks of the company in the one dividend which was paid during the 12 years, and as an owner of certain bonds of the company representing the current annual interest of those bonds simply as an investor. If you buy bonds in a company, you get currently the interest, and if you buy stocks you are fortunate if you get currently the dividends. We were not so fortunate as to get them currently here. But my statement refers to the actual cash, either in interest on bonds or in the single dividend on the stock, which was paid to my father on account of his holdings, his personal holdings of stocks and bonds in that company.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, you got 3½ per cent on the actual money put into the enterprise, regardless of its present valuation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Actual money which he has put into the corporation. That is exactly it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So it had no relation to any appreciated value?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has no relation, the returns of the stocks and bonds would not have any relation, would it, to the—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (interrupting). If the property has appreciated, say, $19,000,000, and there have been no dividends declared on that $19,000,000—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). There have been no dividends declared at all except that one small dividend on the preferred stock. As I said in my statement, the surplus earnings which resulted from each year's operations have been put back into the property, either in the development of the property or in the increase of wages; as you will recall, two years ago there were two increases in wages amounting to a total of $550,000 a year. That is a current fixed charge. The stockholders have had to be put off so far as their return on the property is concerned that the employees might currently have that additional $550,000 in wages.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. This point, then, is not clear, Mr. Rockefeller: Assuming, in order to illustrate the point, that the mine earned $100,000 during the year, and assuming that $50,000 of that is paid out to either bondholders or stockholders, and the other $50,000 is used in the way of betterment, in improvements in the mine. How would that $50,000 be treated on the books of the corporation? Would it be treated purely as an expense item, or would a stock dividend be declared to cover it, or would it be treated as a surplus fund, resources and surplus?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. When you refer to the $100,000, I assume you mean net profit after operating expenses, net surplus after operating expenses?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The $50,000 which you speak of would go back into the property—if it went into the building of a new steel plant, or the development of a coal property, matters of that kind would properly be charged as this $19,000,000 was charged—to capital—increase in capital value.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Surplus?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, that it would be transferred from surplus to capital. Surplus—the surplus earned in cash is either distributed in dividends or held as working capital, or put back into the development of the property, in which latter instance, if it is used in permanent development of the industry or in the erecting of a plant and not in the payment of wages, then it would be properly charged to capital.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, I am afraid I have not got this quite. Let me try and illustrate in a very simple way. You have a thousand dollars' worth of assets that represent the investment, and that thousand dollars earns, say, $500 the following year; $250 of that $500 is paid out in interest on bonds or dividends to stockholders. There is a balance of $250 that is used for improvement. The thousand dollars of assets, then, are worth $1,250 in place of that $1,000. That is clear?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If it is put into permanent improvement.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, what is paid out? What is there to offset that added investment to balance the account? Is $250 of additional stock dividend issued for that $250 put into the reserve fund? How do you balance the account; how do you deal with it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, it goes to increase the capital value. Stock might be issued against it, but it would not ordinarily be done unless there was some necessity for issuing additional stock.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Otherwise you see your balance sheet would read: Paid-up capital, $1,000; assets, $1,250; surplus, $250.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a matter of bookkeeping that I am rather stupid about, Mr. Weinstock; I don't know that I can explain it to you.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Ordinarily that would be charged either to surplus account, or there would be treasury stock issued in the nature of a stock dividend to offset it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I am sure we have not had the latter. I am desirous of making it perfectly clear, but it is a matter that I do not understand myself about the bookkeeping there.

Chairman WALSH. The dividend that was collected by your father, that was spoken of, was not $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent, of course, of the value of the property, but $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent of the par value of the shares or of the security?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You see, Mr. Chairman, in order not to cause misapprehension I have made two statements there with reference to the return from the investment. The first was that on the stocks which he held, common and preferred, he received during the period of 12 years when $92,000,000 was paid in wages, my father received in a single dividend on that stock $371,000 as representing the return to him on the stock which he held.

Chairman WALSH. Whatever the percentage was, however, he received it on the par value. It was based upon the par value of the stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That would figure a return on the money, $6,000,000, which he invested in the stock, of two-thirds of 1 per cent. That is the return he got on the stock.

Chairman WALSH. On the par value of the stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; on the money he paid for the stock, \$6,000,000, as stated. That was the return he got on his money. You take your money to the savings bank and you get $3\frac{1}{2}$ or 4 per cent on your money. My father put into the stock of this company certain moneys amounting to \$6,000,000, and he got out two-thirds of 1 per cent on that money. Now, then, that is his return on his stock investment. Then he had a bond investment. He loaned money to the company by taking bonds, as any bondholder does. He received interest on those bonds. After having stated that his return on the stock was two-thirds of 1 per cent per annum, I put the stocks and the bond investment together and said, assuming that he may have invested in the property \$10,000,000 or \$15,000,000 in the stocks and bonds, the entire return on the actual cash he had put into the property has represented $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum. That is the return he has gotten on the money—the actual cash which he has invested in the company—in its stocks and bonds. Do I make that clear, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. You make it very clear to me and straighten out a little error I was falling into.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If I may be permitted I wish to make just one point clearer.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, this $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent has been paid on the money actually loaned and the original investment in the stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It has not been paid on any watered stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No. My father put into the property certain cash, a certain amount of money, and he has gotten out in the 12 years an average return on the cash of $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent per annum, quite irrespective of par or of the value of the property or anything. In other words, he has gotten a little less than he would if he had put that same amount in a savings bank.

Chairman WALSH. We will proceed now.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Just picking up one proposition for the moment; you say there have been increases in wages twice within a given length of time in those industries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes. I did not mean to cover the whole situation, because I do not recall that; but I did have in mind that, I think it was in 1913, there was an increase in wages made to the coal miners of $350,000, and to the steel operatives of $200,000, making a total increase in that year of $550,000, a total permanent increase. Now, I may have those two figures reversed as to their application—

Chairman WALSH. Well, that does not affect the general question I was going to ask you. Was there also an increase during the same time in the prices of coal and steel or of both to the consumer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, that I do not recall, Mr. Chairman; but if there was, may I add that it was not sufficient to make any earnings on the property.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I will ask you if you recall the following statements made in the report of 1909 by Mr. Bowers, your chairman, and the other gentleman that I have mentioned, to the stockholders. Now, that we have left the question, I believe, clearly stated, clearly cut as to the valuation of stocks and the valuation of bonds—

“Since the entries made on the books during the past 25 years the iron industry has developed to enormous proportions, and iron ore properties are considered among the most valuable minerals in the United States. The development of your coal and coke properties during the same period of years shows a large increase in tonnage over former estimates. The large acreage of undeveloped coal lands warrants their being appraised at many millions more than the old book valuations. They are valuable assets for the coal operations alone, and a very important one in connection with the iron industry. We have for reasons above stated, proceeded to have valuations made without reference to the almost worthless entries made on the books so many years ago and under conditions that have entirely changed between 1880 and 1909. While the old valuations have been in most instances increased we have cut down and wiped out for depreciation and for poor, abandoned coal mines a very large amount; the estimated value of these properties by experts is more than that now placed upon them, and is submitted herewith. We present this new appraisalment of the properties you own based upon what your executive officers believe to be a conservative and proper valuation in 1909.”

Do you recall this report being made and signed by L. M. Bowers, chairman; J. F. Welborn, president; F. T. Gates, vice president; J. A. Writer, auditor; and Joseph Chilberg, sales manager?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I recall the general appraisal of the properties, which was only correct in accordance with good business usage.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any appraisal of the property since 1909?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't recall; there may have been.

Chairman WALSH. Have or have not those properties appreciated in value according to the estimates made by your own experts, since 1909, in the sum of $3,500,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know whether they have or not, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall that in the statement submitted to the congressional committee that inquired into the Colorado situation that the total liabilities of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was given as $80,383,000, and that the excess of assets over liabilities of that company given at that time was $22,827,645?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall that.

Chairman WALSH. You do not recall?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Did you in person furnish those figures or supervise them or check them up before they were sent in to the congressional committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Do you refer to testimony that was taken by the congressional committee in Denver?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; in Denver.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Why, I would not have anything to do with that.

Chairman WALSH. Did you submit certain reports to the congressional committee at Washington during the time of the hearings there on the Colorado situation, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Did I personally submit reports?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had with me a report of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the last annual report, to facilitate my answering any questions that might be raised. Whether I left the copy with the commission or not I do not recall. Very possibly I did.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Manly calls my attention to the statement in the congressional report that the annual report of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., submitted by Mr. Rockefeller, was as follows—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Of course, if you did that, you secured that at the offices of the company at the hands of those who had charge of those things, and submitted it as the report of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was one of the reports we have in our office as submitted from year to year, and so I took it down with me, as I stated.

Chairman WALSH. Did you furnish any other reports to the congressional committee, as you recall, at that time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't recollect that any others were asked for.

Chairman WALSH. Where an investment is made in securities, either for the personal account of Mr. Rockefeller or in his benefactions, is any inquiry made to determine whether or not the conditions in such corporations are those which would measure up to the standards which Mr. Rockefeller has set out, and which I read to you, if you recall, from his Random Reminiscences?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, in the current investment, Mr. Chairman, of a sum of money here and a sum of money there, which may be made to-day, and a year hence, when conditions differ, may be parted with, where the investment is small in proportion to the total capital of the company, it would hardly be possible for my father or his representatives to go into the details of the management. Wherever my father's interest is large enough—is conspicuously large—is materially large—such questions would come up.

Chairman WALSH. At this point, Mr. Rockefeller, we will adjourn until 2 o'clock. Kindly resume the stand at 2 o'clock.

(Thereupon, at 12.30 o'clock of this Monday, January 25, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. Will the house please be in as perfect order as possible? You may resume the stand, Mr. Rockefeller.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask a little more specifically about the investment of your father in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. What was the total amount which he invested in stocks and bonds of that company in money?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I find, Mr. Chairman, that the total investment, the actual cash that he had put into the stocks and bonds up to date amount to $24,109,818, and that investment at the present market prices is now worth $19,200,189. In other words, my father would have been $4,909,629 better off if he had locked his money up in a savings bank so far as the present value of those securities is concerned, as related to the money originally put in.

Chairman WALSH. How much of the $24,000,000 was represented by stocks and how much by bonds.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not that on this statement; but the statement which I made this morning indicated that six millions was the amount in stock, and I presume the balance is made up in the bonds.

Chairman WALSH. And what interest do the bonds bear?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think 5 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. Does he own any bonds in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. that bear 6 per cent?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no list of them—except those bonds I read this morning from this testimony in Washington, which shows the different mortgages. There are several I see here that pay 6 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. How much in amount, please?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not believe I can—yes; I think I have that here. General mortgage 5 per cent bonds, $376,000, par value [reading from a printed copy of his testimony before subcommittee of the Committee on Mines and Mining of House of Representatives, taken in Washington, April 6, 1914]. Colorado industrial 5 per cent bonds, $14,550,000 par value.

Chairman WALSH. Has the company, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., ever defaulted in payment of interest upon its bonds?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I recall, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I will get back to the questions that we were on before luncheon. I believe your answer was that where investments were made in securities, in comparatively small amounts, there was no inquiry made to determine labor conditions in the inquiry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Investments which were made to-day and next year might be parted with.

Chairman WALSH. When an investment has been made by your group in securities to the extent—I will ask you first, what is the extent of your holdings in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? What per cent does it bear to the whole?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Forty per cent, I think, in stocks and bonds.

Chairman WALSH. Does that give you the control of the corporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, it does not give stock control, but, of course, as I stated this morning, any large stockholder has an important influence. Stock control would be 51 per cent, I presume.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; does the 40 per cent give you absolute control over the affairs of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I do not mean absolute legal control; but does it, as an absolute fact, give you absolute control, your 40 per cent, in the selection of the executive officers, and a potential power to dictate its policies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What the potential power is you can judge as well as I. We have never attempted to dictate the policy, or put any particular policy through.

Chairman WALSH. What is your idea of that—could you, if you desired, do that with 40 per cent of the stock?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume if the stockholders and directors were convinced of the wisdom of any policy suggested by the officers, the fact that we favored it would not make it more difficult to get it through, or to gain their consent.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the relative percentage, as to the total percentage, of the holdings of all of the coal industry in the State of Colorado, held by the three companies—the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the Victor-American, and the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I do not know the relative percentage.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed the statements made by the officers of those companies, that those three companies owned sixty-six and some fraction of per cent of all of the coal properties in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If I have seen it, it has not remained in my mind, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. When an investment is made by you in securities which give you potential control—power to control an industry, either for the personal account of Mr. Rockefeller or any of his benefactions, is any inquiry made to determine whether or not the conditions in such corporations are those which measure up to the standard Mr. Rockefeller has set?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, that question of potential control is a very nebulous one. I presume in some corporations if we had five shares it might be that the other stockholders would say, "Here are people that have had business experience and seem successful." They might say they would follow our judgment. In other companies it might be quite the opposite, and I do not feel that I could make any definite statement. I think you can see how difficult it would be to make any definite statement in answer to that question.

Chairman WALSH. Please indicate any industry in which an investment has been made in securities, either for the personal account of Mr. Rockefeller or any of his benefactions, in which inquiry was made to determine whether or not the conditions in such corporations are those which measure up to the standard which Mr. Rockefeller set.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If I may speak first with reference to these several foundations, most of the present investments held by those foundations remain in the same form in which they were received. There have come due certain securities—certain securities have been sold and reinvestment of such sums has been made; income also has been invested. The investments have been made in blocks of from $100,000 to $500,000—too small an interest to justify the holders of the securities in undertaking to go into the details of the management of the companies. In such instances where my father's interest has been such as to justify, in his mind, his having a personal representative as a director, those are the instances in which the questions of conditions would be more likely to arise.

Chairman WALSH. Please name those companies, then.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The only company outside the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. which I can at the moment think of in which my father has a substantial interest is the Western Maryland Railroad, and he has had two representatives on that board who have considered, in their current executive committee meetings with the officers, the different questions coming up requiring attention. I am not a member of that board or executive committee and I could not say definitely what steps have been taken to inquire into the various conditions of that company.

Chairman WALSH. Does that answer apply likewise to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; because I have been a director there, and with my associates we have taken such steps as were thought necessary to keep us informed. We have made suggestions as seemed to us appropriate and in the discharge of our proper duty and responsibility as directors. And the correspondence, Mr. Chairman, which was brought out in Colorado by this commission, had between the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and my father's representatives, as referred to before in my statement this morning, would indicate quite fully the personal interest which we had taken—the inquiries we had made and the suggestions we have made.

Chairman WALSH. Do the gentlemen to whom you have referred—the gentlemen you have named as members of your father's business staff—have a vote in the determination of business policies and of the conduct of your father's business, or are they merely acting in an advisory capacity?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, in our office family we do not arrive at conclusions by vote. We discuss matters and come to an agreement; no votes are taken or recorded. It is as if my father and his several sons, or close associates, were discussing interests which they are all associated together in caring for. There has been no formal action taken there.

Chairman WALSH. Who of those four gentlemen you have named finally pass on a business question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Quite usually we all may pass on it. Quite often one of my father's representatives devotes more time to a certain line of investment, and another to another. We are apt to divide up in that way in some part, but we are all subject to call for conference at the request of anyone on any subject which each may have specially in charge.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall any disagreement between the four as to any large investment in property, for instance?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, the gentlemen whom I have mentioned do not necessarily act in concert in regard to investments for my father. They simply pass on such investments as any one of us may bring up, or answer such questions as my father may ask in his desire to get information.

Chairman WALSH. Does or does not your father finally have the exercising—the final disposition of all matters that come before you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a pretty general term, Mr. Chairman, and I could not say yes or no to that. In matters of investment my father usually—as to whether to buy these bonds or those bonds he expects some of us in the office, his representatives, to make a study of the merits of the investment and make some recommendation. He is quite apt to act on the recommendation, but he knows what funds he may wish to invest at the time—as we may not know—and he simply seeks our suggestions and acts on them, so far as the making of specific investments is concerned, when other conditions may make it seem wise to him to so act.

Chairman WALSH. As to the question whether or not funds will be paid out, in the matter of finally deciding to make the investment the word is uttered that pays out the funds by your father—he controls that? Is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He directs the making of his own investments, availing of any advice he may get from any source from which he may desire to seek it. When you say "control" it should not be understood as meaning managerial control, because my father for many years has not been in active business, not desiring to be tied down by any such matters, and having long since left those matters to those whom he may appoint to represent him. He takes no responsibility whatever along managerial lines.

Chairman WALSH. There is no vote taken, I believe you said, by those advisers; there is no requirement for agreement between your father and his advisers with reference to the investment of his own money? Is that the idea?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is correct, when it comes to the final investment.

Chairman WALSH. After the information is received and advice taken, of course your father separates himself from his own funds in that way?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not quite get the bearing of that expression, "separates himself from his own funds."

Chairman WALSH. He finally orders the money taken and invested in the security?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He says to whatever clerk or representative may be the one, "Buy 100,000 of those bonds."

Chairman WALSH. In which of the corporations in which you are interested, either directly or as a representative, have there been strikes or other symptoms of industrial unrest during the past five years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall any at the moment except the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any in any of these other concerns you have mentioned, that you can recall, in the last five years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I am now related to?

Chairman WALSH. That you have been related to in the past five years, the American Linseed Co., or any of the railroad companies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall any strikes in the Linseed Co. There was, I think, a strike in which the employees of the Delaware, Lackawanna & Western, with other railroads, were involved a few years ago—I think so.

Chairman WALSH. What action, if any, was taken by you in regard to the strike on the Delaware & Lackawanna road?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that the board, in line with the generally accepted policy, which I have outlined at some length, never was called upon to pass upon the questions of the strike. The board or boards of the corporations with which I have been connected have felt that those were matters, as I have stated, which the executive officers familiar with all of the details of the business on the spot were better fitted to deal with, and they have dealt with them so far as my experience has gone.

Chairman WALSH. In the corporations in which you are interested—I will limit it to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in this question—in the case of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., what person or persons are held primarily responsible for the labor conditions which exist in that corporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The various executive committee officers.

Chairman WALSH. Please name those whom you say are primarily responsible in your organization, in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is not "our" organization. It is an organization which we found. The president and chairman of the board are of course the two leading executive officers. What authority they may delegate in such matters to those who cooperate with them I am unable to state, but our knowledge of the situation and our information has come from one of those two officers.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. L. M. Bowers and Mr. J. F. Welborn are the names of those two officers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any knowledge yourself of any other executive official who is responsible for labor conditions in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not know, Mr. Chairman, what other official.

Chairman WALSH. You have no knowledge other than of those two?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not be in a way to know.

Chairman WALSH. What scope of authority is given to Mr. Welborn and to Mr. Bowers to establish and maintain proper labor conditions in the industry in Colorado and Wyoming?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Just such scope as is customarily given to all executive officers in so far as I know, under, always, the board of directors who, as I have stated, assume the responsibility for the management of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Do you give them specific instructions with regard to the conditions that they should maintain, so far as their employees are concerned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Those gentlemen were selected, Mr. Chairman, and I fancy other men filling as important positions, because they have expert knowledge and familiarity with just such matters. Specific instructions are not given, nor would the board expect to undertake to dictate to the officers whom it selects with care, whom it trusts, how they should handle such a problem, or any other of the administrative problems which develop in the conduct of the business.

Chairman WALSH. Do you give such officials equal scope without a specific recommendation and accounting in financial matters?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As pointed out in my statement this morning, Mr. Chairman, the financial policies are more usually dealt with by the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. I am asking you in the specific case, Mr. Rockefeller, of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., if the executive officials are given equal scope without specific instructions or accounting in financial matters as to that which they are given in the matter of the welfare of their employees and the labor conditions in the industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The question of financing the company is one which would come before the board of directors. But after the financial policy has been established by the board the officers have full scope in conducting the business along the lines of those financial policies. If there is a question of a large additional expenditure, that properly would be brought, as is customary, to a board of directors for consideration.

Chairman WALSH. Is that true also with reference to labor conditions in the company—that you lay out a general plan and that the local executives are supposed to adhere to that plan?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is not true, Mr. Chairman, because the directors of a company are usually men who are more familiar with financial policies than with the practical questions of the administration of the business, and of necessity they select as the executive officers of the company men who are competent to deal with the latter questions.

Chairman WALSH. If executive officials are found to maintain or operate under improper financial conditions, what action would be taken?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If executive officials are found, in the judgment of the board, not to be properly fulfilling the trust which has been imposed in them along whatever lines, it would be the duty of the board to take the matter up with the executive officials. If the situation could not be remedied, to replace them; but so long as the board has reason to trust the integrity and the ability of the executive officers which it has selected it is customary and appropriate, it seems to me, that they should be given that authority which is necessary if they are going to be given the responsibility.

Chairman WALSH. If the executive officials should be found to maintain improper labor conditions, what actions would be taken?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I have covered that, Mr. Chairman, by saying that wherever executives are found to be doing what in the judgment of the directors was not best the directors would find it their duty to take such questions up and remedy them or change the officials.

Chairman WALSH. So that the responsibility finally, you think, should be the same in the operations of the executive officials whether it refers to finance or maintaining proper conditions for the workers in the industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the responsibility of the directors covers all of the things which the executive officers do, and they must take the final responsibility. But, as I have pointed out, in the organization of large business there must be a subdivision of the various large questions that come up, and it is customary for the executive officers to have charge of the administrative questions of the business, including the questions of labor.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of fact, in the actual operation of these corporations are not labor conditions the only matters under the control of the executive officials which are not subject to a close audit and check of some kind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. So far as I know, Mr. Chairman, the general financial policies are the only ones which come under the close supervision of a board of directors—quite the contrary from your suggestion.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I was not endeavoring to make a suggestion; I was endeavoring to ask a question—if it is not a fact that labor conditions are the only matters under the control of executive officials which are not subject to an audit or check of some kind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My answer would be, I think there are very many such conditions; practically all, excepting the larger financial policies.

Chairman WALSH. In which of the corporations in which you are interested either directly or as representative are the employees organized?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I suppose that the employees of the Manhattan Railroad Co. are organized, but I am not sure about that, because, as I have stated, the Manhattan Railroad is operated by the Interborough. The directors of the Manhattan Railroad are charged only with the duty of seeing that the terms of the lease are lived up to. They have nothing to do with the operation of the company. Therefore I should not be able to state that. In the insurance company with which I am related I suppose the questions of labor organizations or the lack of affiliation with them would not arise. In the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. the situation is, as I am told, that the large majority of the men who have worked there are nonunion men, although union men also work there, as they see fit.

Chairman WALSH. Did you, after the declaration of the strike in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., take up with Mr. Welborn and Mr. Bowers the alleged causes for the strike and the details of the controversy?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As stated in my statement this morning, Mr. Chairman, the executive officers, in line with the responsibility imposed upon them, had decided the question of recognition or nonrecognition of the union without conference and without our knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Was it afterwards submitted to you by those officers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was simply stated to us as a matter of information in connection with the current information regarding the conditions of the business that came to us from time to time.

Chairman WALSH. It seems that the strike was called, if I remember correctly, on September 23, 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. About that time.

Chairman WALSH. About that time; and when, with reference to that time, did Mr. Bowers or Mr. Welborn, or both, report to you or to the other directors in connection with you, that the fight was over the recognition of the union and the other details of complaint?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The correspondence which you asked for this morning, and which I have not been able yet to secure, will show that. My memory would not enable me to name the dates.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate how shortly it was after the strike was called?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say it was within a few days, or a couple of weeks, surely.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think, Mr. Rockefeller, aside from the legal power that is given by the ownership of stocks and bonds or your representation upon the directory, that your group in New York does have a great influence upon the local executives in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That would be rather a difficult question to answer, Mr. Chairman. With reference to this particular matter, as I have stated, the officers had determined what their attitude would be with reference to this matter of the strike before we were even advised of it. They announced to us their decision.

Chairman WALSH. There were certain occurrences that were called to your attention in Colorado of a disturbing character, violence on both sides, was there not, after the strike was instituted September 23, and through that fall and winter and into the next summer, the summer of 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Most regrettable occurrences were taking place.

Chairman WALSH. And you were kept advised from time to time as to what took place?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall receiving a letter from Mr. Welborn dated July 27, 1914, a copy of which has been submitted at Denver, which contains these words:

"My health has never been better than during the past year, and I am hardly conscious of any strain. The knowledge that we have your confidence and support makes everything else easy."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I didn't get your answer.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You asked if I recalled receiving such a letter from Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; from Mr. Welborn.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you stated in general terms in answer to the question submitted to you, your personal attitude toward the organization of employees for their protection and the advancement of their interest. I do not wish to quote you. I would like you to briefly state what your personal position is.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I read that portion of my written statement? I made it just as brief and inclusive as possible.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. With reference to my attitude toward labor unions—I think that is the passage.

Chairman WALSH. That is it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (reading):

"I believe it to be just as proper and advantageous for labor to associate itself into organized groups for the advancement of its legitimate interests as for capital to combine for the same object. Such associations of labor manifest themselves in promoting collective bargaining, in an effort to secure better working and living conditions, in providing machinery whereby grievances may be easily and without prejudice to the individual be taken up with the management. Sometimes they provide benefit features, sometimes they seek to increase wages; but whatever their specific purpose, so long as it is to promote the well-being of the employees, having always due regard for the just interests of the employer and the public, leaving every worker free to associate himself with such groups or to work independently, as he may choose—I favor them most heartily."

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that such organizations should be created and maintained democratically; that is, that the men should have a right to get up the organizations themselves without any influence upon the part of the employer, and conduct them as they see fit, of course, within the limits of the laws of the land?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I believe fully in the principle of democracy and of freedom, Mr. Walsh, in every relation in life where it does not infringe on the rights, as I have stated, of others who are interested.

Chairman WALSH. Then your answer to my question would be yes. I am trying to be as specific as possible.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir; but it is rather difficult for me to be specific in that, because so much depends upon specific instances, Mr. Chairman; but generally, I should say, of course, that labor should be free to take such steps in its own interests as are compatible with the interests of the public and of capital.

Chairman WALSH. From your experience in industry and from your duties as a citizen and a philanthropist, do you believe that men ought to organize into labor organizations and that it is necessary for them to do so to protect themselves?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My experience, Mr. Chairman, in that respect, has been very limited. I have never had the personal handling of labor questions. My study has not been as deep as that of many. I have had such matters before me, but beyond making what I have tried to have a very complete statement of my position I do not feel sufficiently qualified to discuss intelligently and usefully the details relating to the matter.

Chairman WALSH. I was not asking you for a detail, or else I did not make myself clear. I was asking you, from your experience in industry and your studies, do you believe that workingmen ought to organize into unions for the purpose of protecting themselves?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. But you say, from my experience, and I have had no experience.

Chairman WALSH. From your studies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. And my studies have been so limited as not to enable me to speak with authority; but I should say, generally, that if workingmen find their interests are best served by organization, they certainly should organize just as much as capital. At the same time, as I pointed out here, they should be equally free to organize or not to organize, as they see fit.

Chairman WALSH. Well, after the workingmen in an industry have organized a union of reasonably large proportions as relate to the whole number engaged in the industry, and if a situation should arise like this—I had better specify it—Mr. Berwind has testified here that in his coal operations he does not deal with any union, but that nevertheless the price per ton for coal mined is that price which is fixed from time to time by the unions in those industries which are organized. If that is true, have you observed sufficiently the operations of unions in industry to say, as a matter of equity, whether or not a person—an individual—should have the benefit of such economic conditions without bearing his share of the expense?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I have desired, as I am sure you have seen, to answer your questions as directly and as much to the point as possible; but my lack of experience in these matters as contrasted with that of Mr. Berwind any many others of the gentlemen who have testified here make it impossible for me to express an opinion that would be of any value.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe it would be a useful and proper study for directors in large corporations that have influence in very great basic industries to make a study of what might be called the underlying philosophy of trade-unionism and organizations of workmen and the like?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be a very profitable study for any man interested in his fellow men to make, so far as he can.

Chairman WALSH. How would that apply, then, to the question I asked you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, it would apply in so far as one was able and could, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that a director in a company operating in a great basic industry, employing many thousands of men, should make no deeper study into the underlying philosophy of organization—trade-union organization—than any other patriotic citizen studying out what might be for the welfare of mankind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If, as I assume, Mr. Chairman, your question has relation to my connection with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.—and that is the only industry in which I have had any opportunity for touch with those questions—

Chairman WALSH. Well, do you not think you ought to study it, then?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was about to say that because I felt it was so grave and important a matter it was for that very reason that I urged upon my colleagues in the Rockefeller Foundation to undertake just such a study, because I felt my own lack of knowledge on the subject and because I felt there was much that could be gathered by a careful, thorough study.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what about a study by yourself into the underlying philosophy of trade organizations and their benefit or lack of benefit to the workers growing out of the vote that you had as a director in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There are many studies of economic and social questions, Mr. Chairman, which I should be very glad, if I had the opportunity and ability, to make. I have not the opportunity and I have not the ability to study into questions that men who are more particularly trained in those lines of work have; and the layman finds himself usually under the necessity of turning to those whom he regards as most competent to make such studies. I have hoped that through the foundation, coming in touch with Mr. Mackenzie King, as you know, it might be possible to get just such light as you are referring to, for I see the great necessity for it and feel my own ignorance in regard to it.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude toward permitting union organizers who are not employed by your corporation to address employees and otherwise carry on their work without interference?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have never had occasion to take any attitude on that subject, because, as I have pointed out, it is a matter which has been left with the executive officers.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that union organizers ought to be allowed to address your employees and otherwise carry on their work without interference?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There, again, Mr. Chairman, you are inquiring in a field in which I regret to say I have no opinion of any value. I have not been able to study the question.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it is to the benefit of mankind for workmen to be organized, as you say it is for men to band themselves together in corporations? Is the question of education along those lines not a very important one?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. To whom, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. The education of those men on both sides as to the desirability or undesirability of belonging to such organizations as those of which you seem to give approval in your testimony.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not pretend to decide, Mr. Chairman, for other men, as to whether it was wise or unwise for them to associate themselves. My feeling is that the same freedom should be allowed to the workingmen which is allowed to the capitalist to decide whether or not he wishes to be associated in his work with others or whether he wishes to work by himself.

Chairman WALSH. And in an orderly way you would acknowledge the right of any person claiming to have information upon the subject or views upon the subject to publicly give his views and to address them publicly to any person that might care to hear?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a question that has not come up in my experience, and I would not have a view on it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe in free speech?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Will you explain to this commission as definitely as possible the principle of delegated authority under which you outlined in your testimony before the congressional committee, as follows:

"In these days, where interests are so diversified and numerous, of course, it would be impossible for any man to be personally responsible for all the management of the various concerns in which he might be a larger or smaller stockholders. It would be simply impossible to do that, and all that any man can do is to find the ablest men that he can find and put the responsibility squarely on that."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know how to make that statement any clearer, Mr. Chairman. If you will ask me any specific question I shall be glad to answer it.

Mr. WALSH. I will proceed, and maybe it will illumine itself a little. Is it not a fact that Mr. John D. Rockefeller, sr., as owner of various properties, delegates his authority to the members of his personal staff, which in turn, are delegated to executive officials?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know of any properties that my father is the owner of. He has interests in a number of properties. In so far as he has an interest which he thinks sufficient to justify his being represented on the board of directors he so delegates any authority, any power, which would come to him as stockholder in the selection of directors.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see any analogy between this condition in industry and absolutism in political government?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not say that I do, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Is not this situation likely to develop the same abuses which history has shown to be the inevitable consequences of absolutism in political government?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is an abstract question which I would not venture an opinion on, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that the workers are justified in seeking to have a voice in determining the conditions under which they are employed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have stated I entirely believe that they are entitled to a voice.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that the workers are justified in seeking to secure an effective means of protest against such abuses as may arise?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think they should have every means of access to the officers of the company, with reference to any matters of common interest which they may wish to take up.

Chairman WALSH. Collectively or individually?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As may seem best.

Chairman WALSH. As it may seem best to them?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. To them.

Chairman WALSH. Are not abuses inevitable wherever unrestricted power exists?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think, so long as we are all human beings, Mr. Chairman, there are bound to be abuses wherever we are associated.

Chairman WALSH. No person can be intrusted with arbitrary power; that is the experience of mankind, is it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I would not venture an opinion; I would not venture to generalize on that. I think that power is something which needs to be used and assumed with great, great care, and with a great sense of personal responsibility. I believe that the people are the ones who should generally and always have the first power.

Chairman WALSH. And in industrial life the people would include every human being engaged in it, from the owner of the property to the humblest employee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that the owner of any property would be properly expected to turn over the management of his property to others, although he might feel agreeable to so intrusting it, if that is the point you have in mind. I do not think you, if you had an interest, would want to have some one else—anyone whom I might appoint—care for your interest. You would feel that you had some responsibility as well as right to yourself select those who should have charge of your interest.

Chairman WALSH. Would you say that the man had a voice in the making of his own conditions in your industry unless there was some means of carrying it out, unless it was a compelling voice, either by agreement on the part of himself and the owners or by the weight of his own influence collectively with many others?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that every laboring man is entitled properly to such a voice. Just how it might be most in his interest in this case or in that to make his voice heard is a matter which I am not sufficiently familiar with to venture to suggest. But I have stated clearly that I think he has—believe he has such a right.

Chairman WALSH. If it is true that abuses appear inevitable wherever unrestricted power exists, how can the workingman be protected if the proposition is laid down and adhered to strictly that the owner of the industry can not be interfered with in the carrying on of his own business?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not, Mr. Chairman, feel myself competent to adequately deal with this subject. I have frankly admitted my lack of familiarity with it. And I have indicated that, believing it to be so very important, I have taken what steps I could to get further information. I should be glad to answer these questions more specifically, but, frankly, I do not feel competent to do so.

Chairman WALSH. Well, is there any person upon your board of directors who has made a special study of this subject, to whom you could refer this commission as a person who might be competent to answer that question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The one whom we have selected in the foundation, Mr. Chairman, to answer such questions, to give such information as is possible, is Mr. Mackenzie King.

Chairman WALSH. Is he a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not.

Chairman WALSH. I understand—just going to the foundation for a moment—that the study that Mr. Mackenzie King is making may take very many years to conclude?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be highly probable that, in dealing with any problem so vast and so important as that one, one could only hope to make progress very slowly, and that it would take many years. I do not suppose coming generations will solve the problem which the past generations have not succeeded in solving.

Chairman WALSH. Well, under the existing conditions in Colorado and Wyoming, do you not think it might be well, aside from the general study that may run through the generations, for some director or directors to study the underlying principles or philosophies in trade-unionism or the extension of the power to employees to have a compelling voice in the conditions of their own labor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think, as I have stated, that it would be a desirable thing for any director in any company, where men are employed, to make such studies. It does not often happen that the directors or the executive officers can take the time to go into the deep philosophical questions, Mr. Chairman. That it is desirable for any man to make such studies is readily agreed.

Chairman WALSH. Are you only a director in three industrial companies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am a director in only the three companies that I have mentioned; one is a railroad company and one is an insurance company and the other is an industrial company.

Chairman WALSH. In the selection of executive officials to whom power is delegated have not mistakes been made, in your experience, and has not confidence at times been misplaced?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Far be it from me, Mr. Chairman, to claim infallibility. I make mistakes quite as frequently, and often much more frequently, than the other man. I recognize it frankly.

Chairman WALSH. Should the workers be subjected to suffering from the effects of misplaced confidence without having any effective means of protest to a higher official in the industry than these executive officials that you have just mentioned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not see how it is possible for us to get perfect executives so long as there are not perfect human beings, Mr. Chairman. We have to get the best that we can find. We have to use as directors ourselves simply the best that we can find, and the same is true of the administrative officers.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Langdon, will you please read that answer and see if it answers the question? If it does, I do not want to ask it again.

(Last preceding question read.)

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I wish no one need be subject to mistakes because of misplaced confidence. But unfortunately the way we are constructed that is constantly happening, Mr. Chairman. I see no way of avoiding it other than to select the best material that can be gotten.

Chairman WALSH. Have you heard directly, and at first hand from any workers in the industry in Colorado, as to what they claim conditions should be in that industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not think that it would be a wise thing to hear at first hand directly from the workers in the industry about claims as to any abuses which may have existed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have been hoping for some time, Mr. Chairman, that it might be possible for me to go to Colorado myself and come in closer touch with the employees and the managers of the company. I might, perhaps, have been there now if it had not been for this hearing. I am still hoping within the year to so make my plans that that will be possible.

Chairman WALSH. Had you expected to go to Colorado, Mr. Rockefeller, prior to the calling of this hearing?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have been wanting to go to Colorado for a number of months, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Well, this hearing was first called, I believe, for the 19th of October, this general hearing?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. At which you were to be a witness. Did that stop your going to Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It did not seem to me that any good purpose could be served, Mr. Chairman, by my going to Colorado while the strike was on. I think you will agree to that. The strike was called off on December 10, and since about the middle of October, as you will recall, I have held myself at the disposition of the Industrial Relations Committee, to appear before it at its pleasure, and whenever I can arrange during the balance of the year to make such a trip that is my purpose.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do I understand that had you not been holding yourself subject to the call of this commission that you would have gone to Colorado after the strike was declared off and before the present day?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My purpose was to go as soon as I found that I could conveniently after the strike was called off. I had never set a date, but I had hoped to go at an early date. Other engagements, of course, would have to be considered.

Chairman WALSH. Can you conceive of effective protest against abuses in a large industry where it is without organization on the part of the employees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There, again, Mr. Chairman, that is a practical question to which my lack of practical experience makes it impossible for me to reply.

Chairman WALSH. What had Mr. L. M. Bowers been before he became chairman of the board in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Bowers had been for some years in charge of a fleet of ore-carrying steamers on Lake Erie. He was the executive head of that company.

Chairman WALSH. Did he deal with labor organizations in that company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I can not say, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. What qualifications did Mr. Bowers have as an expert in handling labor problems?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He had handled labor in that relationship and in other private businesses of his own off and on all his life.

Chairman WALSH. Is there effective organization among working people without provision for financial support for the activities of the organization?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That question is a technical question which I am sorry to say I can not furnish a satisfactory reply to.

Chairman WALSH. Can a local organization in other lines of business be effective particularly where conditions in one location are dependent upon the activities of similar organizations in other localities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is simply a question, Mr. Chairman, that I am sorry not to be able to reply to.

Chairman WALSH. Can local organizations in any line of business be effective, particularly where conditions in one locality are dependent upon the activities of similar organizations in other localities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should call that a similar question, Mr. Chairman, that I am sorry not to be able to reply to.

Chairman WALSH. It is suggested by Mr. Manly and it appeals to me that that might be called a business proposition.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I have stated, Mr. Chairman, my experience has not been in direct personal contact with labor questions, so that I have no first-hand experience or knowledge of those questions.

Chairman WALSH. But any business; is it not necessary for correlation and organization with other companies in order to get the best financial results and the best results for the business sought to be obtained by the corporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Is not what necessary?

Chairman WALSH. Organization.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have stated—

Chairman WALSH. To companies and individuals.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have stated, it seems to me, that the principle of organization for labor is entirely as applicable and appropriate as it is for capital; equally so.

Chairman WALSH. Do not business organizations regularly form associations for dealing with conditions which are common to all?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know to what you refer, Mr. Chairman; I can not think of any.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I will repeat this: Did not the coal operators' association in Colorado include practically all of the operators in the State?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That it included a large per cent of the coal output of the State I presume is true; that it included practically all of the coal operators, company by company, I should say was probably not true. But I have not exact information.

Chairman WALSH. Could the oil business have been developed by small local corporations having no means of relation and communication with other companies? Was it not in itself a process of organization, development, and organization?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the principle of organization is one which the people in this country and the world are increasingly favoring and finding to be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. And that on a large or national basis in the big basic industries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the prosperity of this country is being best conserved by large combinations in industries.

Chairman WALSH. Would or would not national organizations of employees be necessary both from a logical and practical standpoint?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There you are again getting into a technical question that I am sorry I have not the information with which to answer, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in principle, could you not say, Mr. Rockefeller, that the national organization of employees was as necessary from the standpoint of logic as the national organization in any industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I know of no national organization of capital, Mr. Chairman, which would be an analogy.

Chairman WALSH. Not a complete analogy, perhaps, but take the oil companies, would you say that they had assumed national proportion? The steel company, would that not be one?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, it is true there are a number of steel industries related together in the larger steel companies to-day; that they are national in proportions I think would hardly be true.

Chairman WALSH. Should not the representatives of such organizations of employees be permitted to exercise their functions without interference or restriction so long as they use lawful means?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not able to deal with that question, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Specifically, should not organizers be permitted to visit employees, to hold public meetings, to distribute literature, and to collect views in such manner as the employees themselves may elect?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a question that I think would have to be answered by those who are familiar with the problems of employment. I could not answer it.

Chairman WALSH. Do the investments you have mentioned include all securities held by your father, yourself, Starr J. Murphy, and Mr. Jerome D. Greene, or yourself and those other joint holders of securities outside the amount you say is held by your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Investment in what particular company, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that my father and myself are the only ones who have an investment in the fuel company, unless in some of the bonds—yes; some of the bonds were given by my father, I see here, to the General Educational Board, and some to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. They were originally my father's holdings. When he made his several gifts to those various foundations they were usually made in securities, and the bonds of this company were given to these two boards, a block of them.

Chairman WALSH. For fear I have not made this perfectly plain to you, I am not going to ask your opinion, as a business man or as an expert upon industrial subjects or as one who has made a special study, but simply as a citizen: "Are not national organizations of employees necessary, both from a logical and practical standpoint?"

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel like trying to take a position on any so important a matter without having knowledge which would be adequate to back up such a position. Frankly, without any desire to avoid the question, I have not the knowledge, practical or theoretical, which would enable me to form an opinion on that matter.

Chairman WALSH. As a citizen, I ask you, should not the representatives of such organizations of employees be permitted to exercise their functions without interference or restriction so long as they use lawful means?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As a citizen it is a question with which I have never had experience, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Again asking you as a citizen specifically, should not organizers be permitted to visit employees, to hold public meetings, to distribute literature, and to collect dues in such manner as the employees themselves may elect, acting always strictly within the law?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As a citizen, again I must say I am unable to express an opinion on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any information with regard to the number of employees in the iron and steel work which possibly work 12 hours a day?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not 50 per cent of such employees work 12 hours a day?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider that 12 hours work in steel works in the rolling mills is a hardship to employees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not familiar enough with the work to know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not any efforts have been made by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to reduce the number of employees which work 12 hours per day?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I know generally that their effort is to do everything that they can in the interest of the employees. More specifically I can not say.

Chairman WALSH. You could not describe any efforts that have been made by that company to reduce the number of employees who work 12 hours per day other than the statement you have just made?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not be in a position to have such specific knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not employees in the blast furnaces and a large proportion in the open-hearth department are employed seven days per week?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Would you consider that a hardship if such was the case?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that any man who works seven days a week the year around would regard it as pretty hard work.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion would you divide that up in, anyway? Could a man work seven hours a day, in your opinion, for any portion of a year?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Seven hours a day?

Chairman WALSH. I mean seven days a week. You said if he did it all the year you would consider it a hardship. What portion of the year would you regard it a hardship to work seven days a week?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I regret to say that I often work seven days a week myself for considerable periods.

Chairman WALSH. I will change the question, then. What proportion of a year would you still say it was a hardship for a man, if he was required to work seven days a week in a blast furnace or open hearth?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not being familiar with the character of the work, I would not be able to approximate an opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Did you see the blast furnace when you were out there in 1912?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was not out there in 1912.

Chairman WALSH. Well, about 10 years ago?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume I must have seen them at work there.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall whether or not you did see them at work at it or not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the nature and character of the work that men do in blast furnaces?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I do not, except very generally.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know its effect upon a man so far as bodily fatigue is concerned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Have you given consideration to the number of hours per day a man can work at laborious employment and maintain physical efficiency?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made a study of the cost of living? What a living wage ought to be in the various States of the Union where you have large industrial holdings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not, Mr. Chairman; I should think that would be a very interesting study, but I fancy that would be even a longer study than the effort to solve the industrial problems, but I have not had the opportunity nor have I the experience to fit me to undertake such a study.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any personal correspondence with Mr. Bowers, with reference to the strike in Colorado, prior to September 23, 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Our office, Mr. Chairman—the several of us there—have been in correspondence with the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. always, and matters have currently been spoken of in the correspondence. I do not recall just what matters, or when.

Chairman WALSH. I will direct my question now, Mr. Rockefeller, to communications between yourself personally and Mr. Bowers personally.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Regarding the strike?

Chairman WALSH. Regarding the strike.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Previous to the calling of the strike?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think none.

Chairman WALSH. Or regarding labor conditions previous to the calling of the strike?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Simply as any letters, during the year, from Mr. Bowers or Mr. Welborn might mention labor questions, as well as any other questions relating to the company.

Chairman WALSH. Who is Mr. J. H. McClement?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. One of the directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Is he a large holder of stock in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., to your knowledge, or have you any knowledge on the subject?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no knowledge, but I presume he is not a large stockholder.

Chairman WALSH. Did you follow closely the bulletins issued by Mr. Ivy L. Lee with reference to the situation existing there in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They were sent to me, as well as to many other people.

Chairman WALSH. Did you not see them until they were sent out to the public generally?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I think in no instance.

Chairman WALSH. Where were they actually prepared?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I could not tell. After I had made the arrangements with Mr. Lee, which I fully outlined this morning, the matter was left with the operators' committee in Denver and with Mr. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. What percentage of the men in the employ of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. went on a strike on September 23, 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I do not remember how many went out on that day. I have not kept track of the numbers, and it has been often difficult to tell.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. McClement a representative of your family, or of your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. McClement a representative of your father and those upon the board of directors?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you, just to make the matter clear, what you meant by this language used before the congressional committee? I will have to go back a little, I am afraid:

"I can only speak"—

Speaking on a subject I do not think is material; that is yourself speaking, Mr. Rockefeller—

"I can only speak for the directors which represent my father's interest."

"The CHAIRMAN How many are there of those?"

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There are three. Shall I speak of that?"

"The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir.

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There are three immediate representatives of his, of which I am one; from the staff of his personal office there are two others.

"The CHAIRMAN. Who are they? Would you mind giving their names?"

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I will give them, certainly. Mr. Starr J. Murphy, J. D. Greene, and myself are the three personal representatives of my father.

"Mr. BYRNES. Is Mr. Bowers a director?"

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was just coming to him in connection with the other two, who might be said to indirectly represent my father's interest. The first is J. H. McClement, an independent business man in New York, who has been on the board for some years, and I am not sure whether his appointment was originally suggested by some of the other large stockholders or by ourselves. He has been for a long time on the board. He represents the other stockholders quite as much as he does ourselves."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is entirely true.

Chairman WALSH. Does he represent you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. McClement, I think, has been on that board since we first took an interest, and whether he went on as representing us I frankly can not recall. He is a man whose judgment we have a high regard for, and he is a man who has made some studies of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.'s properties, and we have availed ourselves of those studies made largely in earlier years. Whether, when he first went on at the time those studies were made, it was partly at our suggestion I can not recall, but as it lies in my mind it was that he did not represent us. We would be very glad to have him represent us. We think him a very capable man, and so far as my point is concerned it would be immaterial, and I should be glad to include him as a representative, if that is a fact, but I don't recall it; it occurred a great many years ago.

Chairman WALSH. You do not recall then that he in any way did, to any extent, represent yourself upon that board?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I said, I do not recall how his appointment came about, except that the various stockholders thought that he was a man who would be valuable to have related to the company as a director, and we agreed with that view.

Chairman WALSH. Did you observe the bulletin issued by Mr.—written by Mr. Ivy L. Lee, which stated that there were comparatively few employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. that were dissatisfied with conditions, on the 23d of September, 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall whether I have that in mind in connection with those bulletins, or whether that information I had received direct from the officers of the company, but that is an impression which was distinctly in my mind.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. McClement show you a letter which he received from Mr. Welborn, dated September 6, 1913, something over more than two weeks before the strike was called, and before the miners' convention, at which the strike was voted, written to Mr. McClement, informing him that a strike was to be called, and that he predicted that most of the men would respond to the call and go on the strike?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall that letter, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have any such information on the 23d day of September, 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That the majority of the men would go on the strike?

Chairman WALSH. That most of the men would go on the strike."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The impression I had, from the correspondence that had passed between Denver and our office, was quite to the contrary, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. So that if Mr. Welborn had information on the 6th day of September, 1913, that the condition of unrest was such among the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. that most of them would go on a strike, if called, that was not imparted to you by Mr. Welborn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall any such letter from Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. If that information was in the hands of the executive officers and was imparted to one of the directors, was there any machine in your organization by which that condition of affairs could be indicated to the rest of the directors?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If it came to any of the directors in our immediate office the letter would in all probability have been passed to the other directors, as is customary in the office there.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that was such information as should have been given to the directors, as a whole, by the executive officers of your organization, if it existed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am surprised at the information, because the information which has come to me has always been quite to the contrary.

Chairman WALSH. Have you read the transcript of the testimony taken by the subcommittee of the Committee on Mines and Mining of the House of Representatives, in its investigation of the Colorado strike?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Only part of it.

Chairman WALSH. Have you read the transcript of the testimony taken by this commission in its investigation of the Colorado strike?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have read the testimony of only two or three of the witnesses. I did not suppose the testimony generally was available as yet. Mr. Chairman, may I make one remark about a matter we have discussed?

Chairman WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. With reference to the seven day a week work, my answer indicated that I had no definite knowledge of those conditions, but I do not want to leave the impression that I favor for myself or other men seven days of work a week year in and year out. I should think for any man that was unwise and not in the interest of his best development, and I should, for myself and where I could use my influence, hope to do what I could to prevent—to constantly minimize that sort of thing, and to help see to it that every man should have one day in the week for rest, and to constantly look toward a proper day of rest. I want to make that clear as my personal idea, and do not want to be understood as believing that any man, whatever the character of his work might be, even if he could stand it physically, ought to work seven days a week year in and year out.

Chairman WALSH. Was any machinery provided in the plants of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in Colorado and Wyoming for adjusting grievances on the part of the workmen?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There is such machinery now.

Chairman WALSH. Was there prior to the strike?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was always, as I understand, possible for any man to come to the officers of the company, with any matter which he might care to take up.

Chairman WALSH. Who was the chief officer of the company; would you say, Mr. Bowers or Mr. Welborn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume that the chairman of the board is always the ranking officer in any corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to September 23, 1913, to whom were the grievances of the men taken, Mr. Bowers or Mr. Welborn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I could not say definitely, but I assume that seldom, if ever, would grievances need to come as far as those officers. They would come naturally to the local superintendent or mine superintendent.

Chairman WALSH. Where was the local superintendent in the southern coal field of Colorado located?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I could not say.

Chairman WALSH. What was his name?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Weitzel was superintendent of the coal department of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Before or since the strike have you learned where his office was?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is not a matter that I have inquired about?

Chairman WALSH. Didn't you know that the office of the general manager of the company was in Trinidad?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean the general manager of the coal company?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had that impression, but it was not sufficiently clear in my mind to lead me to make the statement.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever hear of any grievance on the part of the men engaged in the mines being presented to Mr. Weitzel?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not be in a position to hear.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know they had grievances prior to September 23, 1913?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I suppose that we all have grievances, and they are human and I suppose they must have had grievances.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any particular grievances the men had in regard to working hours which they objected to, or conditions in the mines, so far as safety was concerned that they objected to?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I knew that every effort that could be made was being made by the officers of the company to reduce to the minimum the possibility of danger and the possibility of grievances. Beyond that as to the details I was not in a position to know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe with complete lack of any machinery for adjusting grievances of such a character, that justice for the workmen would depend upon the mere benevolence of the company's agent, who would be sure to naturally cause unrest?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think I quite get that question.

Chairman WALSH. In other words, unless there is this machinery by which the grievances of the employees could be adjusted, aside from mere benevolence on the part of your agents, would that not be a cause for industrial unrest?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It seems to me that the question of the men having an opportunity to present grievances is perfectly legitimate and proper, and the fact that I took steps myself nearly a year ago to inquire as to methods, as to the formation of such machinery, and made suggestions along this line to the officers of the company, which I found were being turned over in their own minds, and which I have stated this morning were subsequently formulated into the definite plans which I have stated have since been put into effect, would indicate my belief in the desirability of having some such machinery, that there might be free communication between the men and the officers in regard to matters of any character which the men might wish to take up.

Chairman WALSH. Then, if that machinery were lacking, it would be a cause of protest and unrest on the part of the men working in the industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not quite answer that in that way, but I should say that where the machinery was at hand there would be less possibility of lack of unrest or of disquiet.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know that prior to the calling of the strike that officers and organizers of the United Mine Workers of America were in Colorado attempting to induce the men in your industry to join the union?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I knew in a general way that the men in the northern part of Colorado had, some five years ago, I think, been unionized, and that there was a tendency—a disposition—to attempt unionizing the entire district.

Chairman WALSH. From whence did you get that information?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I get all my information—through the officers of the company, either in conference or in correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any system in effect in Colorado by which men injured by accident, or the families of men killed in accident, would be compensated according to the extent of the loss inflicted?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was a system by which men and their families were compensated. What the system was I do not know in detail.

Chairman WALSH. Did that system depend entirely upon the benevolence of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not sufficiently familiar with it, Mr. Chairman, to answer that question.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that the average amount paid for the death of the heads of a family in the industry in Colorado for several years prior to September 23, 1913, was $700?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Were the men engaged in the mining industry in Colorado permitted to own their own homes?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. So far as I know they would have been entirely welcome to own their own homes if they had desired to buy real estate in isolated parts of the mountain fastnesses where these mines were generally located.

Chairman WALSH. Could they own them in your closed camps?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not definite knowledge, but I assume that anyone who wanted to risk his money buying property in a mining camp that at any time might be exhausted—the mine might be exhausted or abandoned—I presume he would be at liberty to do so, and I see no reason why he should not be.

Chairman WALSH. Did the companies generally in Colorado own the canyons surrounding their camps or property?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no information as to how extensively their ownership might have been, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Was it the policy of your company, expressed through your officers, not to permit men to own their own homes, even though they desired to take all these difficulties that you have mentioned, and all of the risks you have mentioned, to have a home of their own?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know what the policy may have been.

Chairman WALSH. When the mines were exhausted by you, of course you would have to dispose of your real estate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. But the difference would be, Mr. Chairman, that it would be hoped that the original cost put into the purchase of the real estate, including the coal, would have been taken out in producing the coal, if the industry had been successful in that particular mine. That is, the company would have gotten its money back, if the venture had been successful, the same would not be true of the employee.

Chairman WALSH. Did you charge so much a room for the houses that were given to these employees to live in, do you know?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I never had anything to do with that; our interest was only a minority interest. It was not our company. The officers were responsible for dealing with those matters, and how they have handled them I am not able to say.

Chairman WALSH. Did your board of directors ever take up the question as to the amount of moneys that was paid to injured persons and the survivors of the victims of fatal accidents in the mines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, with no desire to criticize, but simply for accuracy's sake, may I point out that it could hardly be called "our board." We had a 40 per cent interest in the Colorado Coal & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I refer at this time really to the board of directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., when I said your board.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I just wanted to be clear on that point. I think such matters have never come before the board, nor would they.

Chairman WALSH. Well, these facts were developed at our hearing: Mr. Welborn furnished us a list of the last 25 settlements that had been made in cases of persons that had been injured and killed in the mines prior to November 25, 1914, and it runs as follows. In these cases the company claimed no liability in many of them and partial liability in others of them, or disputed liability, but the last 25 seem to have been Giovanni Gambasin, fatal injury, paid $300; Charles Paolazzi, loss of leg—artificial leg furnished, $100; amount of payment $700—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). These are matters that the board of directors would not pass on, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it would be wise for the board of directors to make ascertainment of such questions as this?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It might be desirable, but quite difficult, Mr. Chairman. That is one of the regrettable questions which come up in connection with the management of any large industry, as is customary, that and similar matters of operation are handled by the administrative officers.

Chairman WALSH. As a citizen, do you not think that the directors of a corporation should be compelled by law, if necessary, to advise themselves of matters of this kind; that is, the number of lives that were lost or persons who were crippled and the amount of compensation that was paid therefor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I strongly believe in the workmen's compensation act, Mr. Chairman, and understand that the present governor of Colorado proposes to present such legislation to the legislature of Colorado this year. I should strongly favor it.

Chairman WALSH. Well, when I was interrupted—Henry Lott, left foot injured, $100; Frank Zwerdowski, fatal, represented by attorney, payment, $700; Charles H. Werden, fatal, amount $700; Frank Krashitz, fatal, $300; Mark Tezak, right cornea perforated, $1,000, represented by attorney for Austrian consul; Theodore Pappas, fracture left leg, $500; Abel Silva, fatal, $500, represented by attorney; John De Monti, $500, settled with Italian consul; John Sebben, fatal, $700; William Demsted, amputation of two fingers of left hand, $115; Jose Lerma, spinal cord injured, $700; C. Romero, fracture of left femur, $500; James R. Davis, fracture of right tibia and tibula, $275, represented by attorney; Patrick McGovern, right shoulder bruised, $400; John Brice, fracture of right femur, tibia, and tibula, $200; I. V. Burt, loss of right leg above knee, artificial leg furnished, $100, payment $400; Juan Mora, fractured left femur, payment $100; Antonio Pedroza, fractured third dorsal vertebræ, payment $225; Donato Di Cicco, fracture left tibia, $400; Bazzoni Bartolomeo, fractured left femur, artificial leg furnished, $100, payment $600; P. L. Woody, loss of left hand, $500; Henry Miller, dislocation of right hip, $700; Diego Godines, fatal, payment $250.

Now, assuming that those are the last 25 accidents in the industry, going back from November 25, 1914, what would you say, if anything, as to the necessity of the directors of a corporation having full knowledge at all times through regular reports of the fatalities and injuries in the industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No one could regret more, Mr. Chairman, than the directors of a corporation that injury or loss of life should ever result from the prosecution of a business. At the same time the directors have it surely as their responsibility, to be exercised through their carefully appointed officials, to see that every precaution is taken to reduce to a minimum the accidents which may arise in the industry. The directors in these industries who are unfamiliar with mining, with coal mining or with the production of steel, you can see yourself would be less competent to deal with such questions and to suggest ways of preventing such accidents than the officers whose business it is to consider carefully such matter in connection with other of their managerial work. Therefore it seems to me the directors are doing the thing which, according to their judgment, is most in the interest of the employees, in delegating the careful attention to all such matters to men who, by experience and close contact with the affairs, are best qualified to prevent accidents and to deal sympathetically with those who unfortunately are injured.

Chairman WALSH. Was your attention ever called to the alleged fact that the managing officers did not deal sympathetically with those persons who were injured or with the survivors of those persons who lost their lives in the industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It certainly was not, and if it had been I certainly should have made inquiry. And I can not conceive that the officers could have dealt any other way. Their representatives may have, but certainly that would be very reprehensible, and no one could regret it more than I.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that proper conditions exist, whether it comes from the inside of the industry or whether it comes from the weakness of the law as executed by the civil or criminal authorities, where in an industry 25 men are killed or injured, and the compensation paid is such as I have read to you from that list?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be difficult for anyone to form any judgment on such a matter without knowing more about the facts, Mr. Chairman, than I do.

Chairman WALSH. What is the proportion of industrial accidents during the past five years in Colorado as compared with other States in the country?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know. I would not have those figures.

Chairman WALSH. As compared with other States in which large operations are carried on in the coal fields?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know; I simply know that the officials of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. have been diligent in their efforts to reduce to the minimum the possibility of accidents.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever heard that there was political corruption in Colorado, and that the money to corrupt the electorate came from the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Such charges I have heard with reference to every State in the Union and every company that I have happened to know about, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Well, then, does that include the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? Did you hear it about that—that is, the charge; I am not saying whether it is correct or not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have heard such rumors.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that it is the duty of a director of a company to investigate such questions as that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had no reason to believe that they were well founded, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. If it should appear from testimony given under such conditions and from such persons as to carry verity with it that such had occurred, as a director would you be in favor of discharging the executive officer who was responsible for the payment of moneys for such purpose?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I certainly would be strongly opposed to any officer dealing in that way.

Chairman WALSH. My question was would you vote to discharge him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would want to know the conditions, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. If you were satisfied, then, that an official of the company took a certain amount of money, passed it to another man for the purpose, we will say, of buying liquor and spending money at elections, and you were satisfied that was done, would you vote, as a director, to discharge the officer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I certainly would not want to sanction anything of that kind, Mr. Chairman—any such action on the part of the officer.

Chairman WALSH. Would you vote to discharge him if he did it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, it would depend on who the officer was; it might be one of the under officers, who would not be appointed by the board; I certainly would do everything that I could as a director to see that such things as that were not done.

Chairman WALSH. Would you investigate the question as to whether the officer higher than he had authorized it or as to how the funds of the company could be taken from its treasury for such purpose?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If I had any reason to believe that such statements were more than the kind of idle rumors that are current in any political campaign with reference to any corporation, I certainly should.

Chairman WALSH. If you believed that the officers of a local corporation in which you were a director got together and elected the public officials who were to pass the laws—that is, to select nominees in the party conventions of persons who were to run as officers for the legislature and for the executive officers of the counties and State in which your companies operated—would you consider that a legitimate reason for discharging the officers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, it might be, of course, Mr. Chairman, that such men, as citizens of the State, would have a responsibility as any other citizens would of looking toward the selection of whom they thought were proper and desirable candidates to fill the offices in the interests of the people at large. I should want to know the facts in each case before passing any judgment.

Chairman WALSH. Are you acquainted with Jesse B. Northcutt?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. Ever meet him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Ever heard the name before?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think so, but I don't know what his relations are.

Chairman WALSH. Is he not the attorney for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know that.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the speech made by Mr. Northcutt; did you know he was a judge of the district court in your coal field prior to becoming your attorney?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read a speech of Mr. Northcutt's made in 1912, the time before this strike, in which he declared that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. nominated, elected, and controlled public officials in Las Animas and Huerfano Counties?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not; I never have heard of the speech to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Have you a printed copy of the preliminary statement that you made this morning?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Would you kindly refer me to that part of your statement when you set forth the necessities of providing certain things—housing and commissary, etc., on account of the remoteness of these mines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I made no such statement—

Chairman WALSH. Well, not in those words, but I wish you would refer to that part of the statement, you understand?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, yes; I understand.

Chairman WALSH. It says:

“Social conditions surrounding an industry depend upon many factors other than labor conditions. The responsibility of a corporation located in a thickly settled and highly organized community depends upon the relative importance of the corporation to the other factors in the community. Where the activities of a corporation are carried on in new and undeveloped sections of the country social conditions are largely influenced by the attitude of the corporation and its officers; and the corporation is required to provide for many things which in a more settled community would be taken care of by the community as a whole."

Now, I wish you would indicate, Mr. Rockefeller, the main and substantial things that you feel that the company must take care of, that in an ordinary community would be taken care of by the community as a whole.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My thought there is a general one, Mr. Chairman, that where an industry is located in the center of a highly civilized community homes for the workers are easily obtainable usually, and are frequently provided by other people. The water supply is cared for, school facilities are provided by the community, recreation facilities are provided by the community, and matters of such a nature in a highly civilized and thickly settled community are naturally provided. But when one goes out to a remote district in the establishment of an industry, where no community life existed prior to the location of the industry, just as it is usually necessary to provide houses in which the men will live, on the ground that it would be a hardship to ask a man to buy a house in a remote district of the mountains where he could not be sure of permanent occupation, as it would be an injustice to ask him to buy his house there, it becomes necessary for those who would develop an industry in such a locality to provide means for living in which the labor that is willing to come to that locality can be housed. Similarly, where a community is built around an industry, no community having existed previously, it may be necessary at the outset that the industry should cooperate in and possibly provide entirely school facilities, facilities for social recreation, water facilities, and such other matters.

Chairman WALSH. Did you mention the commissary store, where they might buy their provisions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not, but that is—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). That is one matter.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (continuing). That is one matter and that is a matter which some one must provide. Now, that is not the ideal thing, but that is a necessity which follows the pioneering of an industry, when it is started in a remote locality. After such an industry has been developing for some years and there has grown up a settlement, a village, a town in the community, and others have come in for other purposes, if such be the case, the community naturally broadens, and those responsibilities which would naturally not be taken care of at all at the outset if not by the company, very properly are taken over increasingly by the community itself as it becomes capable of developing the means and ability to care for such matters. I think it highly important that all such matters should be cared for by the community; but rather than that those who come to such a locality in order to secure employment should suffer from the lack of them it seems to me inevitable that the corporation which is developing the industry at that point should provide certain of those things.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not necessary—highly necessary—during this pioneering process, as you have mentioned, Mr. Rockefeller, to provide also a physician and hospitals?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not undertake to cover the subject exhaustively.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I am just calling your attention to that one thing.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Anything which the people in the community may require and which the community has not developed sufficiently to supply itself, I think it would be highly proper and quite necessary that the corporation should supply at the outset.

Chairman WALSH. Now, in Colorado, where we have a remote State so far as the center of population is concerned and again where the coal fields are in territory remote even from the center of the population in that State, is it not a fact that these activities that you say the companies are, by the necessities of the case, required to carry on, remain practically permanent on account of the necessary situation of the case?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Unless population is directed to the community for other reasons than because employment is found in the specific industry, such a condition might continue for some time.

Chairman WALSH. How long has Primero been running as a mining town?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no idea, sir.

Chairman WALSH. How long has Delagua been running as a mining town?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Very many of those properties have been operated—you, of course, recall the name of the town, do you not—Delagua?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, the Delagua mine has been operating ever since you came into the company 12 years ago?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, that might be true, Mr. Chairman; but if its location is an isolated one to which people are not attracted, other than those employed in the mines, I should think it would probably be true that the community itself would not be able to provide those facilities and that the company would be obliged to do so.

Chairman WALSH. In order to carry on the industry the company would be obliged to provide those facilities on account of the isolated character of the neighborhood?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think where men have themselves to provide all the things that life demands, it is highly desirable; and if any way could be suggested by this commission whereby such a community as you have described could be rendered competent—I mean competent so far as financial and other questions are concerned—to provide such things themselves, I should think it was the ideal thing and that it was very much to be desired.

Chairman WALSH. Before that time comes—and it may be that no human being can make any such suggestion—before that time comes, at any rate, is there not a grave responsibility on the part of the directors for the welfare of those people that are so economically situated on account of the remoteness of the industry and these other reasons which you have given?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There certainly is.

Chairman WALSH. For instance, in the commissary. Do you believe that the commissary ought to be run on the same plan that a store would have to be run in a highly competitive neighborhood and in a neighborhood where access could be had to other means of supply?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Do you mean by that as regards prices, or what?

Chairman WALSH. As regards prices to the consumer.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the prices should be reasonable when one considers the cost of the original article, the cost of bringing it to the point at which it is sold, and the cost of its handling and sale.

Chairman WALSH. Inasmuch as the workman is the only consumer in the neighborhood, and as he has no place else to get these supplies or commodities, naturally the amount charged by the company would have a very great effect upon the real wages which he receives, would they not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The company certainly would have an opportunity to charge a high price or a low price. I should think that the company that was trying to do the fair thing would charge just what the goods would properly be worth there in proportion to the prices at other places in the nearest neighborhood, adding the cost of transporting and selling them to the prices mentioned.

Chairman WALSH. As a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., did you ever take up specifically the charges for the supplies at the stores in the coal camps of Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is not a matter which would naturally fall to the directors to take up, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. When the mines are running full, how many families would you say—how many people live in the coal camps of Colorado owned by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Would you not consider it advisable for the directors of a corporation of that character to determine the percentage of profit that a store ought to make under such circumstances when one is so powerful economically and the other so weak?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should consider, Mr. Chairman, that the men whom the directors feel to be competent to handle the other managerial questions of the company in connection with the operation of the company ought to be competent to handle that question, and if they were not they should not be intrusted with the responsibility of operating the company.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that an executive official might have a divided duty, one being to earn dividends and the other to look out for the health and well-being of the people in the industry, and that one might conflict with the other?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think we are all of us in life, Mr. Chairman, meeting just such conflicts constantly and having to decide between what seem to be conflicting duties and responsibilities. But, as I pointed out this morning, it seems to me that a corporation should be considered to consist of its stockholders, its directors, its officers, and its employees, and that the corporation should be administered by the executive officers under its directors in the interests of all those four classes, and that the officer who did not properly and fully regard the interests of all four classes would not be living up to his fullest share of responsibility.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that the director has a responsibility in seeing that the officer does that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is not possible in practice, Mr. Chairman, for the director to follow the officer in every detail of the managerial position which he fills. The director must take such steps as seem to him right and proper to satisfy himself of the integrity of purpose and of the ability of the officer, and then, I think, he must trust him. If he has reason to believe that the officer is not properly handling the trust, then some change should be made.

Chairman WALSH. Should the trust simply be a general trust in him as a man or the trust which grows out of a constant general supervision and a noticing as to how he carries on the activities in finance and otherwise?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think, Mr. Chairman, the common experience is that we can not get the best out of any man if we put a responsibility on him and then follow him up to see how he acquits himself of that responsibility in every detail. We must trust him and must take care, as must any individual in life, in the selecting of those on whose shoulders we place responsibility; but having made a careful selection, I think you will agree that a man develops an ability to carry responsibility when it is placed fairly and squarely upon him.

Chairman WALSH. Is all of the stock of the Colorado Supply Co. owned by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume that it is, but I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. For the last 10 years has the Colorado Supply Co. made a net profit of 20 per cent on its capitalization of $1,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what the capitalization of the Colorado Supply Co. is?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not think that the return made upon the investment in the Colorado Supply Co. would be an indication of a strong character as to the fairness with which the individual is dealt with in those camps weakened by the situation in which you say he must necessarily be.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think so; but I think what would be a proper return would have to be considered in connection with what the returns on similar stores in other localities may be.

Chairman WALSH. In other localities where competitive industries and competing stores exist, other localities such as those like the Victor-American or the Rocky Mountain Fuel Co.—which do you mean?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I mean in other communities where other stores that were comparable were in existence.

Chairman WALSH. Now, isn't the difference very great between an ordinary store and a community where there was diversified industry or such a store as you have described? In the first place, there is no risk of bad debts in the store of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., is there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know, Mr. Chairman, because I have not had to do with that department of the business, nor am I conversant generally with the keeping of a store.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know whether or not in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. the check-off system is used by the company; that is, that the amount of goods that they buy at the store is taken from the pay of the man before his envelope is turned over to him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not suppose that that exists; I did not know that it did, but I am not clear on that point. I think it does exist.

Chairman WALSH. Are you not aware of the fact that the man is not allowed a dollar's worth of goods unless he has a dollar earned as wages?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had no knowledge of that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And from your general business knowledge, you think it would be a very great advantage not to have bad debts in a retail grocery or provision business, would you not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I never have had any experience with bad debts in a retail grocery or provision business, but I have in a general business. I think they ought to be avoided when possible.

Chairman WALSH. That it would be out of comparison when you come to the question of profit that a business ought to receive if one was in a condition where it could lose through bad debts and the poor extension of credit and the other where they were sure to get their money for every cent's worth of goods that went out?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it would doubtless have a power, but I am not familiar with storekeeping, so I would not know how direct a bearing it would have.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it would have a great bearing also for the storekeeper or merchant to know the character of his goods that were going to be called for in advance so that he could make purchases with such knowledge of what he might have an opportunity of selling?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think that would be very helpful. I do not know the policy of the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is, but if anyone wants to come into any of those towns and start a store on an independent basis if they thought there was anything in it for them, I, personally as an individual, would be glad to see them do it.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware that the check-off system takes the money out of the pay of the men and sees that he does not get any goods until he has the money earned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a matter I am not familiar with, that sort of operation, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Your general statement, as we entered this subject, that on account of the isolation of these places it is impossible for other persons to run the stores, and therefore the company runs the stores; I mean that holds good?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not necessarily impossible for them to run it, but not attractive for them to run it, Mr. Chairman. If a man is willing to take the chances of going in there and taking a store and taking the risk of competing for the business, he might be able to make a success of it. If he could, well and good. I do not know what his chances would be.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the basis upon which the rents are charged to the workers in the mines of Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the basis upon which charges are made for medical service?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean the hospital facilities?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; the hospital facilities and aid to the injured and any extension of medical attention to the families of the workers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression is that every employee pays a dollar a month, which entitles him to full hospital privileges for whatever length of time may be necessary, and I have generally understood that that was a customary arrangement in similar corporations.

Chairman WALSH. You recognize the fact that when a company undertakes these activities which you say includes the establishment of schoolhouses—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). May include, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. May include—that the greatest responsibility rests upon the company for the physical and moral life of the inhabitants, do you not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I certainly think that the company would not undertake those things unless it regarded seriously its responsibility. It is in recognition of that responsibility that it does those things.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe the executive officers—and that you say must be the ones upon whom those duties would be—discharged by the executive officers under your organization—under the organization I mean of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is customary, I think, Mr. Chairman, in large business organizations.

Chairman WALSH. Well, after the executive officers establish a schoolhouse within a very few hundred feet of a saloon, with no intervening buildings, would you say that that was a violation of the duty that was imposed upon them on account of these conditions that you have mentioned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I should want to know all of the facts entering in, Mr. Chairman, which would lead to the establishment in juxtaposition of those two buildings before feeling competent to express an opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose the company owned all the property in the camp; that it was surrounded by a fence, and gates opened to give access and ingress and egress, and that there was sufficient land unused to do so; would you consider it is a very gross offense against the lives and homes of those people to establish two buildings, one a public school, upon its own property, and the other a saloon, close to each other, with no intervening buildings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think always that the greater the distance between a saloon and a school the better, in a thinly settled community or in a thickly settled community.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in the particular case of a coal camp, where responsibility could be fixed for it, would you be in favor of discharging an executive officer that did such a thing for no reason except perhaps the lack of the same moral standards that you have expressed here?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should feel it would be desirable to know all of the reasons which entered into it, Mr. Chairman, and I would hardly think I could pass judgment on so abstract a case. I have expressed my views as favoring the widest possible separation, consistent with other considerations which would come up, between a saloon and a school always, and that would hold quite as much in a small community—perhaps more even—than in a large community, in so far as it would be possible.

Chairman WALSH. What considerations do you deem could move the executive officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to maintain a saloon and a school-house in juxtaposition to each other?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was not aware that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. did maintain saloons.

Chairman WALSH. You are not aware now that they do?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That the company itself maintains saloons.

Chairman WALSH. Are you not aware that they do maintain saloons?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not know that the company itself maintained saloons.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact that the company builds buildings of a value, we will say, of two or three thousand dollars, and then leases that building to a saloon keeper at a rental of $125 a month?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; those are matters that I do not know anything about. But is that an instance of the company's maintaining a saloon, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. I am not speaking of what I say, but asking if you would not say that company was maintaining a saloon?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If a man owned a piece of land in New York, we will say, and rented it to a saloon keeper, would you say he maintains a saloon? I hardly think so.

Chairman WALSH. I would not, of course, like to testify, but I will submit a statement to you.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not mean—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Although I have some strong opinions on it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not mean that; I was just trying to develop the fact.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will suppose a case of this kind: That company owned all the land in a camp—the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. owned all the land in a camp; that the whole camp was surrounded by a high board fence, upon the top of which there were three rolls of barbed wire; that they had absolute control of the real estate, and in renting it that they built a saloon, and that the value of the saloon proper, we will say, was $3,000, and that they then rented the saloon to an individual for $125 a month—that land that they owned and controlled and the building, which only cost them $3,000—and the man went right ahead selling liquor to those people who also owned homes in that camp and who were the only patrons served. Would you or would you not say that the company was in the saloon business, with a very thin veneer of alleged facts that might hide the real question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say, Mr. Chairman, that the amount of the rental, whether large or small, had no bearing on whether the company was in the business or not.

Chairman WALSH. Very good, then.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say in the matter of saloons, when I was in Colorado that was a question which I gave no little thought to. Personally I always have been a teetotaler. I appreciated when I was going through those camps the great difficulty which the management is confronted with in undertaking to change the customs with reference to the use of beer, and so forth, which many of the men working in the mines have been brought up with. The question was up at that time as to how the evil of drinking could best be dealt with. And I remember visiting, with no little interest, a clubhouse which had been established at a certain camp, in which the men and some of the officers of the company in that vicinity participated in the management. The clubhouse was run on the theory that a man who wished to drink should have the opportunity to drink; that it was not for the company to undertake to say that he should not drink, but that it was in the interest of the community that drinking should be discouraged, that excessive drinking and drinking to intoxication, drinking as in treating, should be done away with as far as possible. That was one of the experiments which was tried at that time in dealing with the question of drinking. How successful it is to-day I can not now say, but that is one method that was tried. Others, I understand, were tried. I know that the purpose of the company has been to reduce drinking to the minimum; but I know that the company—I know that any company would not feel that it had a right to say that no man should drink if he so desired. I speak at length simply to indicate that my attitude as a director, and, as I understand it, the attitude of the management of the company—of this particular company—is to reduce to the minimum the drinking evil.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact, of the alleged fact, that in these saloon buildings—I believe you have mentioned them as clubs—they call them saloons out there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was true of one club that I speak of, but I also said there were various methods which had been tried of dealing with the question. The club, I think, was not general.

Chairman WALSH. Are you aware of the fact, if it be a fact, that these saloons—over these saloons halls are provided for meeting places for the employees, and in some instances for religious services?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was not aware of that fact; and if it is true I presume, offhand, it would be because that was the only building of sufficient size in the community to provide a particular meeting hall of sufficient capacity for either of those purposes, undesirable as it might be, and contrary to the public interest, as it would be, to have the building used for those purposes.

Chairman WALSH. Can you find justification from an economic or financial standpoint for providing the meeting places for the people in those villages where the company is undertaking to provide all those facilities over a saloon—social and religious purposes?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, whether a place for meeting, even under unfavorable circumstances is more desirable than no place to meet in is a question which I think would depend upon the conditions of the town and how much a place to meet in was desired by the inhabitants. Generally speaking, I would not be able to express an opinion on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Would there be anything standing in the way of providing those places in those small camps in Colorado except the matter of expense?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I assume not; but I do not know. I think, so far as that is concerned, Mr. Chairman, that the point which I made, undertook to make, this morning should be borne in mind, namely, that the stockholders of this company—I do not speak of ourselves or other large stockholders, but the very many other small stockholders—are entitled to some consideration, and I think that you will recognize that the position of a director is one of responsibility, both to his employees—I mean the position, too, more particularly of the executive officers—is one of responsibility both for the condition and comforts and welfare of the employees and also of responsibility to the smaller and all of the stockholders. Now, the fact that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. officials and directors have put any surplus profits back into the development of the business and into endeavoring to increase wages and to improve the working conditions, almost to the extent of substantially no dividends, would seem to indicate that they had gone further than they could continuously go and maintain the financial credit of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Has the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. within the past few months instituted a sociological department?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had understood that such a department had been in existence for some years.

Chairman WALSH. How many years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was such a department when I was in Colorado 10 years ago.

Chairman WALSH. Has there been any change made in the sociological department in the past few months?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no definite recollection of that, but I would not be apt to have information on that point, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Who is the head of the sociological department of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Who is the head of the sociological department?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have assumed that Dr. Korwin, who is the head of the hospital, has had general charge of all such matters.

Chairman WALSH. Please name the activities of the sociological department of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not be able to, Mr. Chairman; I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Does the sociological department undertake to have a censorship over the publications that are sent into the camps of the company in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a matter that I would not know about.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instances in which the individuals who run the saloons are also upon the board of school trustees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I would not know about.

Chairman WALSH. In the camps of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not be in a position to know that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instances in the camps of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. where the publications of the sociological department are sent to the saloonkeeper for distribution among the inhabitants of the community?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not; but I have no knowledge on that subject and I could not say yes or no.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that the directors of a corporation of the size of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., with its activities in these isolated communities and charged with the duty, the company being charged with the duty necessarily of providing all of the things that you have mentioned, should have an intimate first-hand knowledge of all of the conditions which I have mentioned through a system of definite written reports from the executive officers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. While I think it would be desirable, it seems to me it would be impossible. I do not see how the directors could give the intimate attention to those matters and, as I have said before, it seems to me that if the officers appointed are not men of sufficient ability, sufficient breadth, sufficient humanity to properly deal with those questions, it would be a question of strengthening the executive end of the company.

Chairman WALSH. How do the executive officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. deal with those activities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know. That is left in their hands.

Chairman WALSH. How can you judge whether they are proper people to deal with those activities unless you know how they deal with them?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can only judge by what I know of the men.

Chairman WALSH. Their general characteristics?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Their general characteristics and their general experience and training, and so forth.

Might I say, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, that the commission has doubtless gotten as much information with reference to the subjects that have been developed to-day, and personally as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. I should be very happy to have any such matters of abuse or of wrongs as you may have found, that may be incorporated in your final report, brought to my personal attention. I would regard it as a courtesy on your part, and I can assure you that I should be only too happy to do everything in my power to right, to see that such wrongs are righted, because it is my desire as a director to do all that I can to have conditions in connection with the workers just as favorable and just as healthful and as proper as is possible, and I would greatly appreciate your cooperation and any suggestion of specific things which should be taken up in that way.

Chairman WALSH. At this point the commission will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

Please resume the stand at that time, Mr. Rockefeller.

(At 4.30 in the afternoon of this Monday, January 25, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Tuesday, January 26, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m.)

NEW YORK CITY, January 26, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Common.

Chairman WALSH. We will proceed now. The house will be in order.

Mr. Rockefeller, please resume the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Rockefeller, as you left the stand last night, you made the following statement, which I will read to you just to bring you to the point that I desire to make: "I might say, Mr. Chairman, in this connection, that the commission has doubtless gotten as much information with reference to the subjects that have been developed to-day, and personally, as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., I should be very happy to have any such matters of abuse or of wrongs as you may have found, that may be incorporated in your final report, brought to my personal attention. I would regard it as a courtesy on your part, and I can assure you that I should be only too happy to do everything in my power to right, to see that such wrongs are righted, because it is my desire as a director to do all that I can to have conditions in connection with the workers just as favorable and just as healthful and as proper as is possible, and I would greatly appreciate your cooperation and any suggestion of specific things which should be taken up in that way."

Now, prior to this strike was there a strike in Colorado in 1903 in your industry, after you took charge of this company, or the present organization took charge of it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was a strike in Colorado about 1903 or 1904.

Chairman WALSH. And it lasted for the greater part of a year, about nine months, I believe?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression was it was hardly as long in duration as that; I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. How long do you remember that strike to have been in existence?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I thought five or six months, possibly, but my memory is not clear on that.

Chairman WALSH. The testimony shows eight. But, at any rate, there were human beings lost their lives, and violence took place in that strike?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think so. My recollection is not clear.

Chairman WALSH. And the men in that strike had grievances, real or fancied?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Real or fancied; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Objected to conditions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know about that, Mr. Chairman. I think the chief question involved there, and I have always so understood it, was the recognition of the unions.

Chairman WALSH. There were men deported from your camp?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not recall that there were many claims on the part of individuals that their constitutional rights had been taken away from them at that time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir; I do not recall that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the testimony of President Welborn, of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., given in this investigation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have gone through it hastily.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read his statement that the investigation of the Commission on Industrial Relations was the twenty-seventh investigation of conditions in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I knew there had been a number, but I did not recall it was as large as that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall that that is the number Mr. Welborn gave?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. In the twenties?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not hold that in my memory.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the alleged facts brought out of those investigations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I read the testimony of Mr. Welborn only hastily.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly suggest, following your statement of last evening, what you think should be done by this commission to bring these facts home and to secure your cooperation, as you have suggested, in remedying any conditions that may exist out there that are wrong and improper?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I hardly would venture to suggest to a body so important as this, Mr. Chairman, how it might see fit to present questions of that kind. I would appreciate suggestions in whatever form the commission might deem it best to present them.

Chairman WALSH. Might it suffice for you to just read the testimony taken before the commission and thus obtain the information?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That would certainly throw light on it. I felt after the commission had completed its investigation there would be certain specific things which it believed could be taken up at an early date, with a view to improving conditions, and I had hoped that the commission would be disposed to make some specific suggestions of that character.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that there is any danger in a purely industrial corporation one organized for the purpose of profit controlling anything which has to do with the source of education and the spread of the gospel, for instance the management of churches?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I stated yesterday, Mr. Chairman, I think the ideal thing is for any community to provide for itself all of those facilities. I undertook to make clear that there were certain conditions in the organization of this industry in remote districts, where a corporation, in order to be humane and to fulfill its just obligations, is necessarily called upon to provide certain things which later on in a more settled condition of the country would not be necessary, but I always would deplore that necessity and regard it only as an expedient, not as the ideal thing.

Chairman WALSH. Then it might be expedient and necessary for an industrial corporation organized for profit to appoint and discharge ministers of the cities which they control?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't understand and did not understand, Mr. Chairman, that was done in the cities. I understood it was in the small villages and communities that were largely, if not wholly, occupied by the employees of the specific corporation.

Chairman WALSH. Well, do you think that such a course might tend to deflect at least the teaching of religion?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If it were a choice as between having no ministers and having them paid by the company my own feeling would be that it would be in the interest of the community to have religious service conducted, but that would be only my own feeling.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that your executive officers should in any way control or influence what the ministers said?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say decidedly not. I should always want any minister to speak, as any other citizen, with the utmost freedom.

Chairman WALSH. And if on that very important matter an executive officer of your company should attempt to dictate or to influence what a minister was to say, would you have any hesitancy in discharging him or casting your vote as a director to discharge him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to seem to evade the question, but I think in fairness to the officers of the company it would hardly be just in me to pass judgment in any case without knowing all the facts. I think you will appreciate my delicate feeling on that subject. It is only a desire to show entire justice. I say unhesitatingly on the question of the propriety of any minister speaking just what he thinks, what I think that should obtain.

Chairman WALSH. Was your attention called to a letter written by Mr. Jesse F. Welborn, president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., to Mr. Starr J. Murphy, a director in that company—the same Mr. Murphy, I assume, that is one of your father's advisers in his private matters, and also connected with the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The same Mr. Murphy is in those several relationships.

Chairman WALSH. Did you see a letter written by Mr. Welborn in answer to a letter of Mr. Murphy's, the letter of Mr. Welborn being dated October 31, 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I could not recall it by date; I am quite apt to see all of the correspondence that comes in the office on the subject.

Chairman WALSH. This letter reads as follows:

[The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Denver, Colo. J. F. Welborn, president.]

OCTOBER 31, 1914.

MY DEAR MR. MURPHY: I have yours of the 29th instant regarding charges made against certain of our employees at Sunrise, Wyo., by a lady living at that place. The name of the person signed to the paper which you sent me is the same as that of the minister at Sunrise, and I assume that she is the minister's wife.

At the time of the Ludlow affair the minister was very outspoken in his criticism of the coal companies, but seemed to regret his action when informed of the facts concerning that disturbance. He has socialistic tendencies, however, and I have been informed that his wife is a Greek, yet they may both be perfectly honest, and it is possible the charges made by the lady are true. At the same time it is rather hard to understand that such practices as the doctor is charged with could have been indulged in without our hearing complaints from other quarters, unless the mine superintendent and others in authority are in the conspiracy with him.

The matter is of such grave importance that I will have it investigated thoroughly at once, and, of course, will advise you of the results.

We have thought some of changing the minister at Sunrise, but have refrained from taking a course that would be unfair to him or would indicate a prejudice against him because of what may have been simply indiscreet statements in connection with the Ludlow outbreak.

The charges against the doctor rather overshadow those made against the foremen referred to, yet I shall investigate the latter quite as thoroughly as the former, and if I find that the charges against the foremen are correct I shall not only put a stop to the practices but dispense with the services of the men who have been guilty.

Yours, very truly,

JESSE F. WELBORN.

Do you know that letter? Was that letter presented to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I have seen that letter.

Chairman WALSH. What disposition, if any, was made of the minister at Sunrise?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not heard.

Chairman WALSH. The Ludlow affair referred to there was a conflict that took place between certain of the striking miners and the military in which a number of lives were lost?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Ludlow affair?

Chairman WALSH. I say the Ludlow affair, to which this minister referred, was a conflict between the military and certain striking miners in which a number of lives were lost.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Are you asking a question?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; in a leading form.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think I get the question.

Chairman WALSH. Probably you have not carried the letter with you as I have, as it was easier for me to do. One of the paragraphs says:

"We have thought some of changing the minister at Sunrise, but have refrained from taking a course that would be unfair to him or would indicate a prejudice against him because of what may have been simply indiscreet statements in connection with the Ludlow outbreak."

Was not the Ludlow outbreak a conflict between the military and certain striking miners and persons with them in which a number of lives were lost?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. So I understand.

Chairman WALSH. You know that, do you not? That has been brought to you directly by reports?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You say you do not know what became of the minister at Sunrise.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not heard.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose that the minister at Sunrise was sent away from there or discharged by your executive officers on account of the indiscreet remarks about the company, would you consider that within the scope of their executive duties?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I should hardly feel that it was fair to the officers for me to try to pass judgment on a matter of that kind without having all of the facts, and it seems to me that the spirit shown in the letter of Mr. Welborn indicates his earnest desire to find out the facts. If the facts are to any considerable degree prejudicial to the man in question, the situation should be properly dealt with. It seems to me that it is a perfectly fair letter and shows an entirely praiseworthy spirit, and what the outcome has been I have not heard, but I am sure that it will be followed up by Mr. Welborn and proper action taken.

Chairman WALSH. Then you think, if it turned out to be the fact that in the judgment of Mr. Welborn the remarks made by the minister were indiscreet, it would be perfectly proper to discharge him, do you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I do not understand that is the only matter mentioned in the letter about the minister; that is only one thing in passing. As the letter was read, and you are more familiar with it than I, I gathered that there were other things charged.

Chairman WALSH. The charges were that he was outspoken in his criticism of the coal companies, that he had socialistic tendencies, and the information was that his wife was a Greek.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not deal with any of those situations, because I do not know the facts.

Chairman WALSH. Do you say, then, as a citizen, leaving out the question of your being a director, that an industrial company engaged in business for profit should have anything to say about the remarks of a minister?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think decidedly not, but that the minister should be allowed to say things which he believes to be right without question. I thought you were trying to get me to answer in regard to specific things, and I did not feel adequately informed to deal with them.

Chairman WALSH. I will leave the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. matter and ask the general question, whether as a citizen you think the executive officers of an industrial company ought to have the power to discharge a minister for expressing his views on matters of the life and death of human beings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My answer was, without exception, that there should be absolute freedom of speech.

Chairman WALSH. And that would apply to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. as well as any other company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would certainly include that company.

Chairman WALSH. Where the whole village is owned—that is, the property in a whole village—is owned by one company, do you think the director has any duty to see that republican institutions are maintained?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I certainly think that a director has every duty with reference to the conduct of the affairs of the company, and it is the purpose always of the directors—it has been in this case—to see that republicanism—that, is the principles of democracy—were given free scope in every instance.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever met a gentleman by the name of Jefferson Farr?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I never heard of him.

Chairman WALSH. You never heard of Jefferson Farr?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I never had the pleasure.

Chairman WALSH. What are the names of the counties in which your mines are located in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever hear of the political subdivision of Colorado known as Huerfano County?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I knew there was such a county there.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know you were a director of a company that owned mines in that county?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I know the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. owns mines in that county.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever hear of a political subdivision of Colorado known as Las Animas County?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Does the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. own mines in that county?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it does; but I do not pretend to remember the counties in which its mines are situated.

Chairman WALSH. And likewise, Mr. Rockefeller, did you ever hear of a gentleman by the name of Melish?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know that gentleman.

Chairman WALSH. You are, of course, opposed to the use of violence in labor disturbances or any place else?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I certainly am.

Chairman WALSH. You believe, of course, in the integrity of the law and the duty of every citizen to uphold it, whether a director in an industrial company or otherwise?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know that Jefferson Farr was the sheriff of Huerfano County and that your company uses its influence to elect him sheriff, and has been doing so for the past 15 years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I do not know anything about that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Was your attention called to the fact that on and before September 1, 1913, and before any strike was called affecting any of the mines in Huerfano County that Mr. Farr swore in 326 men and commissioned them as deputy sheriffs; that Mr. Farr did not know these men personally and that, so far as he knew, many of them might have been red-handed murderers and criminals; that the county did not pay these men, but that Superintendent Mattison, of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., told them that they were to be furnished arms and paid by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? Assuming those facts to be correct, would you say that such conduct was a menace to the peace of the county as well as a republican form of government?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with the matters in connection with the handling of the strike, and it would be impossible for me, at this distance, to have suggested how proper protection should be secured for the property which the officers of the company represent and for the lives of the men working for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. I do not see how I could express an opinion on those matters.

Chairman WALSH. Speaking as a citizen, would such a practice be a menace to the peace of the community where it was carried out and dangerous to democratic institutions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should have to get you to make that statement again, because it is a little involved, and I do not retain the details of it in mind.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman suggests that I make it clear to you that it was testified to by Jefferson Farr on the stand, as to what he did in securing these men and commissioning them, and the dates thereof. It was not testified to by Sheriff Farr on the stand that he was elected through the influence of your company, but he did testify that he was supported by the officers of your company. I think that makes it clear.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Would this give you the information you want? If not, I would like to have the question repeated in detail. That anything that interferes with the operation of a democratic form of government is to be deplored and should be avoided. You know that cases sometimes arise that can not be foreseen, and situations arise that have to be dealt with separately; but anything that interferes with a democratic form of government should not be tolerated.

Chairman WALSH. Is it not true always—does ever an occasion arise where the practice and theory of a democratic form of government should be set aside temporarily, in your opinion?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should concede, for instance, that if a man should break into my house that it would be the duty of the officers of the law to deal with such a case, yet, for the protection of my family and myself, it might be necessary for me to take some action. That I would regard as unfortunate, but that would be a situation, a distinct situation, that would require specific treatment; and that illustrates a situation when the regular forms of law for the preservation of the peace might for the moment not be adequate.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall my question enough to think that the necessary defense of persons and property furnishes a parallel case to what I have stated? Or perhaps I had better have the question read to you.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). I will have the question read. Mr. Reporter, please read that question.

The REPORTER (reading):

"Was your attention called to the fact that on and before September 1, 1913, and before any strike was called affecting any of the mines in Huerfano County, that Mr. Farr swore in 326 men and commissioned them as deputy sheriffs; that Mr. Farr did not know these men personally and that so far as he knew many of them might have been red-handed murderers and criminals; that the county did not pay the men, but that Superintendent Mattison, of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., told them they were to be furnished arms and paid by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? Assuming those facts to be correct, would you say that such conduct was a menace to the peace of the county as well as a republican form of government?"

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say that if the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. thought there was danger impending to the company and the lives of its employees in a remote section of the country where the ordinary forms of protection were not adequate, that it would be their duty to take any steps they might feel should be taken in an emergency case to protect such lives and such property, and I can fancy that a situation like that arising might not make it always possible to do the thing most desirable, but one has to do some things in an emergency. I assume this situation was a situation of this kind, and the officers of the company felt their first duty was for the protection of lives and property, and they did what seemed to them wise. I should not be able to pass on the propriety of their actions in that instance without knowing all of the circumstances; but I would say unhesitatingly that anything that interferes with a democratic form of government is always to be deplored and avoided absolutely unless the protection of lives and property in such a situation as that makes it necessary that some immediate action be taken.

Chairman WALSH. You observe the question states that this was done on and prior to September 1, 1913, and the strike was not called until September 23, and you also had in mind in answering that question, Mr. Rockefeller, that this sheriff appointed men whom he did not know and who, as far as he knew, might have been criminals and red-handed murderers; you observed all of that, when you made your answer, did you not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; and it is fair to say that while they might have been red-handed murderers and criminals, yet, on the other hand, they might not have been, but might have been peaceable and law-abiding citizens desirous of maintaining order. And might I also say that although this was before the strike was called, the officers of the company believed that difficulties were planned, and thought they owed it to the lives of their employees and the property entrusted to them, to be prepared to protect such lives and property? I think there are many circumstances which one would have to know much more about than I do in order to judge fairly of that situation.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the reports in the dispatches of the Associated Press containing the testimony of Jefferson Farr, sheriff of Huerfano County in the congressional investigation and in the investigation of this commission?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that it should be made unlawful for private detective agencies to keep bodies of armed men enrolled for the purpose of transporting them from State to State to be used while labor disputes are in progress?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a question that I have no knowledge at all about, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. What is your information about it as a citizen?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I believe whatever measures may be necessary in order to protect life and property in emergency situations, must be adopted. If my wife and my family were thus threatened I should take whatever measures I could. I would consider afterwards the propriety of them, but I would adopt the thing that I felt was my first duty.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe the Government is strong enough in this country to protect the property and lives of its citizens, or that a stage has been reached where that matter must be left to private endeavor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I certainly believe that the Government is strong enough to protect the lives of its citizens. I should think, as is constantly shown, Mr. Chairman, there arise instances where the forces of law are not gathered in sufficient quantity at a specific point to meet every emergency that may arise, and I should think that situation had developed in Colorado, that there was a time when the State of Colorado was not able to maintain law and order.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand you to say that you knew nothing about the alleged system of transporting men from State to State by detective agencies in industrial disputes—armed men?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is a matter I have never had any occasion to know about, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to any such practice?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have heard, as one hears, that detectives are employed from time to time, and in one place or another.

Chairman WALSH. Was your attention ever called to the fact—I will ask you—was your attention ever called to the fact that your company in Colorado had made a practice for a long time of having detectives go into the mines pretending to be regular workmen, for the purpose of spying upon the workmen and reporting to the company what their attitude might be toward organization?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My attention has never been called to that fact.

Chairman WALSH. If they did that, would you believe, when the detectives reported that the men were in favor of organization and talking organization, that they were discharged—would you believe that to be in conformity with the expressed desirability upon your part of workmen organizing for their own protection?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Whenever men might seek to propagate the politics or labor doctrines or religion any place where it did not interfere, during the daytime, with the work of the men, or where it did not interfere with the peace of the community, I certainly feel that the greatest freedom should be given.

Chairman WALSH. And if you found that great freedom was denied the men working in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., what would you do to the executive officer; what action would you take if you found it was denied them?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should expect the executive officers to be able to justify their course, or else to stand ready to take whatever criticism or whatever action the directors might think appropriate under the circumstances.

Chairman WALSH. What action would the directors, would you as a director, think appropriate, assuming that these rights were denied in that matter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There, again, Mr. Chairman, it does not seem to me I could be entirely fair to the employees of the company in which we have an interest were I to pass judgment on their specific acts without knowing all the facts in relation thereto. While I am not in any way endeavoring to, nor do I desire to, evade the question, I do not think it is a fair position for me to take to pass such judgment.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever undertaken to make a personal investigation of any case of alleged abuse of that kind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I have not had the opportunity.

Chairman WALSH. You made some mention yesterday about having intended to go to Colorado if it had not been for this hearing. Have you been to Colorado since the strike of 1903?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not been there for 10 years. Whether it was just before the strike or just after the strike I can not recall, but it is about 10 years.

Chairman WALSH. Can you recall whether you made an inspection of conditions when you went there, with reference to any strike that had taken place in your industry prior to your going to Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I made such inquiries as I went about over the works, the mines, etc., as would naturally suggest themselves to a director who was interested in the properties, in the various matters pertaining to their management, but I can not recall at this time, 10 years distant, just what inquiries I did make.

Chairman WALSH. And do you recall the fact as to whether the strike took place before or after your visit?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not clear on that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that a corporation such as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. should take part in politics, the election of public officials?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not believe that any corporation, as a corporation, can take part, or should take part. It is illegal for a corporation, as I understand it, according to the laws of many of the States, to take part.

Chairman WALSH. If that were the case in Colorado, what action would you take toward the executive officer that did take part in politics and sought to, and at times did, control party conventions and the result of elections, both of the election of officers and the adoption of constitutional amendments where the people have that power?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should always use my influence as a director and as a stockholder to the fullest extent possible in preventing anything of that kind, because I utterly disbelieve in it.

Chairman WALSH. If you were brought face to face with a concrete case, that an executive officer did do it, it was absolutely proven, or at least the executive officer admitted it, would you cast your vote to discharge him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Again, Mr. Chairman, in justice to the official, I should feel that it would not be appropriate for me to pass judgment in advance of knowing all of the facts and the circumstances surrounding such an instance. But I should say unhesitatingly I should always use my fullest influence against a practice of that kind, because I believe that it is harmful and wrong in every way.

Chairman WALSH. But I am asking now, if the officer admitted that he did do it—I am not saying any specific officer—would you cast your vote as a director to discharge him, or would you just tell him that you utterly abhor such a practice and allow him to go on through to the next election?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My course would have to be governed, Mr. Chairman, by the facts as they developed, as considered in all their aspects, and I should use my influence always in every way to prevent that kind of practice.

Mr. WALSH. Do you care to state, specifically, Mr. Rockefeller, whether or not if an executive officer admitted that in order to influence the officers after they were elected, as an officer of your company, he took part in an election, used money and used influence, and that he admitted it, admitted it to you, would you, in that event, cast your vote to discharge the officer from the employment of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think, without question, that any man who would do a dishonest act in one situation would do it in another. I would not want him associated with me.

Chairman WALSH. Then do you mean by that, that your disinclination to have him associated with you would go so far as for you to cast your vote as a director to discharge him from the service of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I should want to use all the influence I had to separate such a person from the corporation with which I was related. I would want to use my influence as far as possible to separate such a person from the management of the corporation in which I was interested.

Chairman WALSH. Then I take it you would discharge him as the first step?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should assume that would be one of the steps, Mr. Chairman. I would not like to describe just what the course would be, but I certainly would not want to have him associated in the conduct of the business I was interested in or responsible for.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. Now, what other process of separation would there be, aside from the discharge from the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. I read you a list yesterday of personal injuries and deaths of employees in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and the amounts that were paid to the injured persons or their survivors. Now, that was the list, I might inform you, that was furnished by the president of your company in Colorado; and it contained the names or the cases of the last 25 persons killed or injured, running back from November 25, 1914, and the amount that the companies paid them. I just state them for your information, to begin with. Are you aware of the fact there has been no verdict rendered in a case of an injured person or the survivors of a dead workman killed in your industry for the past 23 years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not.

Chairman WALSH. In Huerfano County, has your attention ever been called to that fact, if it is a fact?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. Would you believe, if such was the fact, and if the company did exercise an influence in elections, that there was a connection between those two conditions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think I know enough of the situation to know, Mr. Chairman. But I can not too strongly express my view as utterly deploring and being opposed to anything that subverts or is antagonistic to or destructive of the full expression of the principle of democratic government. You have desired me to answer in specific cases. I have not wanted to avoid such answers, but I want you to understand me that my attitude is abhorrent to that sort of thing, and my influence would always be exercised against it.

Chairman WALSH. Have you received letters from time to time, communications from injured persons, complaining against disability to receive compensation or to receive justice?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall any such letter from any such person.

Chairman WALSH. I read you a letter, handed me by Mr. Manly, of January 17, 1915, as follows:

"Your letter of the 14th received, and I will endeavor to answer your questions.

"I first went to work for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. August 4, 1903, as a roll hand in the rod-mill department. While working in this department, I received my first injury, on August 29, 1903. While cutting off a bar a piece flew from the hot rod and bounced back, striking me in the right eye, splitting the eyeball, with several minor burns. The result—blind in my right eye and disfigured for life. After I recovered John Y. Brooks, the superintendent in charge at the time, told me I would have a lifelong position with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

"The next injury I received was on August 15, 1906—a sprained right limb, caused by the company putting a wooden cover where there should have been an iron cover, over a grease box on a line shaft. I fell through this wood cover, my foot caught and twisted my leg. This injury resulted in a compound rupture of the ligaments and nerves, which is also incurable.

"The last injury I received was on the 21st of May, 1909. The company was at fault for putting an inexperienced man in a responsible position. Through his mistake I received a blow on the left knee from a hot rod, causing a broken cartilage in the knee. This knee bothers me greatly at times and will the rest of my life.

"After this injury I had to come home to my people in this city. After recovering enough to do some light work, I tried to go back to the Colorado Fuel & Iron to work, but they had no work for me. Then I wrote to the claim agent in Denver, but through moving around I lost his letter. I am sorry, as I would like very much to send it to you. He told me the Colorado Fuel & Iron could do nothing for me and sent me his deepest sympathy. Then I tried to in many ways get a personal interview with John D. Rockefeller, sr., but always failed. Then I wrote on two different occasions to Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., at 26 Broadway, New York, but received no answer. I finally wrote to William Jennings Bryan, Secretary of State, but received no reply. I then wrote to J. W. Bryan, Representative from Washington. I will send you his reply. I will also send you the only letter I received in regard to this and in answer to all I wrote. If through your influence you could get some compensation for the crippled and disabled condition I am in, I would surely appreciate it and perhaps will be able in the future to do something in return. I find it hard to find employment with any livable wages, for no one wants to have a cripple, and I have got to live and look out for my family, which comes very hard at times.

"Thanking you for the interest that you have shown, and hoping to hear from you in the near future, I remain,

"Respectfully, yours,

"W. J. DALTON,

"567 East One hundred and fifteenth Street, Cleveland, Ohio."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I ask to whom the letter is addressed?

Chairman WALSH. Well, it is addressed to Mr. Basil M. Manly, Mr. Dalton having written in and saying inasmuch as a hearing was to be had here he would like to call attention to his own condition. It is one of the many letters received by Mr. Manly, and he answered the letter and asked him to give his statement in order to ascertain, if possible, what knowledge you gentlemen had of the conditions and what responsibilities you felt therefor. Now, this is the letter he refers to as the only letter that he received:

FOREST HILL,

Cleveland, Ohio, June 24, 1912.

DEAR SIR: Answering yours of recent date addressed to Mr. Rockefeller, we regret, but as Mr. Rockefeller is here simply for rest and recreation he makes no appointments to take up business matters.

Mr. Rockefeller does not personally consider questions of business or benevolence, having left these matters to his committee at No. 26 Broadway, New York, since his retirement some 10 or 15 years ago.

Very truly, yours,

HARRY D. SIMS, Secretary.

You don't recall receiving the letter from Mr. Dalton or any other letters of a similar nature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Would you be kind enough at the noon recess to ask whoever may have charge of the correspondence to produce any correspondence that may be with Mr. Dalton in your files?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I have the name in full, please?

Chairman WALSH. William J. Dalton, 567 East One hundred and fifteenth Street, Cleveland, Ohio. The letter from Mr. Harry D. Sims, secretary, is dated June 24, 1912.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. William J. Dalton, 567 One hundred and fifteenth Street, Cleveland, Ohio.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; Cleveland, Ohio.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. And the date of the other letter?

Chairman WALSH. The date of the other letter of Mr. Sims in reply to Mr. Dalton's letter is June 24.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. And Mr. Dalton's letter is of what date?

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Dalton's letter is not here; the only letter quoted was the letter signed Mr. Harry D. Sims, secretary.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I thought you read a letter of Mr. Dalton to Mr. Manly.

Chairman WALSH. Yes—that I gave to you, but I am asking you to have here the correspondence that may be in your file.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Whether we received any letter from Mr. Dalton?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and any correspondence had with Mr. Dalton or your secretaries may have had with him.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would be interesting to know what replies Mr. Dalton has received from Mr. Bryan and other people.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, you have that address, Mr. Rockefeller, and Mr. Dalton is a gentleman that seems to express himself very clearly, and if you drop a note to Mr. Dalton he would undoubtedly let you know. We have no such replies. So I have no doubt that Mr. Dalton would give you further information, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; thank you.

Chairman WALSH. Do the superintendents of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. dictate the selections of school-teachers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it would be proper for an industrial corporation engaged in an industry for profit to do that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it would be most unfortunate.

Chairman WALSH. Do you, as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., have your attention called to the general orders issued by the executive heads of the corporation in Colorado and posted at its mines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not. I think that is not customary in any organization of the kind.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it ought to be customary to know at least the general orders that are issued in writing by the superintendents and other executive heads touching upon the relations of the company with its employees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be highly desirable, Mr. Chairman, if it were possible.

Chairman WALSH. Just one question before I get to that educational proposition. You made statements as to your lack of knowledge as to certain conditions yesterday on account of being pressed with other matters. Have you ever estimated the amount of time that it would take, and effort, to inform yourself fully as to all these conditions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not had the time to make that estimate, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. In a general way, please describe how you are occupied—how your time is occupied.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I described in a general way yesterday, Mr. Chairman, that I devoted a considerable portion of my time to directing, with others, the interests of the several foundations which my father has established and in giving time to questions of investment.

Chairman WALSH. How much time would you say of your day is devoted to the foundation work?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is so utterly irregular, Mr. Chairman, that it would be difficult to say. I do not have an hour for this and an hour for that. Sometimes I give a whole day to the matters of the foundations and sometimes I do not give any time to them.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever considered the question of delegating to some other body or department the duty of taking care either of the finances or investments so that your attention might be turned directly on to the affairs of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., so far as the conditions of the workers in the industry are concerned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have never thought of it just in that light, namely, the giving up of all the other interests which have seemed to come to me to look out for and devote myself solely to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. How many directors' meetings of the three companies that you have mentioned would you say you have attended during the past year?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I said, the Manhattan Railroad Co., I think, has a quarterly directors' meeting. I think I have attended in the last year two, anyhow, and perhaps three of those meetings.

Chairman WALSH. How long did it take?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, as I said before, the duties of the directors are simply to see that the conditions of the lease are properly complied with, so that the meeting is not usually a long meeting. It is a question of reading the minutes of the last meeting and considering any detailed business that may come up. I suppose 15 or 20 minutes or half an hour.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what other companies—the insurance company you mentioned—how many meetings of the directors of that company did you attend during 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I couldn't state, but I presume I have attended at least half of them, and they are held monthly.

Chairman WALSH. And about how long do those meetings last?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I should think half an hour would cover the usual meeting.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The meetings of the directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., as I stated yesterday, have been held in Colorado for a number of years past. Therefore I have attended none of those meetings.

Chairman WALSH. On the question of what might be called the general condition of the workers in the industry in Colorado, do you believe that you could get reports touching upon all of these subjects and consider them, say—go over them—say, within the week of the meeting of the board of directors, if it was held continuously that long?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, I would suppose so.

Chairman WALSH. Did you hear Mr. Ford testify when on the stand?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was not so fortunate.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read his testimony?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have just skimmed it.

Chairman WALSH. How many men, when you are running full time—how many workers are engaged in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I could not state that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately how many?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. A number of thousand.

Chairman WALSH. Running normally and free-handed, I believe Mr. Welborn stated that there were about 15,000 employed in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. alone, or generally in the industry?

Chairman WALSH. In the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., my recollection is, and Mr. Manly's, I may be wrong about that, however, Mr. Rockefeller—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). Well, I could not give you that, because I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. I think the estimate is 6,000 in the mines and the balance scattered. Could you say within several thousand how many employees there are in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I would not know, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Where are the properties of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. located that are being worked at the present time—how many States?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean coal properties?

Chairman WALSH. Any properties of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.—coal properties, blast furnaces, or anything of the sort.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The coal properties, so far as I know, are in the State of Colorado. The blast furnaces are at Pueblo. The iron property to which you referred yesterday is in Wyoming. I think there is some ownership in an iron property in Utah, though I am not sure.

Chairman WALSH. Is it being worked at the present time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Well, the suggestion was made by Mr. Ford here that he not only conducted the operations of that business, but that he had a department of that business that even went so far as to find out how the men lived after they left the industry, and that there were 18,000 engaged in the industry, scattered all over the world. Did you read that, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Could a department be established under the board of directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in the city of New York that would keep you thoroughly apprised of all conditions affecting your employees, whether at work in your mines, or as they might be affected by the social activities which you say you are compelled to undertake, such as the furnishing of schoolhouses and the like and the commissary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be entirely possible. May I point out, Mr. Chairman, now that you have spoken of Mr. Ford, just this thing: I think Mr. Ford's testimony revealed the fact that his company was making a great many millions of dollars a year in profits in addition to the wages paid and the moneys put back into the business. Of course, it would be possible, in entire justice to the stockholders, to develop a very extensive sociological department at a high cost with such very satisfactory profits. I think you will agree that in the case of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., where the common-stock holders have had no return—well, for 12 or 14 years; I don't know when they ever did have a return—that the officers, in justice to the stockholders as well as to the employees, must not increase the expenses of departments, however desirable, any more than is absolutely necessary. I think that is a fact which is proper to be considered in connection with comparing the two companies.

Chairman WALSH. But when they undertake to indulge in these enterprises of a social nature that you have mentioned, growing out of the necessities on account of the isolation of the industry, would you not say that so far as the workers were concerned they should discharge that duty with understanding and with justice, and that what you said yesterday would apply to that situation—that unless the well-being of the worker be taken care of the industry should be abandoned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It may come to that with this industry. We can not go on indefinitely without profits. The stockholders would naturally want to withdraw their money. It may come to that. It will be a question, probably, whether the workers would prefer that the industry be closed.

Chairman WALSH. My question was, Was that one of the duties that you would feel ought to be discharged if the industry was to go on?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Why, certainly, Mr. Chairman; and that is what the officers are trying to do, so far as I understand it. They may not be doing all that they should do or doing it in the best way. Few of us are; but that they are trying, I certainly think is clear. And the alternative would be as to whether they should disregard that duty entirely and provide no such facilities. For myself, as a director—I was saying, Mr. Chairman, that perhaps the alternative should be that the officers should abandon the effort to provide these facilities to which you refer; but for myself I, as a director, would feel that it was better to perform and deal with those obligations fairly well than not to deal with them at all. Of course, the ideal thing would be to deal with them in the very best and most satisfactory way.

Chairman WALSH. What effort have you made personally to reach the ideal which you have expressed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, that is a matter which we have left to the executive officers, and I can only believe that according to the opportunity and ability which they have they are undertaking to discharge that important responsibility.

Chairman WALSH. Am I to take from that that that matter having been left to the executive officers that you have made no effort toward reaching that ideal, so far as your personal effort is concerned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not supposed that a director could take up on the ground and undertake personally to direct such matters. But now that this and other matters of a similar nature have been specifically called to my attention through the courtesy of the commission, they are matters which I shall very naturally take up with great care as the opportunity presents itself.

Chairman WALSH. Were there matters brought out and called to your attention by this commission that were not brought out to your attention by the investigation by the committee of Congress?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have never read the full testimony of that investigation, Mr. Chairman, which is exceedingly voluminous.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the accounts of it published in the New York newspapers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Only just as I say—the headlines, and that sort of thing.

Chairman WALSH. In your office have you a branch of your publicity department which collects the clippings from newspapers touching on matters affecting your industries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean all industry?

Chairman WALSH. Your industries.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Are you speaking in the plural or referring to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Chairman WALSH. I say your industries; that would include others as well as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; we have not had such a bureau.

Chairman WALSH. But you have a department in your office which takes the clippings covering what things might be in the newspapers regarding the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the Colorado situation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Since the strike came on and since the events which developed out of that have occurred I have myself in reading the papers, whenever I have seen anything that had a direct bearing, made it a point to have such items cut out and kept.

Chairman WALSH. You say you did not read the congressional record or transcript of the evidence taken by the congressional committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. And did you read the details published in the New York newspapers concerning the alleged testimony brought out?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was such a mass of matter that came out in the papers and other publications at that time that I did not undertake to read it all.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the headlines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did; I read the morning and evening papers. Other than that I did not. I did not undertake to read it all.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the headlines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did, as I read the morning and evening papers. Other than that I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not read anything but the headlines about the matters that took place in Colorado as brought out in the hearing of the Committee on Mines and Mining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You asked me if I had read the testimony or comments on the testimony. I have not read them.

Chairman WALSH. Do you read the editorial notes in the newspapers in regard to matters growing out of dealings of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. with its employees, and what might be called the Colorado situation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not take all the papers with that in view; but the papers I do currently read. I read the editorials, and am apt, of course, to see them.

Chairman WALSH. What papers do you currently read?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is rather an embarrassing question to ask me in the presence of the fraternity of the press.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I don't think that these gentlemen—that it will make much difference to them. Just go ahead and tell us.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, with apologies to them, I will say that I usually read the Times in the morning and the Sun and the Post in the evening.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. E. H. Weitzel is the general superintendent of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is the general superintendent of the coal department of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.

Chairman WALSH. Of the coal department. Was your attention ever called to a general letter issued by him to all superintendents dated July 2, 1912, notifying them in their capacities as superintendents and school directors that one Walter Merritt had been appointed supervisor to camp schools, and requesting all superintendents to send the names of the applicants for school-teachers to Mr. Merritt, and that in future the selection of teachers should be taken up with Mr. Merritt before any selection is made?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I never heard of that letter.

Chairman WALSH. You never heard of that? If it were true, would you, in your capacity as a director, take action in accordance with your views on that subject as expressed a few moments ago?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I just say this, Mr. Chairman, to make that situation a little clearer? I don't know whether the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in any of its more isolated mines supports a school-teacher or not. If it does, I should think that the officers of the company would naturally be responsible for the selection of the incumbent of that position. Now, in so far as that might be the condition, I would say that they were entirely justified in so doing.

In a community where the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. did not support such a teacher, and where it made no contribution toward the support of the teacher, I should think the company as a company should naturally not have anything to do with the selection of the teacher. But it may very possibly be that the officials of the company in that community would have responsibilities as citizens which might lead them to make suggestions in such matters. I am speaking in a hypothetical way, because I do not know the facts.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that an industrial company engaged in business for profit alone under any pretext should select the teachers for the children of the employees of that company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My previous answer was intended to cover that, Mr. Chairman. If it was in an isolated community of which the company owned all the property and the inhabitants of which were all employees of the company, and there was no one else to supply the teacher and there would be no teacher unless the company paid the teacher, I should think it was not only proper but the duty of the company to select its teacher and to have its local officials use their best judgment in making the selection. I do not see how else a teacher could be provided.

Chairman WALSH. Then you do believe that an exigency might arise in which an industrial company, organized for profit, might provide all of the school-teachers, following your logic, for all of the children of the workers in that industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If it were true, following the logic, that every town in which the workers of the industry lived was inhabited solely by those workers, and there was no machinery of the town or money of the town to supply the teachers, that would be true. The alternative, Mr. Chairman, would be—it seems to me that the alternative would be to have no schools; and as between the two, without knowing definitely the conditions, I should think it was better to have a school even under the management of the company.

Chairman WALSH. I do not exactly understand what you mean, that there is no money in the town. There is no money, of course, except as raised by taxation for public purposes, but why should not there be any money in one of your towns or camps any more than in any other villages?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What I meant by that was that a small community in an isolated part of the community, where just workers gathered—50 or 100 or 200 of them—might not have so developed as a social community that it could supply the things which it would much profit by and which it would be desirable for it to have.

Chairman WALSH. Why should not there be money in a town where there are workers? Isn't that the way money should come?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not saying why there should not be. I am saying if there was not.

Chairman WALSH. Is that true in any of your towns in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. You are aware, are you not, that the towns we speak of—all of your camps—had much more than 50 or a hundred people in them?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not aware of the population of those camps. May I just say on this point, Mr. Chairman, that it is not the province of an industrial corporation to run schools and churches. It is not a line of activity that a corporation would naturally choose; but I ask, Is it not better, if they can not be provided in some other way, for them to be so provided? And, of course, the officers simply use their judgment in a matter of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you say you read all the bulletins written by Mr. Lee after they were published?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I saw them all, and I very probably did read them; but I would not make that definite statement, because I don't recall.

Chairman WALSH. And they were assuming or undertaking to publish what you called the facts concerning the struggle in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was not undertaking to publish them, Mr. Chairman. The coal operators in Colorado were so undertaking, and I was glad to be of any service in helping them to find a person to assist in that matter.

Chairman WALSH. But you were furnishing the writer to publish them and undertaking to pay him if the operators did not pay him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was glad to render any assistance in my power to make public what seemed to me an important thing in the public interest.

Chairman WALSH. Did you notice that Mr. Lee, in his bulletin, referred in many places to what he called the obnoxious and tyrannical check-off system—that is, the system of deducting the union dues and fines before the men received their pay, and that that was fundamentally wrong?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If you will allow me, Mr. Chairman, that the situation with reference to Mr. Lee may not be misunderstood, may I say that Mr. Lee was not responsible for the bulletins? He acted in preparing, in getting together the data, which was published in every instance over the signatures of the operators' committee, individually or collectively, the full responsibility for which was taken by the operators' committee, individually and collectively. I simply wanted to make that statement so that Mr. Lee's relationship may not be misunderstood. May I ask you to repeat the question you put in connection with the matter?

Chairman WALSH. Did you read what was written in the bulletin containing the alleged facts concerning Colorado, where it was stated in a number of instances that the check-off system was obnoxious and tyrannical, the check-off system being the custom of deducting the union dues from the salaries of the workmen and paying them over to the union?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't recall seeing that in the bulletins, but I very probably did.

Chairman WALSH. You are acquainted with the system?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have heard the system described.

Chairman WALSH. And the characterization of the system, as described in the bulletin by the committee of operators, meets with your approval, does it—that it is tyrannical and obnoxious?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was a statement made by the coal operators, who knew the facts in the case.

Chairman WALSH. What do you think about it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not in a position to say. I am not in possession of the facts in the case; I do not feel that I could express any opinion that would be of any value on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not feel any personal responsibility for the alleged facts and characterization of men, motives, and things in this bulletin, due to the fact that the money for actually writing the same was paid by your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I assume no such responsibility, Mr. Chairman, but so far as the point is concerned, without knowing anything about the facts, I should think that any company would somewhat hesitate to deduct from the wages of its men in the interest of some other institution. Just a passing observation. I do not know anything about the facts.

Chairman WALSH. Why? Why would they hesitate if a man agreed that it should be deducted from his wages?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I do not know why they should take it upon themselves to make payments on his behalf, but then it is a matter I ought not perhaps to have introduced myself, because I do not feel competent to discuss it.

Chairman WALSH. Were you aware of the fact, or are you aware of the fact that the Colorado Supply Co. has such deductions made from the wages of the men covering bills at their stores?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not familiar with the details of the management.

Chairman WALSH. Were you familiar with the fact that by that system deductions of money to pay for the conduct of the hospitals for your company is raised?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not familiar with that.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the fact that in some of those camps the water is sold to the inhabitants, to the workers, and that where water is sold to them the money is collected by the check-off system, by deducting it from the wages?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no knowledge of that, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever seen what is called a check that is given to the workmen in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., showing his earnings and what amounts may be taken from them?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. By the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Manly has just handed me a check of this Mr. W. J. Dalton, who sent them in with his letter, and suggested it be offered in the record and turned over to you. I see that first a blank is left for the work, the number of tons and the amount earned; then there is a space left and a memoranda for the following deductions: Brass check, hospital, company, rent, labor advances, coal, store, insurance, time check, with a place for the total deductions. Do you believe that a corporation is justified in maintaining what is mentioned in the law and known in industry as a blacklist?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Would you define that Mr. Chairman, so that I may understand it?

Chairman WALSH. I will define it to be a list of men that for certain reasons are considered undesirable, and that list kept open to the inspection, or at least open to the access, of other companies that might also be employing labor.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a matter that I never have had any knowledge of. I should think that every company would need to take proper means to see that men who had not proved efficient, or for some reason were undesirable in that company, were not reemployed in its other departments.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that the list should be sent to other companies that might wish to employ labor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Personally, I should say no.

Chairman WALSH. Is such a list maintained by any of the industries—companies, being those in which you are a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I know of, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that a man otherwise—a man who is perfectly law-abiding and a good citizen should be discharged from an employment on account of the views he held on the labor question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think every man is entitled to hold such views as he sees fit as long as he does not interfere with similar rights on the part of his collaborators and associates.

Chairman WALSH. Has the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. a form card for new employees that has a place for their name, description, and views on the labor question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask you a few specific, general questions not applied to your views; probably ask you to analyze them a little deeper, as given upon yesterday. Do you believe in the principle of democracy in political government? That is, the principle that citizens should be allowed to have a compelling voice in determining the governmental conditions that affect their lives?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Most certainly I do.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe this same principle should be applied to the organization of industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. To questions of industry? I don't quite get the point.

Chairman WALSH. You believe in the principle of democracy in political government—namely, that citizens should have a compelling voice in determining the conditions that affect their lives—you say that you do?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I say, do you believe in that same principle in its application to the organization of industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do most heartily so far as it does not come in conflict with other interests—the same as any political situation must be regarded.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that the employing interests can be trusted to safeguard voluntarily at all times the interests and rights of workingmen in their industries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is highly desirable that the laborers—the workers should be participants in the consideration of all questions pertaining to their living and working conditions, wages, and so forth, and my view along that line is indicated in my having suggested to the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. officers some months since that steps be taken to develop such machinery. I heartily approve of it.

Chairman WALSH. My question was, do you believe that the employing interests can be trusted to safeguard voluntarily at all times the interests and rights of the men?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think, Mr. Chairman, that the employees should have a voice.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you the question again. I do not wish to be persistent, but I will ask the question once more. Do you believe the employing interests can be trusted to safeguard voluntarily at all times the interests and rights of the workingmen?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think anything which helps them in doing that is always desirable.

Chairman WALSH. Is that all you care to say in answer to that question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am trying to make my thought just as clear as I can.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps I will depart from the rule which I have laid down, and ask it once more. I will ask you whether you can answer it yes or no—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). Mr. Chairman, I have not given extensive thought to a great many of these general basic questions you are discussing, and while I have expressed my general views, it would seem hardly fit for me to try to make pronouncements on certain principles that I have not considered with full care and thought. It is not that I am desirous at all of evading or avoiding any of your questions. I am trying to give my views and at the same time not express opinions on matters which I have not carefully and fully gone into. My opinion, thus expressed, would be of no value to you, I fancy.

Chairman WALSH. Very well, then I will ask you the question and ask you please to answer it yes or no, or say that you do not care to do so. Do you believe that the employing interests can be trusted to safeguard voluntarily at all time the interests and rights of the working men?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should be glad to answer it directly, but I can not and express my views.

Chairman WALSH. I will proceed then to another question. Without an organization of workmen, equipped to make its demands effective, when these demands are just, what recourse has the individual workmen against injustice?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Your question is a broad question that I have—that I am not sufficiently familiar with to make a pronouncement on. It would be very simple for me to say yes or no to any of these questions, but I have assumed that you wish me to express views only where I have them and do not want me to answer carelessly or make expressions which are not backed up with careful thought.

Chairman WALSH. Certainly not. So far as I am concerned, I shall be content with your statement that you do not care to answer those or that you have no views or answer in any way you wish to make answer. I would not indicate by a question any end that might be desired in an answer, but necessarily some of these questions are asked in a very leading form.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am anxious to give my views on any questions asked, where I have them, but where I have not formulated such views I do not suppose the commission would care to have me make an expression.

Chairman WALSH. No; and if you should ask me for a suggestion, I would suggest that you answer the questions yes or no, or state that you have no views on the subject or do not care to give them.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not formulated views on the subject; and I shall be glad to act on your suggestions.

Chairman WALSH. Is the individual workman with a family able usually to choose the place and character of his employment?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not always. If he has got a family, it is much more difficult for him to choose. It would also depend on his wages whether he could move from one place to another.

Chairman WALSH. It was stated in Colorado by a gentleman at the head of a large industry, and I will say that it is not yours, that the way the subject should be dealt with was the way that the sale of ordinary matters of commerce is conducted; that is, if a man went into a store to buy goods—a retail store—and was not satisfied with the prices and conditions of the sale, that he might retire. Likewise, that a workman could go into a place and ask for work and if he was not satisfied with the terms and conditions, that he could likewise retire. Am I to take it that you see a difference in those two situations, and that especially in the development of modern industry in a large and concentrated form, such as you have to-day, that the workman does approximately choose the conditions of his employment?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think very frequently he would be unable to do so.

Chairman WALSH. And could not a political monarchy or despotism be justified logically on that ground that those persons who objected to that form of government could move elsewhere? [No answer.] In the development of modern industry and in our present economic condition is that not impossible for the employee in seeking employment?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Frequently he can and frequently he can not.

Now, will you please put the other question again?

Chairman WALSH. Will the reporter please read that question?

The REPORTER (reading):

"And could not a political monarchy or despotism be justified logically on that ground that those persons who objected to that form of government could move elsewhere?"

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not studied the question of government sufficiently to allow me to answer that question intelligently.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you stated that you were in favor of collective bargaining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did.

Chairman WALSH. Unless collective bargaining in some form is had the employee is at the absolute mercy of his employer, is he not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not be able to pass an opinion there. I should think his influence was much stronger when he was able to bargain with his fellows.

Chairman WALSH. You would not be able to pass an opinion on that, for what reason?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know all of the circumstances that might develop. For instance, there might be a company where, as frequently happens, the question of wages is taken care of in an entirely satisfactory and appropriate way without the intervention of the workers.

Chairman WALSH. That would be a case of the employer being just and kind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. But if the employer was not just and kind, what I say is the employee is at the mercy—I don't suggest that he extends it in a beneficent way, but he would be at the mercy of the employer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think he would.

Chairman WALSH. You read that also, did you not, in the examination of Mr. Welborn, who has the first-hand touch with your industry in Colorado—your president—did you read that part of his testimony where he stated that the employees were at the mercy of the employers where there was not collective bargaining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall the passage in his letter to you of August 20, 1914, where he stated:

"So far as we know there was in our employ at the time of the strike but one superintendent who was unnecessarily arbitrary or severe with his men. He had shown a disposition, as well as an ability, to improve and because of his general fitness in other directions was retained in our service until very recently."

Would you not consider that a concrete illustration of the potential power for injustice in the hands of a company, such as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., where there was no organization?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would illustrate the possibility.

Chairman WALSH. It would be a concrete case, would it not, where your superintendent writes there was a man unnecessarily arbitrary and severe but had other qualities which made it wise to retain him in your employ?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. And I think if this present system that is now in vogue in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. was then in vogue that man would have been discovered sooner. I think it is desirable that such a man should not exist.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that a committee of employers, such as suggested by Mr. W. L. Mackenzie King, Mr. Starr J. Murphy, and Mr. Welborn, would be sufficient to safeguard the welfare of the men without some organization of the men behind it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of that I can not speak. The plan which had been entered into by the men and the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. is in effect an organization, I assume. How satisfactorily it will work, what additional features may be added as time goes on, I do not know; but I feel that the management, and I know that the directors, are anxious to proceed in developing the plan as rapidly as the conditions at the different places may so suggest.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that organized labor can act effectively unless it has funds and is in a position to call a strike as a last resort, with the support of a national organization?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it ought to be, that it ought to be effective.

Chairman WALSH. Without having a national organization behind it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not see why it could not. It seems to me that such an organization ought to entirely do away with the ill will which arises so often simply because there is no opportunity to come in contact—to have contact between the employee and the officers of the company.

Chairman WALSH. I will read Mr. Welborn's views upon collective bargaining and ascertain if you will be kind enough to state whether or not they contain what might be called your definition of the term "collective bargaining." Mr. Welborn testified before this commission as follows: "I think if two or three men go to a superintendent or manager with suggestions or grievances, whatever you may call them, that are not wholly individual, that in a way represents collective bargaining." Would you consider that an exercise of the principle of collective bargaining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I have not undertaken to define the principle of collective bargaining. I mentioned it in my paper as one of the things which labor organizations undertake to promote in the interests of labor. Just what its definition is, what varieties of it there are, I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. I see in your statement that you favor collective bargaining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not put it that way. I said I favored the organization of men. I did not venture to suggest what organization, because I feel myself unable, from lack of knowledge of those matters, to suggest, but whatever organization would properly safeguard their interests, as I went on to describe. I did not make any statement as to my own view, because I had none on collective bargaining as one of the things which the organization of labor often takes on.

Chairman WALSH. What did you mean by the expression "collective bargaining" as contained in the statement which you made to the commission on yesterday?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I meant simply in a general way, a bargaining of employees together. I had not thought it out to have in mind any general plan. I am simply familiar with the general form of collective bargaining, which means, in my mind, the employees in groups or masses bargaining together.

Chairman WALSH. I notice that Mr. Welborn wrote to Mr. Starr J. Murphy, under date of October 9, as follows—October 9, 1914, as follows:

"There are some mines at which undoubtedly our managers could select three miners who would be glad and could be safely depended upon to assume the responsibility suggested by you and would in every sense of the word be safe. In considering this forward work, which I feel we must certainly keep in mind, I am impressed with the importance of so composing whatever committees are found advisable as to make it appear that they all represent the same interest. In other words, that there is but one interest which is in every sense of the word common yet having it understood that the committee is as free to consider any complaints or grievances of the men as though it were one entirely of their own selection."

Would you call that the principle of collective bargaining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am not undertaking to describe that principle, because I do not feel competent to. But the fact is that Mr. Welborn's own view has developed since the writing of that letter and a more extensive plan has appealed to him as a wiser thing than the plan he outlined, which other and more extensive plan he has adopted. When I say "other" I mean the plan in which the representatives of the men were not appointed by the company as there outlined, but the men in each mine were invited to meet in mass meeting as stated in the circular which I quoted here yesterday, no superintendents or pit bosses being present, and then elect by ballot their representatives.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say is the substance of the principle of collective bargaining?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not be able to describe it, Mr. Chairman. I have not dealt with the question sufficiently.

Chairman WALSH. Is there a claimed right existing in society to do upon the part of the workers that which they designate the rights of collective bargaining, to your knowledge?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I hear that term used, but I am not able to define it.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of collective bargaining did you have in mind, Mr. Rockefeller, when you wrote this statement which was submitted to the commission yesterday?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Simply the general thought, which I have already undertaken to express, that it means bargaining by men in larger or smaller groups. I had not attempted to formulate an idea. I was not trying to discuss collective bargaining, but simply mentioned it in that paper as one of the methods which the organizations of labor adopted.

Chairman WALSH. I will read you an extract first. Do you think—I will ask you this: Do you think it would be proper for any person acting on behalf of the Rockefeller Foundation to undertake, by influence or suggestion, to determine labor supply in a particular industry such as in Colorado, to determine the policies of your company as to labor supply in an industry such as the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There has never been any disposition on the part of the directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., so far as they are any of them related as individuals, to the foundation, to formulate labor policies.

Chairman WALSH. Would it be proper for any man to be paid out of the funds of the foundation to do work for the foundation and undertake to lay down the rules which govern the labor supply in a particular private industry in which a large amount of stocks and bonds were owned by those whom you represent?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There would be no disposition. There is no connection between the Rockefeller Foundation and the labor policies of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., or either I do not get the point.

Chairman WALSH. I will read you an extract from a letter of McKenzie King, of whom you have spoken, dated August 11, as follows:

"In certain industries it is going to be easier on account of the war in Europe"—

As he had explained earlier in the letter—
"to find all the laborers they desire and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Recognition simply for the sake of recognition is going to be seen to be less pressing as an immediate end than that of maintaining standards already existing."

Do you recall that statement?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would appreciate it, Mr. Chairman, if you would read the whole letter so as to make the matter so much fresher in my mind.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. I will read the whole letter and then go back and take up certain portions.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Thank you.

Chairman WALSH. It is dated the 11th of August. I will ask you a preliminary question, too. Mr. McKenzie King is employed by the foundation; is he?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. McKenzie King is employed by the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. And his compensation is paid out of the income from the hundred millions of dollars given by your father to the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. And he is not an adviser of your company in the investments; he is not on the general staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not.

Chairman WALSH. Or on the general staff of your father, and he has no connection with any corporation in which you are interested, to your knowledge?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He has not.

Chairman WALSH. Now the question at issue, you have stated, in Colorado, was recognition of the union; was it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is what I understand.

Chairman WALSH. And the substance of the strike, so far as its outcome was concerned, as between you and your employees, was the question alone of labor supply, wasn't it; getting the men to operate your mines peacefully?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The question of the recognition of the union, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I know that was the question, you say, of contention between you. But the result, the only result interesting to you after that was stated was the continued peaceful operation of your mines?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is what we want, the continued peaceful operation.

Chairman WALSH. That is what you want, and that outcome, of course, depended upon the labor supply—is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has never been difficult to get all the labor that has been needed, Mr. Chairman, in spite of conditions. The unfortunate situation now is that the companies are not able, as I am advised, to employ all of the men who formerly worked for them, or whom otherwise they would be glad to take back, because the business conditions are such as not to justify the running of the mines at full capacity.

Chairman WALSH. And the only thing after the contention arose was the labor supply to operate the mines peacefully, was it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Will you ask that once more, please? I did not get the point of the question.

Chairman WALSH. You had a falling out, as I understand, and a strike was called by the United Mine Workers of America in your Colorado mines. You have stated that the point of difference between the employees that went upon the strike, represented by the officers of the United Mine Workers, was the right of recognition of that union?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is what I understand.

Chairman WALSH. That is what you understand the condition was? After the contention arose it was your desire to be permitted peacefully, as I understand you to say, to operate your mines to the capacity which the situation of the trade demanded?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is always our desire.

Chairman WALSH. Well, it was in that instance?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Certainly; it was not changed.

Chairman WALSH. So that the only thing you needed to operate your mines were the employees necessary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. We needed peaceful conditions under which they could work.

Chairman WALSH. I said that to operate your mines in peace.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Naturally the men would have to operate your mines in peace?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Peace and employees are the two necessary factors.

Chairman WALSH. So that the final consideration was simply one of labor supply?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, of course, you have to have the demand for the output as well as the labor supply.

Chairman WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As well as conditions which permit that.

Chairman WALSH. I stated specifically in my question that labor supply necessary to produce what was demanded by the trade?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; it was necessary to have peaceful conditions and labor.

Chairman WALSH. And labor supply. So that was in its last analysis merely a question of labor supply, so far as operating the mines is concerned, after the contention arose?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. After peaceful conditions were maintained, certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Well, of course, we are assuming peaceful conditions in all of our questions.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. But through the strike—we can not assume—

Chairman WALSH. All right, if we can not agree on the phrasing of that. I am trying to make myself clear, and I do not seem to be able, so I will leave the subject.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am trying to give you the facts just as clearly as I can.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I think you are. You have so refined it under the question of words it is impossible for me to make it clear, so I will drop the question.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Only because during the time of the strike peaceful conditions did not exist, and it is difficult to divorce the two.

Chairman WALSH. Well, if it is satisfactory to you, I will drop the matter.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; certainly.

Chairman WALSH. And, perhaps, come back to it again when I get the letter of Mr. King. What responsibility do you feel as a director for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. on the question of violence of statute law, if any, by the executive officers in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I feel a responsibility in any corporation in which I am a director or a stockholder to use my full influence to prevent such violations by any officers.

Chairman WALSH. And if a law of the State was violated—and I will leave the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. out of the question for the moment—do you believe that it is the duty of a director upon ascertaining that to separate the violator of the law from the service of the company in which he is a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. On general principles, of course I do.

Chairman WALSH. On general principles. Well, as a matter of direct application, do you believe that if the attention of a director is called to the violation, a specific violation of the statute law by an executive officer, that he should at once take steps to get that man away from any connection with his company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think so, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed charges that were made by certain employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. with reference to the violation of the statute law of Colorado by the executive officers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Have I so observed?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Has any such thing been called to your attention?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the grievances of the employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. submitted to the governor of Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know whether I did or not, Mr. Chairman. I have read many of the statements that were made.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to the claim on the part of your employees that certain State laws of Colorado were persistently violated by the executive officers of that company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. Has your attention ever been called to the alleged fact that certain laws of the State of Colorado were violated by your executive officers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not.

Chairman WALSH. If your attention was called to any such occurrence or situation in the past in accordance with what you stated a few moments ago, would you proceed as a director to have that officer discharged?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That certainly would be my feeling, Mr. Chairman; but it might have occurred that a law had been violated without the officer knowing it. Therefore, I would not be justified in determining in advance what my action would be. I should want to know all the facts.

Chairman WALSH. If a law had been persistently violated by the officer himself, would you cast your vote to discharge him as a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I certainly would not want any officer to be connected with any company I was related to that was persistently violating the law, with his knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. Then, would you cast your vote as a director to discharge him if it was brought to your knowledge that he had violated the State law of the State?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If all the facts justified that belief, I should.

Chairman WALSH. You testified yesterday that as a director you were not responsible for the labor policies of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and also that you had not given enough thought and study to the issues involved to have an opinion. Last April you testified before the congressional committee at Washington as follows:

"Our interest in labor is so profound and we believe so sincerely that that interest demands that the camps shall be open camps that we expect to stand by the officers at any cost. It is not an accident that this is our position; it is a great principle."

You also testified:

"It is because of such a profound interest in those men and the workers that I expect to stand by the policy which has been outlined by the officers, which seems to me to be first, last, and always in the greatest interest of the employees of the company."

Why did you feel competent to take such a decided stand if, as you said yesterday, you had not given sufficient thought and study to labor problems to justify you in expressing an opinion to this commission as to the general issues between employer and employee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That testimony, Mr. Chairman, which you have just read, taken before the congressional committee, has been purposely unfairly construed as being a declaration on my part of warfare against the unions. Any such expression is, I think, entirely unjustified from the text and most contrary to my own feeling and belief. The opinion expressed there relates, to no extent at all, to the question of unionism as unionism. The point there was that the officials of the company had stated that if the principle of unionism was to be admitted in connection with the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., it would involve the discharge of all of the employees in the company who were not union men. On that principle of the right of every man to determine for himself whether he should join the union or not, I said what you have read. For I felt it was a principle of justice and of right that every man should be accorded freedom under the Constitution to determine whether or not he would work independently or with others. And I think that that principle is one which would meet with your own full accord and approval. But it is in no sense a declaration that my attitude was antagonistic to labor unions, because, as I have stated in my statement yesterday, and many times since, I firmly believe in the organization of labor.

Chairman WALSH. That is all the answer you care to make to my question?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes. I therefore see nothing inconsistent in the two statements. I have made this statement to show you the utter sincerity with which both were announced and the fact that both are in entire accord with my view as expressed before this body yesterday.

Chairman WALSH. Did you not depart from your rule of leaving the labor policies of the company to the local officers when Mr. Lee went to Colorado after his appointment on your father's staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Lee has not been to Colorado since his appointment on my father's staff.

Chairman WALSH. Hasn't he been to Colorado to aid in working for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. since his appointment?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He was only appointed on the 1st of January of this year.

Chairman WALSH. You make a distinction between his appointment on your father's general staff and this publicity work that he did for you. Whom did he do that for?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I stated yesterday, he did it for the officers, for the mine owners' committee and for my father.

Chairman WALSH. Who asked him to go to Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No one asked him to go to Colorado.

Chairman WALSH. I believe that you have testified that your father paid him for what he did in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Paid him for what he did in the interest of bringing about proper publicity on these general matters, both with reference to ourselves and our interests in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the general coal industry. It was a matter I felt was a public duty.

Chairman WALSH. I am asking you if it is not a fact, Mr. Rockefeller, in consideration—have you read the correspondence that was produced before our commission in Colorado covering your views and the views of your local officers with respect to labor conditions and the institution of some system of presenting the grievances of employees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I am familiar with the correspondence.

Chairman WALSH. Have you read it lately?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I read it shortly after it was brought out, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. You read the letter of President Welborn, so I will not read it again. You recall it, as to how he thought it might be done with three safe men who might be selected by the management to meet with the committee representing the employees; you have in mind that letter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have.

Chairman WALSH. Now, that was Mr. Welborn's plan for dealing with the laborer on October 9, 1914, was it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was the suggestion that he made at that time; that he had finally formulated any plan I have no evidence. You will note that that correspondence indicated the opinion that existed at the time on the part of the New York directors and the officers in Colorado. It was an opinion that was developing and forming.

Chairman WALSH. What brought Mr. Welborn, if you know, to change his opinion?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What brought him to change his opinion?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know. I hope that the more suggestions were made to him, the more he began to see the views of others were worthy of consideration.

Chairman WALSH. Suggestions made by whom?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I am the one that took the responsibility, feeling it my duty and even my province to make any suggestions to him as an officer of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe, then, that a suggestion coming from you as the representative of your father to Mr. Welborn would be acted upon beyond the peradventure of a doubt?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think his letter in reply indicates that is not true and would not be true unless his own judgment confirmed the suggestion, because his reply to my letter of August, setting forth the outline of the plan which Mr. King had prepared at my request, was to the effect that while generally he was in accord with such a plan, in his judgment it would not be wise to undertake to introduce any such machinery until the termination of the strike. After that time he would be anxious to take the matter up, and his judgment prevailed.

Chairman WALSH. And your committee is selected now by the manager taking "three safe men"?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman; as pointed out in my statement of yesterday morning, the company has no committee. The men have been asked at each camp to select in the mass meeting, at a meeting at which neither pit bosses nor managers shall be present, a man whom they choose by ballot to represent them, and in that manner 25 representatives—about 25 representatives—of the miners have been selected at the various camps, wholly and entirely by the men. Such men as the plan outlines, as I read yesterday, are to represent that group of miners in any conference which they may wish to suggest—in the taking up of any matters any of them may care to take up with the company's officers, or which the officers of the company may, in turn, care to take up with them. These men thus elected by ballot continue to represent the groups which elected them until such time as at the pleasure of each group the group shall determine to elect from their number some other man to represent them. The miners are the ones who alone and solely elect their representatives.

Chairman WALSH. That was the plan suggested by Mr. McKenzie King and sent by you to Mr. Welborn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is the plan adopted and which is now in force.

Chairman WALSH. Was it suggested to you, Mr. Rockefeller, I asked you, directly, by Mr. McKenzie King and by you sent to Mr. Welborn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That plan was never, in its present form, suggested by anyone. It was the outgrowth of suggestions made by Mr. McKenzie King, which I thought would be highly valuable to the company, and of other suggestions made by others of the directors. It was a composite plan and development, as all these things were considered together.

Chairman WALSH. You recognize the radical difference between that plan and the suggestion of Mr. Welborn in his letter of October 9, that the committee should consist of three safe men, appointed by the managers; you see the difference?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do.

Chairman WALSH. And this was the plan, generally speaking, you submitted to Mr. Welborn in your letter after conference with Mr. King?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Only generally speaking, because this plan does not cover all of the features. Some of its features that plan did not have. Only generally speaking.

Chairman WALSH. But if that is not the plan suggested in the letter to which you refer, you say you do see the radical difference between three safe men appointed by the managers and the election of their representatives in a more democratic way; that is, under the present plan?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is quite obvious.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Welborn changed his mind in some way, and that very radically, as to how these questions should be met?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think Mr. Welborn had ever finally made up his mind. I think Mr. Welborn's opinion was crystallizing the same as the opinions of the eastern directors were crystallizing. We were all working together in making suggestions which we hoped would result in something that would be to the advantage of the laboring conditions. I hope that has been the result, Mr. Chairman; time will tell.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you the question directly; do you believe that if you stated to Mr. Welborn that in your opinion the interests of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and the interests of its employees demanded that they should have democratic representation in presenting their grievances collectively that Mr. Welborn would be influenced by your suggestion?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He certainly would be influenced by the suggestion, but if it did not accord with his own opinions and views on the subject, he would certainly differ with me, and if he did not as a director I should not want to have him in that position, so far as I am concerned.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe then that as matters come up that would indicate that practices existed which were inimical to the welfare of your employees, that you should in that way make suggestions that might influence him, if you could show him that fair dealing and a just regard for the rights of the employees demanded it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is just what I want to do, make the suggestion. The other directors do likewise, and I am glad to get such suggestions and take them up with Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. Do you depend on governmental information, or information outside of your company, for these matters that occur, if they do occur, which interest the organization of which you are a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. On the contrary, Mr. Chairman, I had assumed that the commission would be glad to cooperate in any way it could to make suggestions along these lines.

Chairman WALSH. Is it your answer that you do not depend on commissions or outside agencies, but that you feel it is your personal duty as a director to ascertain conditions at first hand yourself?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not say at first hand, because I think that would be often entirely impossible.

Chairman WALSH. Leave out the first hand?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is the duty of every director to ascertain the conditions as far as he can, and if there are abuses, to right them.

Chairman WALSH. Without outside intervention?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. With or without, but to right them.

Chairman WALSH. Is it your belief that the company's new machinery for meeting its employees will be a success?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I can not express an opinion on that, because I do not think it is possible to prophesy. I have every reason to believe that it will immensely improve the situation, I so hope.

Chairman WALSH. Is it instituted upon the theory at least that there is but one interest in the industry, which is in every sense common?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was set forth in my statement of yesterday, that I believed every corporation should be regarded as including its stockholders, its directors, its officers, and its employees, and the interest of all four is one interest.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose that when a grievance—we will take the case of a grievance being submitted by the committee of three—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). May I ask what committee of three you refer to?

Chairman WALSH. The committee of three employees that would meet and confer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There is no such committee that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. What is the number of the committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Twenty-five.

Chairman WALSH. Would the whole 25 meet with your directors without selecting a smaller committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That would be a matter for the 25 and the officers to determine. I don't know whether they have worked out that point.

Chairman WALSH. Has the suggestion been made that a committee of three be appointed by the general committee in each mine?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I know of no further suggestions than those outlined in my statement.

Chairman WALSH. When was the plan instituted?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I have the date here. [Witness examines papers.] On January 5 a notice was posted in the mines with reference to the election I have spoken of. I go on to state that I have received from the president of the company a telegram notifying me that this general conference was held at Denver on the 19th instant, so that the final step in the plan so far as it has been worked out was taken in that meeting of the delegates of the men with the officers of the company in Denver on the 19th of January.

Chairman WALSH. So there has been no opportunity to receive any report of any progress up to this date?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You see that was the 19th of January, only a week ago.

Chairman WALSH. I say, you have not had time to receive any report of progress of anything being done?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have the report contained in the telegram which I read on yesterday. That was the last word. That was a telegram.

Chairman WALSH. If a disagreement should arise between the management and this committee of employees, do you believe that the employees alone would have the power to resist any decision made by the managers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, the further development of the plan is yet to come. I do not know how that will work out, but you see the earnest purpose of the officers and directors to develop a machinery that will inure to the benefit of both sides, and I can only say that the plan will be developed as rapidly as the interests of the employees and the employers shall dictate to that body.

Chairman WALSH. And you will not object if this committee of 25 allies itself with committees in other industries in the State of Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a matter that has not come up, and I have no opinion about it.

Chairman WALSH. Would you object?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not be able to express an opinion; I would want to know the facts.

Chairman WALSH. Would you accord it to them as a right—to the employees to seek organization with men in the same industry but working in other companies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, my attitude and my view as far as it is developed is expressed here, and I can not prophesy what my opinion might be in the further development of this plan. I could not reply to that question until it came up in a more specific way.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see a parallel, it has been suggested to me to ask, between such cooperation and the cooperation of business corporations one with another?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know of any cooperation of a similar nature between business corporations, I do not think of any at the moment.

Chairman WALSH. In case of a conflict over a grievance, which could not be reconciled, do you believe that the employees of your company, under their present wage and condition, could finance themselves in such a way as to resist the attitude of the management?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I could not say because I have not information.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you feel you would have to have before you could answer that general question, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I know nothing about the facts, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. The other question which has just been handed me by Mr. Manly is an epitome of certain matters, and he advises me that he has not yet finished the question and will not be able to finish it until after recess, and as it is now only two or three minutes of that time, we will stand adjourned until 2 o'clock this afternoon, at which time you will please resume the stand.

(At this point a recess was taken until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of Tuesday, January 25, 1915.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in perfect order.
Mr. Rockefeller, will you kindly resume the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Rockefeller, I see that the letter of Mr. Mackenzie King occupies 10 full pages. It is of extreme length, and unless you insist upon it, I would prefer to call your attention to certain extracts of it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, the letter was not quoted in full, but only extracts from it, which cover four pages. The letter has been put in my hands, and the extracts were all that went into the letter to Mr. Welborn. I would be glad if that could be read.

Chairman WALSH. I would like, if you please, to let me read my extracts, and ask you about them, and then you can read whatever you desire to read of the letter and save us reading anything except what you consider important.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should be glad, if you are willing, to have the whole letter read, simply because, taken as a whole, it gives—

Chairman WALSH. Very good, if you insist I shall be—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not insist. I simply make the request; I would appreciate it.

Chairman WALSH. Have you the whole letter here?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have the extracts that were included; all of the extracts that were included in the letter to Mr. Welborn. That is the only part to which I am referring.

Chairman WALSH. Have you the letter of Mr. Mackenzie King?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not; only such portions as were included in the letter to Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. Will you produce the whole letter from Mr. Mackenzie King?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Gladly.

Chairman WALSH. I have not seen that—that part of the four pages you have; the only part I have is contained in about 10 lines that I want to ask you about.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now, why do you not take my suggestion that I ask you in regard to the extracts which I have and then you may read any portion of it you may desire.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You would not prefer I should read the letter in advance?

Chairman WALSH. No; I prefer that I ask the question in advance.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. And then I may read the letter?

Chairman WALSH. You may read it in full or any part of the letter.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Thank you.

Chairman WALSH. You are welcome.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, before we proceed, may I say one word with reference to one of the questions asked this morning?

Chairman WALSH. One minute until we get that letter.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Now you may make your statement.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I simply wanted to refer to a certain question which you very courteously put to me three or four times this morning in an effort to have me understand it. In looking over that matter at lunch the question has been made plain to me in conference. It was something like this: You asked me if I believed that in all cases employers could be trusted to voluntarily secure justice to employees in respect to all matters. I did not get the question, simple as it seems to me now, but my answer is, of course not.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, I will quote you from the letter of Mr. Mackenzie King, you having stated that Mr. Mackenzie King was connected with the foundation alone, as I understand it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He was connected with the foundation alone from the 1st of October.

Chairman WALSH. And prior to that time did he have any connection with you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Did he have any connection with your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if Mr. Mackenzie King wrote you a letter August—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. August 6—is that the date, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir; I will ask you if Mr. Mackenzie King did not write you a letter dated August 6, 1914, in which he used the following language:

“In certain industries it is going to be easy for employers to find all the labor they desire, and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Recognition, simply for the sake of recognition, is going to be seen to be less pressing as an immediate end than that of maintaining standards already existing, and unions may rightly come to regard as their friends and allies companies and corporations large enough and fair enough to desire to maintain the standards of their own accord. For the unions to take a different view will certainly mean to lose the substance of their conditions while wasting resources in fighting for the shadow of recognition. Here, it seems to me, lies a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado.”

Did you understand from that that the standard conditions meant the amount of food and clothing that those people were getting and that the war would place them in such economic condition on account of competition with their fellow workers that the matter would be settled?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was not the part of the letter that my attention was concentrated on, and it was only incidental to Mr. King's answering questions that I had asked, and indicating that the war conditions, which necessarily affect materially the conditions of trade and industry, would make it much more difficult for employment to be found for all labor.

Chairman WALSH. And that, if you waited long enough, they would give up the fight for the recognition of the union in order to maintain the living conditions which they then had.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The whole question, Mr.—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Is that the way you understand it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not remember how it affected me at the time, because that was not the part of the letter I paid any great attention to.

Chairman WALSH. How does that part affect you now?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Would you be good enough to read it again?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

“In certain industries it is going to be easy for employers to find all the labor they desire, and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Recognition, simply for the sake of recognition, is going to be seen to be less pressing as an immediate end than that of maintaining standards already existing, and unions may rightly come to regard as their friends and allies companies and corporations large enough and fair enough to desire to maintain these standards of their own accord. For the unions to take a different view will certainly mean to lose the substance of fair conditions while wasting resources in fighting for the shadow of recognition. Here, it seems to me, lies a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado.”

Did you understand from that, on account of the war, competitive conditions would be so great in the field of labor, one individual against the other, that the worker would be glad to maintain its conditions of living and give up any fight for the recognition of a union democratically formed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That the question would have to be on maintaining what had already been accomplished by unionism, rather than seeking to extend the scope of the accomplishments.

Chairman WALSH. That is the way you understand it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is the way I get it from the way you read it.

Chairman WALSH. Did you get that from the last line here: “Here, it seems to me, lies a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado.”

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the meaning there doubtless was that it would be naturally unwise for any union to continue the condition of unrest and of large expense when the economic conditions of the country were such as to make it an exceptionally difficult fight.

Chairman WALSH. That was your understanding of it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes. May I read the letter now?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; you may read any part of that letter now or all of it, Mr. Rockefeller, if you see fit.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I will read such portions of this letter from Mr. Mackenzie King as were included in my letter to Mr. Welborn—my letter of August 11, 1914. These are the extracts from the letter of Mr. Mackenzie King, dated August 6, 1914:

"I agree with you in believing it to be extremely unlikely that the United Mine Workers of America will call off the strike. They might be willing to drop open active support by degrees, but I am inclined to think that where recognition has been the principle for which they have been fighting, they will not openly abandon the struggle with anything short of what they may be able to construe as such.

"It may be, however, that organized labor in the United States will realize the opportunities and handicaps likely to come to certain industries through the changed conditions of Europe and will be prepared to cease hostilities where industrial strife at present exists, in order that on the one hand labor may reap with capital a fuller measure of the harvest, or, in the industries that may be differently affected, protect itself against consequences that are certain to arise. I fear that the view likely to be taken by some of the leaders may, at the outset, be the shortsighted one of endeavoring to persuade their followers that the opportunities which may come to American capital through the crippled condition of industries elsewhere will induce a recognition which under less favorable circumstances might not be granted. This is almost certain to be the immediate effect, and I think you are wise, therefore, in dismissing altogether from your mind the possibility of the United Mine Workers calling off the present strike, even if under any circumstances short of recognition they would be likely so to do. It will not be very long, however, before the inevitable effects of the European war on American labor conditions are certain to make themselves felt, both because of the scarcity of capital available for investment and the crippled condition of industry on the other side, and once this becomes apparent the unions will have to revise considerably some of their present policies.

"It would be fortunate, indeed, if out of the changed conditions which this European war is certain to produce, a means might be found of restoring industrial peace in the United States in industries such as coal and fuel, where there is a certainty of a direct hearing. It may be that among those who are embarrassing the situation in Colorado there are many foreigners who may feel compelled to return to Europe, and that may prove an immediate factor of importance. Looking at the ultimate rather than the immediate effect, there is, speaking generally, going to be a large amount of unemployment as a consequence of this war, and once the war is over thousands of men and their families in the Old World are going to seek future employment in the New. In certain industries it is going to be easy for employers to find all the labor they desire, and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Recognition simply for the sake of recognition is going to be less pressing as an immediate end than that of maintaining standards already existing, and unions may rightly come to regard as their friends and allies companies and corporations large enough and fair enough to desire to maintain these standards of their own accord. For the unions to take a different view will certainly mean to lose the substance of fair conditions, while wasting resources in fighting for the shadow of recognition. Here, it seems to me, lies a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado.

"The possibilities here set forth might be pointed out by employers in a perfectly frank and open manner. It might be said with equal frankness that were it desired to profit by such a situation employers may seek later to enforce individual agreements with all men desiring to enter their employ; may even consider, as some doubtless will, altering conditions of employment to their supposed immediate advantage. Between the extreme of individual agreements on one side and an agreement involving recognition of unions of national and international character on the other lies the straight acceptance of the principle of collective bargaining between capital and labor immediately concerned in any certain industry or group of industries, and the construction of machinery which will afford opportunity of easy and constant conference between employers and employed with reference to matters of concern to both, such machinery to be avowedly constructed as a means on the one hand of preventing labor from being exploited, and on the other of insuring that cordial co-operation which is likely to further industrial efficiency.

"Granting the acceptance of the principle outlined, the machinery to be devised should aim primarily at securing a maximum of publicity, with a minimum of interference, in all that pertains to conditions of employment. By this I mean that the hope of establishing confidence between employers and employed will lie more in a known willingness on the part of each to confer frankly with the other than in anything else. Similarly, the avoidance of friction likely to lead to subsequent strife is likely to be minimized by agencies which will disclose the existence of irritation and its cause, at or near inception; trouble most frequently follows where ill feeling is allowed to develop, unknown or unheeded.

"A board on which both employers and employed are represented and before which at stated intervals questions affecting conditions of employment can be discussed and grievances examined would appear to constitute the necessary basis of such machinery. The size of this board and whether there should be one or many such boards would depend upon the numbers employed and the nature of the industry and whether or not the work is carried on in one or several localities. Where, for example, there are different mines—or refining plants, as well as mines—it might be that boards pertaining to each individual concern might be combined, with a provision for reference to a joint board covering the whole industry or group of industries, to which matters not settled by smaller boards might be taken for further discussion and adjustment.

"In determining the character of representation on such boards, broadly speaking, a line might be drawn between those who are 'paid salaries,' on the one hand, and those who 'earn wages,' on the other. This is very rough and very general, for there are in some industries a class of petty bosses whose interests may appear to identify them more closely with wage earners than with salaried officials; but, broadly speaking, men who have authority to give orders and to direct operations fall into the salaried class, while men who have no authority to direct others and whose own work is subject wholly to direction fall into the category of wage earners. The selection of representatives on such boards should be made at a meeting or meetings of employees called expressly for the purpose. It might be left optional for the employees to say whether they desired a permanent form of organization, of which their representatives on a board would be the officers, or whether they would prefer the selection of individuals at stated periods, without reference to any permanent form of organization. It would also be left optional with the workers themselves to say whether they wished to allow representatives so chosen a salary in payment of their services or whether such services would have to be voluntary. A company might with propriety offer to provide the place of meeting for the boards, and possibly go to the length of supplying the employees with permanent office accommodation for their representatives, leaving it, however, to the employees themselves to provide whatever might be necessary in the way of salaries and expenses in the keeping up of such offices.

"It would not appear desirable at the outset that these boards should have anything to do with benefit features. They should not be framed with a view of restricting, through possible benefits, the liberty of any man as respects the continuance of his employment, but should aim primarily at affording a guaranty of fair play in determining, in the first instance, the conditions under which men would be obliged to work and the remuneration to be paid; and, secondly, the carrying out of these conditions in a spirit of fair play.

"One thing to be especially aimed at in the construction of such boards would be the making virtually certain of the possibility of grievances or conditions complained of being made known to, and subject to, the review of persons in authority over and above the parties immediately concerned, where the parties fail to adjust these differences between themselves—this to be carried even to the point that directors, if need be, should have, where the numbers to be affected are likely to justify it, a knowledge of the situation and power to pass upon it. This feature will probably not appeal to pit bosses and managers who may desire absolute authority. On the other hand, I am convinced it should be possible to so frame a constitution for these boards that the possibility of this review would in no way interfere with discipline, but would be a material assistance, rather than a handicap, to those who are charged with responsibility.

"What might be expected of boards of this kind would be that employees before taking up any question with the officers of the company would try to adjust or settle it among themselves. Failing adjustment in this manner, differences and difficulties would be presented to the officers of the company, not by the individuals immediately affected, but by the duly constituted representatives chosen to safeguard the interests of all. Having had a preliminary sifting in this manner, cases could be brought before a committee of the board, or before the whole board in any one industry, for adjustment. If it should be found that an individual board could not definitely determine a matter of importance, there might be brought a further appeal on stated conditions to a board chosen to represent the industry as a whole, or a group of allied industries, the purpose here being to get away to a degree, for purposes of adjustment, from the parties immediately concerned, but not wholly away from parties likely to be ultimately affected. This would make it an essential that all members of such boards, excepting, possibly, persons chosen as chairman, referees, or umpires, should be persons actually employed in the industry or connected with it in some way, not persons chosen from outside. It should be possible, however, for workmen to select one or more of their number who could give their entire time to acting in a representative capacity and pay them a salary pending their acting in such capacity.

"I think, in a very rough way, this covers the points mentioned in our conversation. I really hesitate to send this letter in such rough outline and without care in preparation. I believe so strongly in never advising in regard to any situation until one has made oneself familiar with all its phases that I feel I am running a great risk in even setting forth what this letter contains, as there may be conditions or reasons which will render its suggestions wholly inapplicable to some of the industries with reference to which consideration is invited."

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked, Mr. Rockefeller—it has been suggested to me to have you make more clear just how this committee is selected in the plan referred to in the letter of the 19th instant?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Just how the committee is selected?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would be glad to do so. You mean the committee of 25?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; the committee of 25—is that the only committee mentioned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I confess that I was confused; I thought there was a subcommittee of three.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the confusion arises because you have had that in your mind from the correspondence and the suggestions made from time to time by various people. I assume you now understand what has been done?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The plan, as described in my statement of yesterday consists of a committee of 25, I think 25, individuals selected by the men at each camp, and notice was posted at each camp asking the men to assemble in a mass meeting—a meeting at which neither pit bosses nor superintendents should be admitted, to elect by ballot from their number one representative for every 250 men, who should represent the men in taking up with the representatives of the company any matters of mutual concern, who should also represent the men in a conference with the officers of the company at Denver from time to time. These men thus elected by the representatives of the mining camps are to continue to represent the interests of the group which chose them until such time as any group might desire by similar election in mass meeting to elect some successor to the original man chosen.

Chairman WALSH. Now, Mr. Rockefeller, you stated yesterday, I believe, that your father, during the 12 years in which he has held an interest in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., has received a return of $371,000 upon his stock; is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is, Mr. Chairman—I will look in the statement—$371,000 on the capital stock, on his investment in the capital stock of the company.

Chairman WALSH. You stated also that during the same period he has held bonds as follows: Colorado industrial fives, $14,500,000; Colorado Fuel & Iron, general fives, $366,000.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that was taken from this statement. Please read that again.

Chairman WALSH. You stated also, if I understood you correctly, that he has held bonds as follows: Colorado industrial fives, $14,500,000; Colorado Fuel & Iron, general fives, $366,000.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I must have made the statement from this statement, which reads: "Colorado industrial fives, personal holdings, $13,450,000, par value."

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER Jr. General mortgage fives, $376,000, par value. I think those must be the two items.

Chairman WALSH. I guess so. I gathered that from the record as I ran along and may not have got it correct; but it is correct enough for the purposes of this question. You also stated that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. had not defaulted on its bonds; is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has not defaulted to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. I have made a calculation on the basis of those figures—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). Pardon me; they have not defaulted to my knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. I have made a calculation on the basis of these figures which shows that your father received during these 12 years income on the bonds amounting to $8,889,000, and on the stocks $371,000, making in all $9,260,000 income from the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. Is that approximately correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not figured it that way. I have simply figured the return in rate per cent on the total investment.

Chairman WALSH. I am trying to get at, if possible, the actual amount of cash gotten by your father.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can give it.

Chairman WALSH. I analyze it this way, with this little difference in figures, $14,500,000. Colorado industrial fives, 5 per cent for 12 years, $8,670,000; $366,000 C. F. & I., general fives, $219,000; income on stocks, $371,000, making a total of $9,260,000.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is very likely correct and doubtless, if you have figured it; I have not figured it.

Chairman WALSH. I will give you this when I have finished, so that you may verify the figures. I believe you stated that you could not give the number of employees of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in normal years employed there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Welborn has stated that the number of employees employed in normal years is about 15,000; would you accept that as correct if it does so appear in his testimony?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should.

Chairman WALSH. The combined statement shows then that your father's total income has been $9,260,000, while the employees have received in wages $92,000,000, I believe you stated?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; approximately.

Chairman WALSH. Through that period.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Would you consider it just and socially desirable that 15,000 employees should have worked for 12 years, and many of them have been crippled and sacrificed their lives—that they should at least receive 10 times as great a return as one man who has never visited the property through that period and whose representative has visited it but once?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, strictly as a matter of investment, you put your money in a savings bank and you get at least 3½ or 4 per cent, and the total income my father has gotten has not run as high as 4 per cent. I can not see that there is any particular connection between what a man gets for money that he lends and what may be paid in any industry as the total in wages to the employees of that industry.

Chairman WALSH. My question is finally, would you consider it just and socially desirable that 15,000 employees who had worked for 12 years and many of them have been crippled and sacrificed their lives, should, as a matter of justice, receive 10 times as great a return as one man who had not visited the property—as a matter of social justice?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not make any comparative statement. I think the employees should receive full wages, and I think they have. I think capital is entitled to a fair return. There has not been a fair return. I think as between the two, the employees have fared better than the capital.

Chairman WALSH. How much more would you consider a fair return?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. On capital?

Chairman WALSH. On capital, considering the conditions in Colorado such as you did observe when you were there 10 years ago.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The rate of 5 per cent on the ordinary bond we thought was about the fair bond interest. There are bonds often that pay 6 per cent. Around there would seem to be a fair return for money loaned on bonds. I should regard the return of two-thirds of 1 per cent per annum on the cash invested in any industrial enterprise as utterly inadequate. Certainly capital could not long be led into industry on any such return as that.

Chairman WALSH. Which would be utterly inadequate, then, to properly stimulate investment of capital in industries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think two-thirds of 1 per cent, certainly.

Chairman WALSH. I just wanted to gather what you meant by that being utterly inadequate.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Two-thirds of 1 per cent.

Chairman WALSH. Would be utterly inadequate for what?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. To stimulate capital to go into industries. Capital naturally flows into savings banks at 3½ or 4 per cent, where there is no risk, where the capital can be drawn out at any time, rather than into industry where the risk is enormous and where the capital can not be drawn out at the will of the investor.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I am going to leave the subject of general industries, as well as—I believe I made a request for you to kindly produce to the commission the letter of Mr. Mackenzie King from which that quotation was that you read to us.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not understand that, Mr. Chairman. I would be glad to produce the letter.

Chairman WALSH. Please produce the original letter.

(See Rockefeller, jr., Exhibit No. 3.)

Chairman WALSH. Have you enough data to get that letter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. I was going to say that I would leave your direct examination on the general industrial topics as well as on Colorado, and call your attention now particularly to the work of the foundation or the philanthropic activities of your father and the organizations which he had created. Of what philanthropic foundations are you a trustee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Rockefeller Foundation, the General Education Board, the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

Chairman WALSH. Is the International Sanitary Commission one of your activities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The International Health Commission is one of the organizations created by the Rockefeller Foundation as a subsidiary organization to deal with certain particular questions. I did not know that you included in your request the subsidiary organizations.

Chairman WALSH. Well, perhaps I did not. I do not know that we did. But just briefly explain whether or not it stands upon any different basis from the Rockefeller Foundation, the General Education Board, and the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. If so, please briefly state what it is.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Rockefeller Foundation and the General Education Board and the Rockefeller Institute all have their own independent separate funds and boards of trustees and officers. The International Health Commission is an organization created by the Rockefeller Foundation for the purpose of dealing with questions of health. At the moment it is dealing with the eradication of the hookworm disease throughout the world, as a previous organization, whose work it has taken over, dealt with the hookworm disease in the Southern States of this country.

Chairman WALSH. Were those foundations established by Mr. John D. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I just add one word—

Chairman WALSH. Certainly.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In connection with that question: That the International Health Commission has no funds of its own. Its funds are received from the Rockefeller Foundation. That was set forth in an answer to one of the questions in one of the questionnaires.

Chairman WALSH. Were those foundations established by Mr. John D. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They were.

Chairman WALSH. Of what other philanthropic and civic, educational, or religious agencies are you a member of the governing board?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am a member of the board of trustees of the Bureau of Social Hygiene, which is a small organization which has been dealing with certain social questions for several years past. I am a member of the board of trustees of the church of which I am a member. I do not at the moment think of any other.

Chairman WALSH. Any civic organizations of any sort?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I recall.

Chairman WALSH. Any educational organizations other than those which you have mentioned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I recall.

Chairman WALSH. Did you advise with your father in advance of the establishment of these foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My father has always advised with me and the other members of his staff on these matters.

Chairman WALSH. You were therefore familiar with the purpose, method, instruction, and method of management, and results of these various foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Quite so.

Chairman WALSH. Have you in addition given considerable study to the question of the relations of private benevolences to social and economic conditions, to government, industry, and the like?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, in connection with these several organizations, I have.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion of your time, would you say, during the past 13 years, since the General Education Board was established, have you given to studying the management of these philanthropies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, during the past 13 years I have not given any time—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). That is, study and management, also, I might add.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes. During the past 13 years I have not of necessity given any time to the study and management of the Rockefeller Foundation, because that was founded about 18 months ago; only that long has it been in existence. The Bureau of Social Hygiene has been in existence some 4 or 5 years, possibly.

Chairman WALSH. Your father's philanthropies have extended over a period longer than 13 years, I believe?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Since his early boyhood.

Chairman WALSH. The question I asked you was: What proportion of your time, during the past 13 years, since the General Education Board was established, have you given to studying the management of Mr. Rockefeller's foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I thought you said these foundations.

Chairman WALSH. I probably did.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is why I say, Mr. Chairman, it would be difficult, as I stated this morning, to accurately approach even a guess as to how much time I give to philanthropic and educational matters and how much to business matters. Our office is so organized that we deal with any of the problems that come up in the day—educational, business, philanthropic; whatever does come up. As I stated this morning, I might spend all of to-day on matters bearing on the foundation. I might spend no time for a week from this on on such matters. I might spend to-morrow half an hour on matters connected with the General Education Board, or I might spend to-morrow, as I should if I were not to be here, sitting with the board during the entire day, because its meeting comes to-morrow. And so it is irregular, Mr. Chairman, and difficult for me to make a specific answer to the question.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate or compare the proportionate time given during the past 13 years to the study of philanthropic questions and the management of philanthropies with the proportionate time you have given to the study of industrial questions, such as have been presented since you have been on the witness stand at this hearing?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have given very little time to the study of industrial questions. As I have stated in answer to other questions, those are questions which I have not taken up to any extent.

Chairman WALSH. What is the total amount to date of your father's public giving?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There is no accurate record that I am familiar with, at least, no record has been made. I think, if I may make a guess, Mr. Chairman, as close as possible that it would approximate a quarter of a billion of dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Of these gifts what totals have been given to foundations established by Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. One hundred millions to the Rockefeller Foundation. About thirty-three or thirty-four millions at present in the hands of the General Education Board, and that I must explain. Another larger gift has been made to the board, but as regards a portion of the income my father at the time of the making reserved the right to designate the objects to which such portion should be given within the corporate purposes of the board. And in that way certain moneys were given to the University of Chicago and to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research. So that the funds now in the hands of the General Education Board, those funds having passed out, amount to about $33,000,000.

Chairman WALSH. About what amount has been given other than through the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the total of the gifts to the——

Chairman WALSH. Subtract the gifts from the total and we would have the approximate, I would suggest.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research has received something under $10,000,000 direct from my father, I should say, not including the gift of two and one-quarter millions made recently, but not yet paid, through the Rockefeller Foundation. But it would not be accurate to count that both in the Rockefeller Foundation and in the Institute for Medical Research. Therefore, I should say that the gifts thus far to the Rockefeller Institute would represent in round figures about $10,000,000; to the General Education Board, about $34,000,000; to the Rockefeller Foundation, $100,000,000; to the University of Chicago, about $33,000,000 or $34,000,000. I have added to the sum of those four or five figures, a figure which it seems to me would about approximate what my father's further and separate gifts have been along those lines during the many years in which he has been interested in such matters.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think more public service has been rendered through the foundations than would have been rendered if Mr. Rockefeller had given these amounts to employees in industries in which he had investments?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think my father has always felt, Mr. Chairman, and I certainly have, very cordial sympathy with his feeling, that one of the best forms of philanthropy is the investment of money in the building up of productive industry. I think at the same time he has felt that while that was doubtless one of the highest and most productive forms for the use of money, that there were certain things which could best be accomplished by gifts of sums to other organizations, educational, philanthropic, etc.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever had a description prepared for you, Mr. Rockefeller, of what might have been accomplished if the sums which have been given through your benefactions of various kinds, had been given in increased wages or improved the conditions of labor and standards of living in the communities from which the investments of Mr. Rockefeller have drawn the profits?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please describe Mr. Rockefeller's purpose in establishing foundations as a means through which to render public service.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Generally speaking, the various lines of activities which are being carried on through these several foundations were to a smaller extent carried on by my father personally prior to the establishment of these foundations. And in assisting him, as assistance to him in carrying on those private philanthropies and educational matters, those who had been on his personal staff have been his associates and assistants. As my father's desire and ability to enlarge his contributions in the interest of education and of general matters of interest to humanity at large increased, he commenced to feel that it would be desirable to crystallize into separate and distinct organizations the several activities which he had been carrying on himself. The first one which was thus created was the General Education Board. Up to that time my father had been making contributions to educational institutions as a result of studies and inquiries made by his own associates and representatives. He came to feel that a larger and more permanent contribution to the cause of education throughout the United States as a whole could be rendered were he not to limit the information and advice which he received in regard to giving to such purposes to the group, necessarily small, of his own advisers, but rather to place in the hands of an increasingly large group the responsibilities for the wise giving of such funds. And so in the establishment of the General Education Board, as the personnel of the board itself clearly will indicate, it was my father's desire and purpose to bring in to the counsels in considering and dispensing these funds, as broad and intelligent and representative a group of men, well equipped to consider such questions, as might be brought together. That covers his purpose generally in the establishment of the General Education Board. Shall I speak of the other foundations similarly?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I would like you to go as exhaustively as you think the importance of the subject demands into the question. The commission would like to be fully informed as to your father's purpose in establishing foundations, as fully as it is possible for you to do. We think that would be the best sort of information we can get on that subject.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There came to my father also the growing impression that one of the great causes of misery in the world was disease. That if in any way he might be able to make a contribution toward the securing of information which would lead to the prevention of disease and possibly to the eradication of disease in some lines, he would be making a real and permanent contribution to the welfare, not only of this country, but of the world at large. The idea of medical research was, in his mind, a field not frequently entered by philanthropists because so frequently unproductive and because so costly. Believing it to be an important field he undertook to enter it. And starting, as has been his custom in the development of these several foundations, he made his first gift in a small and modest way, amounting to $200,000, to be drawn upon as a board of the most competent medical directors whom he could get together should see fit. These men used the funds placed at their disposal in the employment of trained men to study various problems of disease. The men so employed worked in various laboratories. There was no plan as to the future, there was no suggestion by my father as to how this work should develop. For it had always been his feeling that those who are most highly trained and fully versed in any such matters should be the ones alone to lay the plans and to execute them.

The preliminary gift of several hundred thousand dollars led the directors in whose hands it was placed to develop several men of special ability as investigators as disease. As to whether these investigations should be centered in this city or that was not suggested by my father. The question of whether such an institute, if it took definite form, should be related to some existing university or other institution was not treated of by my father. That and all of the questions in regard to the development of this work of medical research, as is his universal custom, was left to the wisdom and discretion of the board of able experts into whose hands he had committed this trust. The result was that little by little those different problems commenced to solve themselves. But, without taking your time to trace the development, the present situation is that the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research has a laboratory building, a hospital in this city, and it is constructing an additional laboratory building where a number of highly trained medical experts are associated together in studying such medical problems as the board of medical advisers who direct their work from time to time suggest and designate. That is, generally, the development of the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research.

I may say that the studies are now along the line of one disease, now another, as was the case a few years ago when an effort was made to arrive at the cause and the possible cure of cerebrospinal meningitis. That effort was successful, and whereas cerebrospinal meningitis always exacted a deadly toll up to that time of 75 per cent of the cases affected with the disease, as the result of the application of the remedy which was discovered through the able medical men working in the institute, the first 600 cases that were observed subsequent to the discovery of this remedy, reduced the average from 75 per cent of deaths to 25 per cent of deaths.

Chairman WALSH. In what number of cases?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In 600 cases. So that, I suppose, it would be fair to say 300 lives which otherwise would have been sacrificed were saved in that first 600 cases. The remedy has been used quite generally throughout different parts of the world since, and as is customary with all of the discoveries—of any discoveries that may be made in any such institute—after they have been tried out they are turned over to the public to be used in the general interest of the public. That, in brief, outlines the purpose which the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research was organized to meet and the method of its development.

The Rockefeller Foundation was the most recent development. It was organized in order that the various lines of altruistic and other endeavor, many of which my father had up to the time of its organization been endeavoring to assist through personal contributions might continue to receive in increasing amount the attention of those who were placed in charge of the fund. The fund was purposely made very broad in its purpose, because it has been my father's view that each generation can best determine what its own specific needs are, and that he who endeavors in advance to prescribe for what purposes, as the years go by, a fund shall be used, is not as apt to render as useful service to mankind, to humanity, as he who leaves the decision as to the use of that money to the best judgment of such groups as may in each successive generation be in charge of the fund. The fund is so organized that any purpose, any object, which comes within the broad field of being helpful in the development of civilization and benefiting humanity can be undertaken, as is stated in the charter, which has been made a part of one of the questionnaires. I think, generally, that covers the situation.

Chairman WALSH. Has Mr. Rockefeller himself formulated his purpose and his viewpoint in any written publication?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Never.

Chairman WALSH. I would call your attention specifically to the autobiography printed in sections, in the World's Work in 1908-9.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I assumed that you meant his purpose with reference to any one of these specific foundations.

Chairman WALSH. No; not in reference to that.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My answer was in answer to that question.

Chairman WALSH. But as a general point of view along those lines.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I recall the publication to which you refer.

Chairman WALSH. These articles were afterwards collected and published in book form, were they?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. I see they are called "Random Reminiscences of Men and Events," by John D. Rockefeller.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Copyright 1909-1908-9. What led to his writing this series of articles, if you know, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume it was as much as anything the result of the desire of his family, expressed for many years, to have him put down in writing his own views with reference to matters of general importance; and we had hoped his own views and experiences in the history of his life. I have tried for many years to interest him in preparing for his descendants an outline of his life history. This is as far as I was able to get.

Chairman WALSH. So the initiative was taken by his family in having these written?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any special reason for issuing this biography through that particular publication, the World's Work?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. Were the articles written entirely by your father or prepared in outline for him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not personally have to do with the preparation of the articles or have any part in the work, so I could not state definitely on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. After the family had got to the point where Mr. Rockefeller was willing to do this, do you know whether or not it was a part of his object to give the public his views about private business and public giving?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know as to his motive in writing those chapters.

Chairman WALSH. Did he ever mention it to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; he did not.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any special effort made upon the part of Mr. Rockefeller or his family or his personal advisers to give any special circulation to the magazine containing the articles?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Quite the contrary, so far as I know.

Chairman WALSH. The book that followed, was it put out in general circulation, or was there any effort made to circulate it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it was published and put on sale as any other book would be.

Chairman WALSH. Any other book?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Certainly, the family made no effort in that regard.

Chairman WALSH. Nor himself?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Nor himself, indeed.

Chairman WALSH. What has been Mr. Rockefeller's basis of selection of members for the various foundations, namely, what types of men, what types of experience, has he endeavored to secure for the foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In the selection of the directors of the several foundations Mr. Rockefeller has been guided very largely by the suggestions made to him by his advisers, and they have sought suggestions on various hands. In connection with the board of medical directors of the Rockefeller Foundation I think I myself had to do with the effort to ascertain who among the medical men of the country ranked highest as medical authorities, and I conferred in that study with various people. I think the board as finally made up was suggested entirely to my father by myself and my associates who had that matter in charge.

Chairman WALSH. Did you suggest the names of various persons to your father, yourself and these advisers, from whom he finally selected the trustees which he desired?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My recollection is not clear, but I think it would be only in line with our usual method in making recommendations to him on any matter to make them as concrete as possible. I think it is highly probable that we suggested specific names, having gone over the field carefully, and having arrived at a list for final consideration which we felt we could properly recommend.

Chairman WALSH. We have had taken from the testimony of Mr. Starr J. Murphy before the Senate committee on the question of chartering the Rockefeller Foundation the following statement. I will ask you if this correctly represents the type of men you are endeavoring to get:

"We find that the kind of man you want on these boards are men of wide vision, men of wide experience, and of sound wisdom, and men of enthusiasm in the work which is before them, and who are willing to give freely of their time. None of the members of our board receive a dollar compensation for their work, and some of them come thousands of miles to attend the meetings of these boards and give freely of their time and strength to the public service. That is all we wish to preserve."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that describes very admirably what is usually in mind in the selection of men for these boards.

Chairman WALSH. Have vacancies occurred upon these boards from time to time since the original institution?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think in all the boards, Mr. Chairman, the members are elected for a term of three years only, the first board being divided by lot into three groups, one serving for one year, another group for two years, and another group for three years, and as vacancies have occurred, successors to the original occupants of the position have been elected by the board.

Chairman WALSH. In what respect, if at all, have the boards as at first constituted by Mr. Rockefeller been changed, so far as type of men and experience, as placed upon the board as vacancies have occurred, are concerned?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Vacancies which have occurred have been few in number. In the board of medical directors of the Rockefeller Institute one vacancy, I think, has occurred by death. The man who took the place of Dr. Herter, who died, was Dr. Theodore C. Janeway, a man of the same general type. In the General Education Board, the men, as I recall at the moment, whose places have become vacant have been Mr. William H. Baldwin, who died; Mr. Robert C. Ogden; and I think ex-President E. Benjamin Andrews, formerly president of Brown University. I do not recall at the moment any other vacancies that have occurred in that board. Men of generally similar type have been selected by the members of the board, as a body, who were in existence at the time vacancies came up to be filled.

Chairman WALSH. Who are those gentlemen?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Who have been added?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not got the list at hand.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. I will reach it later. What method of removal of trustees has been provided in the various laws incorporating Mr. Rockefeller's foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall that any method of removal has been incorporated. As I have stated, in all instances the term of office for the members of the board is fixed at three years, so that if it was desirable to replace a man it would be possible to do so at the end of that time and his place would be filled by some one else at the end of his term. But the men who have been selected have been chosen, Mr. Chairman, with a view to the selection of such men as it might be hoped would be continued in office after their initial term had expired for such longer term as they might find themselves able to serve.

Chairman WALSH. Do you contemplate any conditions under which privately endowed corporations might become a menace either to the general cause of education or to the industrial welfare of the people?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You speak now of any form of endowment of universities, or is it a general question?

Chairman WALSH. First, as a general question.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Is that in substance, Mr. Chairman, may I ask, the last of the six questions which the commission sent to me? Because it is so nearly like it that I assume it is, and I have prepared a brief written answer, which I would be glad to read if I may.

Chairman WALSH. You may read the answer, because I do not have question 6 fixed in mind, and if your answer does not answer my question I will propound it again.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Question 6 is, "Do the large foundations constitute a possible menace either to the general cause of education or to the industrial welfare of the people? If so, what regulation or supervision is desirable?"

Answering in respect to the two foundations with which I am connected—by those, of course, I mean the General Education Board and the Rockefeller Foundation—the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research we have not regarded as a foundation in the same sense, it having a specific purpose [reading]:

"The two foundations with which I am connected, namely, the Rockefeller Foundation and the General Education Board, are not endowed; their funds, both as regards principal and interest, in accordance with the deeds of gift, are subject to distribution at any time in the discretion of the trustees. These corporations, as is true of all modern corporations, are subject to the reserved power of the legislative bodies which created them—to modify or repeal their charters whenever the public interests require."

Chairman WALSH. Under what conditions, leaving aside your foundations, would you consider privately endowed foundations might become a menace to either the general cause of education or to public welfare?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The problem with which I have been engaged most is rather how such foundations could be made serviceable to humanity. I have given no thought to the other phase of it.

Chairman WALSH. You have given no thought to the question of whether or not these large endowed foundations might become a menace to the general cause of education or to the public welfare of the people?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not thought it was necessary with reference to those two foundations of which I speak, or generally to broad foundations, because of the power of the legislative body granting the charter to repeal or modify the charter.

Chairman WALSH. Then your answer is that you have not given that question any thought?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not beyond thinking that that seemed to be an absolute safeguard.

Chairman WALSH. Not beyond the thought that the legislature could repeal it if the members or the people were so inclined?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have had such confidence in the principles of democracy that I have felt that the people could be relied upon to act when the necessity arose.

Chairman WALSH. During the period that the question of granting a Federal charter to the Rockefeller Foundation was before the Congress of the United States did you read the editorial comments of the newspapers of the country and the magazine articles upon the subject?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I saw a part of them.

Chairman WALSH. What steps did Mr. Rockefeller's advisers take to secure copies of editorial comment upon either the benefits or dangers or criticism of Mr. Rockefeller's foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They have never taken any definite and organized steps to secure such information.

Chairman WALSH. Did you subscribe to the clipping service during the period when the request for a national charter was before Congress?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Very possibly at that time, although I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. Did you personally read generally the comments that were made by the publications of the country upon the subject of the granting of a charter to the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. How generally I could not state; I saw a number of comments.

Chairman WALSH. Did you personally secure an analysis—a summary of their contents?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not personally secure an analysis or summary of their contents—contents of the criticisms, you mean?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; of the criticism or comments in the publications of the country?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not generally, but I have had in mind quite clearly the several points which were raised at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Has Mr. Rockefeller, referring to your father, of course, recognized any dangers connected with the future of foundations established by him?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I am justified in saying that he has thought, as I have thought, that the powers of the legislative bodies granting the charters, to modify or repeal them, made that risk nil.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that the present safeguards give adequate assurance that the various Rockefeller Foundations will never become a menace?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not see how they can if the people, as the years go by, perform their part.

Chairman WALSH. What means have been provided by which the public would promptly know in case one of the Rockefeller Foundations was being used, whether knowingly or unknowingly, against the public interests?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It has been increasingly the purpose and endeavor of these several foundations to have their work very generally known, believing that the success of the work, particularly in the foundation which has a very broad scope, would depend to a great degree upon the public interest and cooperation in the use of the fund.

Chairman WALSH. Has the Rockefeller Foundation ever rendered a public report?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The Rockefeller Foundation has only been in existence since, I think, March, 1913. Its first year was a partial year and no report was written. Its second year is terminating with its annual meeting this week. A report is being prepared—has been, I think, prepared—for that meeting. It has been the purpose and is the purpose of the directors of the foundation to have annual reports prepared covering fully the activities of the preceding year, but although such reports have not yet been made, or made public, for the reasons I have stated, we think quite extensive publicity has been given to the work of the foundation, and it is the desire and purpose of the directors to have the public fully informed at all times of the work of the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. And that will include what, please, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What methods of informing the public?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; these reports; what will go to the public?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Everything, Mr. Chairman, that the directors may feel to be of the slightest public interest—everything that the public may feel the slightest interest in.

Chairman WALSH. When was the first publication made as to what constituted the $100,000,000 in the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Do you mean the securities which went to make up the $100,000,000?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; the securities which went to make up the $100,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not give you the date. I think the first publication was made within the past few months.

Chairman WALSH. And where was it published?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was published in a general statement that was given out by the officers of the foundation to the press of the country.

Chairman WALSH. When was that given out with reference to the submission of the questions of this commission as to what constituted the property of the Rockefeller Foundation? Was it after the questionnaire of the commission was submitted to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it was.

Chairman WALSH. And was the same information given to the press that was given in answer to the questions from the commission as to that point?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was. The first questionnaire, as well as the second questionnaire, was answered with the utmost care. We spent days in preparing in the fullest and most accurate way possible the answers which were requested, and it seemed to the members of the foundation that a considerable portion of the material thus gotten together might appropriately be made public and might be of general public interest without waiting for the publication of the annual report. The general question of the foundation being up in the public mind, as a result of the proposed inquiry of this commission, the foundation directors thought that they owed it to the public to give all the information which the public might be thought to be interested in, and therefore did not wait, since the question was up, until the annual report, which would be the natural yearly time at which publication should be made of such information.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask the stenographer to please read again my question and ask you to kindly give me a direct answer to it, if possible.

The REPORTER (reading):

"When was that given out with reference to the submission of the questions of this commission as to what constituted the property of the Rockefeller Foundation? Was it after the questionnaire of the commission was submitted to you?"

"Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it was.

"Chairman WALSH. And was the same information given to the press that was given in answer to the questions from the commission as to that point?"

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Portions of it, would be the answer.

Chairman WALSH. Was that the first public announcement as to the character of the securities which constituted the $100,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was Chairman WALSH. Should the size of an endowment be limited in the incorporating act of the State legislature, or of Congress, or by general law of the State or Nation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My own opinion on that question is, Mr. Chairman, that the larger the foundation the safer it is, because the more sure it is to attract very general public interest, and there is nothing that could be so helpful in keeping any foundation directed along lines calculated to be of service to the recurring generations as that careful and critical and general public attention to the purposes and acts of such foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Reporter, I wish you would please repeat the question.

The REPORTER (reading):

"Should the size of an endowment be limited in the incorporating act of the State legislature, or Congress, or by general law of the State or Nation?"

Chairman WALSH. You either misunderstood me or I misunderstood your answer.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I thought I was conveying my opinion on that subject—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Then I did not gather it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (continuing). Better than I could by simply saying yes or no. Yes or no does not give the idea. I think there is no danger—rather I think the danger is less with a large foundation. Therefore I think it is not necessary to safeguard the—in safeguarding the interest of the public, to limit the amount.

Chairman WALSH. Should foundations be required to consume their income each year or be prohibited from showing an increase in capital out of income accruals for a stated period of 5 or 10 years, say?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I suppose you mean, Mr. Chairman, should a general policy of increasing the funds be entered into? I suppose you do not mean that several years might not go by and a surplus might not accumulate which might subsequently be more than expended; but you mean the general policy, do you, of increasing the fund?

Chairman WALSH. Should foundations be required to consume their income each year, or be prohibited from showing an increased capital out of income accruals?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not regard such a requirement necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Should the minimum number of trustees of a self-perpetuating body be prescribed in the incorporating act?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it would be wise.

Chairman WALSH. Speaking generally, what is the best number for a governing board of a large foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a difficult question to answer, Mr. Chairman. I should think that from 10 to 20 would be the two desirable limits; not more than 20 for the sake of convenience and ability to get meetings, and I should think that with any large foundation that 10 would be a small enough number for the permanent board.

Chairman WALSH. Should the incorporating act, whether by Congress or legislature, specifically provide for the optional wind-up of the foundations within 25 or 50 years, or in any limited number of years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, that would depend, Mr. Chairman. If the purpose the foundation was so broad that it never could be outlived I should not think it was necessary. If the purport was a specific purpose which one might conceive might be outlived in a hundred years or five hundred years, I should think it would be desirable.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it would be desirable for the act creating the Rockefeller Foundation to provide for the optional winding up of it at the end of, say, 50 years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. By "optional," do you mean optional by the action of the trustees?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is not necessary, for, as I stated, the fund is not an endowment fund but may be paid out in its entirety, both interest and principal, by vote of the members of the board, as prescribed by the by-laws—that is, as to the number who should vote on such a matter and the method of taking such vote.

Chairman WALSH. Then your answer is, I take it, that there should be no optional winding up of the Rockefeller Foundation at the end of 50 years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My answer was that it was not necessary, because it has already been provided for.

Chairman WALSH. You mean in the by-laws of the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; I mean in the letter of gift. In the letter of gift it was stated—

Chairman WALSH. Do you mean in the deed of gift?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. But that is not provided for in the incorporating act from the State?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Should the incorporating act specifically provide for the compulsory closing of the endowment in any stated time—25 or 50 or 100 years?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should see no necessity for that, Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that the legislature granting the charter can at any time amend or rescind the charter.

Chairman WALSH. Should the incorporating body retain for the public an outside veto of proposed members of private foundation charters?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a matter which, in so far as the Rockefeller Foundation is concerned, came up when the charter was being sought from Congress. It was suggested that such a veto would be desirable. I am not prepared to say that it might not be desirable. It may be that as the foundation develops and its directors have studied more the requirements of conditions, that they will suggest something of that kind. The reason why that suggestion made in connection with the request for the charter from Congress was not introduced in the State charter was that those who were seeking the charter were not convinced at that time of the wisdom of the suggestion and thought that a wiser measure was to let the desirable procedure in such matters develop as more experience was had.

Chairman WALSH. Should the real and personal property held by foundations be exempt from local or State taxation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I see no reason why they should not be, any more than other charitable organizations which are thus exempt by State laws.

Chairman WALSH. Should exemption relate only to property used for benevolent purposes?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Do you mean real and personal property?

Chairman WALSH. Real or personal property.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it does so relate only.

Chairman WALSH. Well, does it relate both to real and personal property?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think so.

Chairman WALSH. Why should not foundations be taxed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not undertaken to consider why the State legislatures, in passing their general acts under which charitable corporations have been formed, have thought it unwise or unnecessary or undesirable to tax such corporations. I assume that the feeling has been that such corporations were making a substantial contribution to the wealth of the community, large or small, in which they might be located or in which they might be operating, and that such contributions were so desirable that it was in the public interest that the funds should be left as large as might be.

Chairman WALSH. What is the New York law relative to taxation of property such as is held by the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My understanding is that only such real property as is actually being used for the purposes of such foundation is exempt from taxation. Other realty held as investment would be taxed. As regards personal property, there is no tax.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion, is the exemption of such property equivalent to taxing all of the public for work of special interest to a part of the public and subject to the control only of a part?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no opinion on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. If foundations were taxed, would they be apt to keep in closer touch with public needs and would they be more apt to be interested in efficiency of government?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it would make any substantial difference.

Chairman WALSH. Should payment of foundation funds to members of the governing board be prohibited or specifically restricted in the act of incorporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It never had occurred to me that such a restriction or prohibition would be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Should any limit be placed upon reasonable compensation paid to members of the governing boards of such an institution?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had not supposed that that would be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any probability that officers of foundations will be paid larger salaries than would govern in universities and charitable and religious agencies?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As to that I couldn't say.

Chairman WALSH. Should any restrictions be placed upon allowances for expenses; for example, only the expenses of the officer or the officer and his immediate family?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not assume it would be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Should restrictions upon the payment of principal be made part of the incorporating act; as for example, that advance notice be given—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). Restrictions on payment of principal, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't understand.

Chairman WALSH. Should any restrictions be made upon the expenditure of principal, and should that be made a part of the incorporating act; as for instance, advance notice of such expenditure to the State officers, the public, or at least to members of the board?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think that was a matter which could properly be left to each board in its own by-laws. Mr. Chairman, I want to make clear the fact that in none of these foundations with which I am connected are any of the members of the boards compensated in any way. Of course, Mr. Chairman, I don't need to make clear the fact that the secretary of any such board would naturally be paid. I mean the members of the board other than the secretary. Of course, the treasurer—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The provision of the act seems to be that no officer, member, or employee of this corporation shall receive or be lawfully entitled to receive any pecuniary profits from the operation thereof except reasonable compensation for services in effecting one or more of its purposes or as a proper beneficiary of its strictly charitable purposes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had forgotten that that was in the act.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that Congress, or the legislature, should prescribe qualifications for trustees of such foundations as the Rockefeller fund?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it either necessary or desirable, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. As to professions, as to residence, as to previous experience, as to employment within the foundation itself at the time of election?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Should the incorporating act provide for the automatic withdrawal of trustees who are unable to attend, or who do not attend half, two-thirds, or four-fifths of the meetings of the board, or by regular committees of the board?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see any danger in interlocking directorates in these boards?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think on the other hand there might be a great strength in that.

Chairman WALSH. Is it on boards of foundations that are entirely independent, one of another? I am asking you now on the subject of interlocking directorates. First, do you see any danger in directors interlocking on the boards of foundations which are entirely independent of each other?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not. I should think if a man was a desirable member of one board, another board that had generally the same kind of questions to deal with, would be equally glad to get him, if they could.

Chairman WALSH. Then it follows that you see no objection to the acting of the same individual on several foundations that might be established by the same donor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No inherent objection.

Chairman WALSH. Is the question of the qualification and interlocking directorate a proper subject for charter, constitution, or by-law of such foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it necessary to be treated in the charter.

Chairman WALSH. Should benevolent corporations be required to report both fiscal and service operation to officers of the States, or National Government, which incorporate them as required by such State or National officer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Will you read that again, please?

Chairman WALSH. Should benevolent corporations be required to report both fiscal and service operations to officers of the States, or of the National Government, which incorporate them, as required by such State or National officer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is time now that corporations that have a Federal charter are required to report on fiscal matters; I think not on others. As regards corporations formed under State law, I think no report is required; but I think it is desirable that reports should be made to the public or to any specific officer that may be the best person to receive such report.

Chairman WALSH. Do those reports include both fiscal and service activities of the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They might well do that, Mr. Chairman. I do not suppose that the service activities of the foundation would be of great interest to the average State official.

Chairman WALSH. If you think that such reports are desirable, do you believe that they ought to be required by law?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it would be necessary to require them.

Chairman WALSH. Then, you do not think they should be required by law?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. On the ground of lack of necessity?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think they should be required.

Chairman WALSH. How should reports of these foundations be made then, if not required by law?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean through what medium?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. First, to whom should the report be made?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. To the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. And, then, how should publicity be given to it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think through the public prints and in any other manner that might bring about as wide publicity as possible, through the distribution of reports to as large a list of people who might be interested as might be made up; and publicity further sought in whatever ways might be suggested. I could not suggest them, though.

Chairman WALSH. How would you provide a check upon the accuracy of such reports by the public?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not assume that such a check was necessary, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Should the report contain the total number and character of applications received but not acted upon favorably?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it would be quite unwise to have a report include such data, because I think it would work an injustice to organizations which had made appeals and which might have been declined for no lack of appreciation of the organization, or no lack of belief in the value of its work, but simply because, as must necessarily often happen, such organizations from time to time might not be included in the then purposes of the board.

Chairman WALSH. My question was, should the report include the total number and character of applications received but not acted upon favorably?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should see no value in so requiring.

Chairman WALSH. Should work done by the foundation be reported upon as to scope, cost, and results?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Reported upon to whom, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. To the public.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I should assume that the annual report would cover generally such matters.

Chairman WALSH. Should that report cover the scope, character, and result of the work done by the foundation during the period covered by it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. The different classes of work, or just the total?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, it would be almost impossible to report on the work without saying what the different classes were, Mr. Chairman. I should think it would be desirable to make the reports just as full as, in the judgment of the directors, would be of interest to the public.

Chairman WALSH. Should power be lodged in any public body representing the people to remove, on charges, trustees of foundations who have either misused their power or who have failed to discharge their duties efficiently?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The necessity of such power I have not considered.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe now that such power should be lodged in some body representing the people?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not. I think a better way would be, as was previously stated, to lodge veto power in the selection of officers.

Chairman WALSH. Should the records of foundations incorporated by legislature or by Congress be open to public inspection as are the records of public offices?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think there might be no harm, and again there might be harm in exposing, as I have just stated, applications which have been made and declined for good reasons, the publication of which could serve no useful purpose.

Chairman WALSH. Could you suggest any method of public inspection more limited than the one I have first suggested which would be desirable?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not thought that any method of public inspection was desirable.

Chairman WALSH. Should such incorporating act require that when foundations materially modify their method of work, basis of allowances, fields, etc., special notice of the fact be given in advance of final action, both to public officers and to the public?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it entirely unnecessary.

Chairman WALSH. What means are now available to the public for ascertaining the work being done by large private foundations, such as the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What means are available?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, the Rockefeller Foundation has made numerous public statements from time to time with reference to various phases of its work which it thought would be currently of interest to the public, and the foundation is proposing, as I have stated, to publish an annual report and to give to that report the fullest publicity possible.

Chairman WALSH. Please state when the first public statement was made by the Rockefeller Foundation as to the work being done by it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not make that offhand, Mr. Chairman. There has been no complete public statement made. The first complete public statement will be the annual report; but, as I have stated, there have been public statements made from time to time regarding certain features and special features of work, as they have developed.

Chairman WALSH. Can you recall how many reports have been given publicity as to the work being done by the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not.

Chairman WALSH. You say you can not tell offhand. Will you please ascertain and give to the commission the date of the first report as to the work being done by the foundation and the number of such reports which have been given publicity?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think, Mr. Chairman, that all the publicity which has been given to the foundation is indicated in an exhibit in answer to one of the questions in the questionnaire which the commission has had.

Chairman WALSH. What page, please? Then the first statement issued was issued by Mr. Jerome D. Greene, secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, on October 1, 1914; is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, if this includes all, it is; I am not sure whether it does or not. I have forgotten what the question was which called forth this exhibit, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Then you can not say whether or not the answer to the questions propounded—the printed answer to the questions propounded by this commission give all the reports given out to the press as to the work of your foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not say offhand; but if you will allow me to turn to this question, I can probably tell you now.

Chairman WALSH. Question 26, on page 49:

“Please furnish copies of any bulletins, statements, or notices, issued to the press by the foundation.

“Answer. A complete list of statements issued to the press is furnished herewith. (See Exhibit D, p. 73.)”

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir; I should think that was accurate, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. So the first publicity given as to the work of the Rockefeller Foundation was the statement issued by Jerome D. Greene, October 1, 1914, and is entitled “The Rockefeller Foundation inaugurates a far-reaching investigation of industrial relations, and has appointed as director Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King, former minister of labor in Canada, author of industrial disputes act, and experienced mediator in labor disputes.”

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman, I think there have been statements made of very brief character from time to time, and in connection with different gifts made by the foundation. For instance, I have in mind a pledge to Wellesley College toward its building fund. I think a statement was made at the time that pledge was made, and my impression is that other statements regarding specific matters which have been dealt with have been made. I think a statement was made at the time of the purchase of a number of thousand of acres of land for a bird refuge in the Southern States. I think a public statement was made at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Who answered this question propounded by the commission, question 26, on page 49:

"Please furnish copies of any bulletin, statements, or notices issued to the press by the foundation, and then answered a complete list of the statements issued to the press is furnished herewith. (See Exhibit D, p. 73.)"

Who wrote that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I had to do with the writing of all these answers. I suppose that the secretary is the one that provided that matter, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Who is that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Jerome D. Greene.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if the next item is not on page 75, headed: "Released for publication in morning papers of Sunday, October 4," and entitled "For the preservation of bird life of the North American Continent, the Rockefeller Foundation has purchased 85,000 acres of land on the Gulf of Mexico and has placed it under the protection of the Louisiana Conservation Commission."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It may be that was the first announcement of that purchase; but my recollection is, Mr. Chairman, that an announcement was made some time before. Our purpose, of course, has been to give all of the statements as requested—all of the printed statements—and it may be this contains all. My impression is that earlier statements had been made. Mr. Greene, the secretary, could refresh my memory on that subject, and it will be easy to ascertain.

Chairman WALSH. It was your purpose, of course, to furnish an answer to the question which would show all the publicity which was given to the work of the Rockefeller Foundation and the date thereof as called for.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, I note that the next item of publicity is dated October 31, 1914, on page 77, and the next on page 79, dated November 8, 1914. Is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. So stated here, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And the next item of publicity on page 82, December 7, 1914, and the next on page 84, released for publication Tuesday, December 8.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, if this statement is not accurate and correct, I should be glad to have the opportunity of making it so.

Chairman WALSH. You may do so.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, it was my purpose that it should be, and I am assuming that it is; but my recollection was that statements had been made earlier.

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Well, you have stated that, and we will be glad to have any of the others if you wish to correct that; and, of course, I am not assuming that you did not desire to make answers just as requested.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think you have seen, Mr. Chairman, from the fullness with which these answers have been made, which required many days in their preparation, that the information has been given to this commission in the fullest and frankest way, answering every detail which the commission has sought.

Chairman WALSH. I will now call your attention to page 84 and resume the question, if the next publicity, which is headed "Released for publication Tuesday, December 8." That, I say, appears on page 84. Then, on page 85, there is a statement issued showing that it was released January 1, 1915.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It so appears.

Chairman WALSH. So that the publications as to the work of the Rockefeller Foundation appear to have been made between the dates of October 1, 1914, and January 1, 1915, so far as this answer is concerned, and you say that you will look up any publications prior to that time and submit them to the commission?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I will be glad to do so.

Chairman WALSH. But for the present the answer to the question there shows that they have all been made since October 1, 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes. If that proves to be the case, Mr. Chairman, as it doubtless will, it simply is an indication of the facts which I have already stated, that while the foundation would have expected, particularly in its first year of work when it was feeling its way along, to have made its first report at the time of the annual meeting, in view of the general interest in foundations which was created very naturally when the commission determined to look into such matters, it seemed to the foundation that it was highly desirable that full publicity should be given, without waiting for the annual report, of everything that was of interest that had been done up to that date.

Chairman WALSH. Did it not occur to the trustees to give publicity to any of this work prior to the asking of the questions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman; the several publications with reference to the Belgian relief, of course, had no relation whatever to the inquiry of this commission.

Chairman WALSH. Should facts in regard to conditional gifts to these foundations be stated to the public?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, in so far as such statement could be of public service to the recipient of the gift, I should say yes.

Chairman WALSH. Should the expenditure of additional gifts be separately accounted for to the public?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The expenditure of additional gifts?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Be separately accounted for?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I am asking now if you believe it to be desirable to give publicity to the activities of the foundation. Now, then, if any gifts are conditional, should the condition be stated to the public?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think that generally it would be wiser for the foundation to allow the recipient of the gift to state the conditions, if at all, in the way that would be most helpful to the object had in mind by the recipient.

Chairman WALSH. Is there apt to be confusion of work done by the foundation on its own initiative which is not separately reported from work done in its name by the initiative of a conditioning donor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not grasp the question.

Chairman WALSH. Is not a public statement desirable as to work being done by the foundation on its own initiative and work that is being done by the donor who has given that foundation a gift with certain conditions attached thereto?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it highly desirable that both gifts should be stated in the annual report, and those made public—both kinds of gifts.

Chairman WALSH. From the standpoint of inherent power to influence independent thought and action, do you see any material difference between a large foundation that gives away money and a foundation that itself spends its income or capital through investigations, business enterprises, and the like?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Will you kindly read the first part of the question again?

Chairman WALSH. From the standpoint of inherent power to influence independent thought and action, do you see any material difference between a large foundation that gives away money and a foundation that itself spends its income or capital through investigations, business enterprises, and the like?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know what kind of a foundation would spend its funds in business enterprises, Mr. Chairman. I thought we were dealing with philanthropic foundations.

Chairman WALSH. Could a foundation with the unrestricted power that the Rockefeller Foundation has conclude to engage in business as an agent or means of the betterment of mankind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be entirely contrary to its charter powers.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that the public welfare requires restrictions in the case of a giving corporation that are not intended with respect to an investigating corporation or vice versa?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am sorry; I will have to ask you to read the question again.

Chairman WALSH. Should there be any difference in a corporation that merely undertakes to give and a corporation that as well undertakes to investigate, we will say, social conditions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Difference in what respect, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. The public restriction.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I see no reason why there should be.

Chairman WALSH. No public restriction?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You ask if there should be any definite public restriction? I say "no."

Chairman WALSH. If a foundation had for its trustees gentlemen that were interested in large basic industries, do you think that any public restriction should be placed upon the activities of such foundations, so far as making investments was concerned, which might affect the financial welfare of the private corporations operating the industry?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the whole matter must be covered by a proper selection of the directors. In any such foundations whose directors have been carefully selected it seems to me that the interests of the public are best served when full discretion is left with directors in such matters.

Chairman WALSH. But does a foundation controlling a hundred million of dollars exert an influence in the financial world?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Simply as a large investor, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Is it considered a desirable connection for financial concerns?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean to have the opportunity of suggesting investments?

Chairman WALSH. I should think it would be. Might it be used to influence the standing of financial institutions and the prices of stocks?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't see how.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any inherent danger of that sort that should be guarded against by a foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not see what the danger is, if any.

Chairman WALSH. Is a foundation with $100,000,000 or more more dangerous than a foundation with $1,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is less dangerous.

Chairman WALSH. Is a foundation of $200,000,000 or $500,000,000 more powerful than one with $100,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You are dealing with figures so much beyond my ability to imagine, Mr. Chairman, that I could not express an opinion. I think generally that a large fund, as I have stated before, is more apt to have centered on it the thought and attention of the day than a small one, probably. Now, I should think that a fund of fifty or a hundred millions would be sufficiently large to benefit by that emphasis as contrasted with a fund of one or five or ten millions, and I should think that there would not be anything particularly gained by increasing the fund beyond that amount for the sake of increasing the public attention that will be paid to it.

Chairman WALSH. What safeguards, if any, should be provided for in acts of incorporation of large foundations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a very general question, Mr. Walsh.

Chairman WALSH. Well, we will say in the first place as to financial investments, should there be any?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it unwise.

Chairman WALSH. Should or should not the act incorporating it specifically provide at least the general lines upon which such foundation should proceed in the work of the betterment of mankind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it necessary.

Mr. WALSH. Do you believe, then, such foundations should have unlimited power under the general expression of its work being for the betterment of mankind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. With the constant and always near at hand power to amend and to rescind its charter which the legislature granting the charter has, I think the other matters are entirely safe in the hands of the directors.

Chairman WALSH. Should a large foundation retain supervisory relation over the different kinds of work which is aided by its gifts; namely, if $100,000 is given a college or to an investigating agency, should the foundation which gives require evidence as to how its gift is being expended, and with what result?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the two instances named are hardly parallel, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. You may separate them and answer the question first as to each one. If there is a different answer.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I believe it would be unwise for a foundation to make a contribution for an educational institution which was not made out-and-out.

Chairman WALSH. Why?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Which involve the foundation continuing or having any power of consecutively molding the policy of the educational institution. I think that contributions to educational institutions, generally speaking, should be made without retaining any sense of control on the part of the giver. As respects the making—

Chairman WALSH. First say why that should be, Mr. Rockefeller. What is your reason for that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Because I think every educational institution—I am speaking now particularly of the highest type, namely, colleges and universities—should be entirely free to express itself as its respective board of trustees and faculties may from time to time think to be in the interest of the institution.

Chairman WALSH. Any other reason?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is the chief reason, I think; an important reason. I do not think at the moment of any other.

Chairman WALSH. Then I will ask you the separate question: Should a large foundation retain supervisory relation—I will ask you the direct question first: In an educational institution do you believe that the large foundations undertake to retain a supervisory control over their benefactions or undertake to require evidence as to how their gift is to be expended, and what the results would be—that the foundation giving the money would exercise undue influence over the education of the children or the individual in the school?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think that case would bring in another element, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Bring it in then.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have expressed my view with reference to contributions to universities and colleges. I would say that in the development of a school system of primary and the other grades of schools there might be instances where it would be desirable for foundations to help to cooperate in developing a system. And if such instances arose I should think that the foundation should be free to cooperate along those lines. Whereas, with the university or college which had been established and had a fixed policy, well known and understood, I should think any control would be unwise.

Chairman WALSH. Well, for what reason?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The former or the latter?

Chairman WALSH. Both. Begin with the first and give that and then give the second. In other words, do you believe in the first instance, that the education of the individual in the school first mentioned might be influenced by the views of the man that gave the money to the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If you are referring to the Rockefeller Foundation or General Education Board, I may say unqualifiedly that the views of the man who gave the money have never reached to the recipient of the gift, except in so far as in the case of the Rockefeller Foundation the man who gave the money is a member of the board, and is looked to for his expression of opinion whenever he is willing to give it, the same as any other member of the board. I have expressed my view as to the reason why it seems to me unwise for the foundation to make a gift to a college or university, and maintain a subsequent hold on the institution through that gift, because I think that institutions of that character which are naturally directed and maintained by the leading men of the community or of the country are much better managed by those who deal with the specific and current requirements of that institution; but if on the other hand an educational foundation or a foundation capable of entering into educational work was to go into an unsettled or undeveloped section of the country where public schools have not been developed, I can conceive that a service might be rendered in helping develop a system of public schools.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I wish you would get back to my question, if you please, Mr. Rockefeller. In the instance of the first schools that you have mentioned, do you believe that the extension of money aid to those schools, followed by a supervision as to how the gift was expended and the results, leaving the Rockefeller Foundation out of the question, might result in the persons being educated taking the viewpoint, consciously or unconsciously, of the man that gave the money or of the foundation that gave the money?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would be, of course, appropriate and necessary that the foundation making the contribution to any college or university should have the assurances that the gift was spent in accordance with the purpose for which it was given. I think such assurance is quite proper and desirable. After the gift had been made and the assurance had been received that it had been or was being spent for the purposes for which it was intended, I should think that the foundation would be unwise if it desired to continue, because of that gift, to have any control over that institution.

Chairman WALSH. I will now ask Mr. Langdon to read the question, please, which I asked, and I would be obliged if you will give a direct answer to it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have tried to give it, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps I may not be correct, but I do not accept it as a direct answer.

(Question read as follows: "Now, I wish you would get back to my question, if you please, Mr. Rockefeller. In the instance of the first schools that you have mentioned, do you believe that the extension of money aid to those schools by a supervision as to how the gift was expended and the results, leaving the Rockefeller Foundation out of the question, might result in the persons being educated taking the viewpoint, consciously or unconsciously, of the man that gave the money or of the foundation that gave the money?")

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You have asked two questions, one relates to a gift to educational institutions—

Chairman WALSH. If it requires two answers I may have to ask two questions. But we will leave that to be answered in the morning.

We will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning, at 10 o'clock. Please resume the stand at that time, Mr. Rockefeller.

(At 4.30 o'clock p. m. Tuesday, January 26, 1915, an adjournment was taken until to-morrow, Wednesday, January 27, 1915, at 10 o'clock a. m. at the same place.)

NEW YORK CITY, January 27, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. We will proceed with the hearing now.

Mr. Rockefeller, will you please resume the stand.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. When you left the stand last evening, Mr. Rockefeller, I asked you a question and you have not yet been afforded an opportunity to answer. I will read the question to you:

"In the instance of the first schools which you have mentioned, do you believe that the extension of money aid to the schools by a supervision as to how the gift was expended and the results, leaving the Rockefeller Foundation out of the question for the time being, might result in the persons being educated taking the viewpoint, consciously or unconsciously, of the man that gave the money or of the foundation that gave the money?"

Your answer was that it required two answers, one relating to a gift to educational institutions, so I will ask you these questions and will ask you to give us the answer as briefly as possible.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had understood, Mr. Chairman, that your question originally related to colleges and also to primary education, and that is why I said it needed to be divided.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would define those yourself, if possible. I would prefer not to go right to the question, but just answer that question as applying to both.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I can not give a single answer that will convey my thought with reference to the two, because my view is different with reference to each. In regard to the higher form of education, my answer would be I think there is a possible danger if the giver retains any kind of a control; I think it is unwise.

Chairman WALSH. Now as to the next, the other form?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As to the lower forms of education, I see many instances which might arise in helping to develop an educational system where it would be highly desirable that any educational board that had experts so familiar with such matters should be in touch for some period in helping to develop such a school system. I think the danger there would be much more remote.

Chairman WALSH. Refer, please, to page 19, of the answers to the questionnaire submitted by the commission, Mr. Rockefeller.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. In schedule under A, "Charter of the Rockefeller Foundation," I will read you preliminary to a few questions which I have to ask about that clause of the law which states the objects and powers of the foundation: "John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Frederick T. Gates, Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Starr J. Murphy, Jerome D. Greene, Wickliffe Rose, and Charles O. Heydt, together with such persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of the Rockefeller Foundation, for the purpose of receiving and maintaining a fund or funds and applying the income and principal thereof to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world. It shall be within the purposes of said corporation to use as a means to that end research, publication, the establishment and maintenance of charitable, benevolent, religious, missionary, and public educational activities, agencies, and institutions, and the aid of any such activities, agencies, and institutions already established and any other means and agencies which from time to time shall seem expedient to its members or trustees."

Now, the charter was obtained from the State of New York upon what date, please, if you have it in mind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. This says just above there, Mr. Chairman, "became a law May 14, 1913, and with the approval of the governor."

Chairman WALSH. Now, prior to that time, had an application been made by the gentlemen desiring to institute this foundation for a Federal charter to the Congress of the United States?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There had.

Chairman WALSH. And please state, if you have in mind, when that application was made to Congress.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I have the data right here, Mr. Chairman. On March 2, 1910, a bill—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). March 2, 1910?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (continuing). A bill was introduced in the Senate.

Chairman WALSH. Who had the bill introduced?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Do you mean who took the matter up from our office?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; first.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think Mr. Murphy, as one of our associates. My impression is that he took it up.

Chairman WALSH. Who drafted the bill in its original form?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think Mr. Murphy drafted the bill, following, as he stated in his testimony before the Senate committee, following almost the exact phraseology of the bill granted by Congress previously to the General Education Board.

Chairman WALSH. Now, after that was introduced in Congress, was a hearing had before the House committee on the bill?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Before the Senate committee?

Chairman WALSH. Was there any before the House committee, first?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, I don't recall any such, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. Now, the bill passed the House of Representatives, did it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That bill, I think, did not, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I know that bill—but a bill chartering the Rockefeller Foundation did pass the House of Representatives, did it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I read you just half a page there covering that bill and the other bill?

Chairman WALSH. If you will allow me to put this to you, logically, Mr. Rockefeller, I think it will save a great deal of time, and I am going to do that. Did the lower House, the House of Representatives, pass a bill chartering the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It did.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, I will ask you to turn to page 97 of the answers to the questionnaire submitted by this commission, please, and ask you have you that page?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have, sir.

Chairman WALSH. If before that bill was passed the following amendments were not made to it—tell me please:

"Section 3: Congress specifically reserves the right to impose such limitations upon the objects of the corporation as it may deem the public interest demands.

"Section 5: The total amount of property held at any time, whether absolutely or in trust, is limited to $100,000,000.

"Section 6: The income of the property is not to be accumulated or added to the principal, but is to be currently applied to the objects of the corporation.

"Section 7: The corporation is empowered to distribute the principal of any property 50 years after its receipt; it is required to make such distribution after 100 years, if Congress shall so direct.

"Section 9: The election of new members of the corporation is subject to disapproval within 60 days by the four Federal officers and five university presidents specified in the bill."

And on the following page, 98, amendments made by the House Committee on the Judiciary:

"Section 1: The following persons are added to the list of incorporators: Harry Pratt Judson, Wickliffe Rose, Simon Flexner, and Edwin A. Alderman, making nine in all.

"Section 3, on page 2, line 4, after the word 'promotion,' are inserted the words 'by eleemosynary and philanthropic means.'

"Section 8: The minimum number of members of the corporation is increased from five to nine. In the event of the number of members falling below nine the corporation is forbidden to make any gifts until the vacancies are filled."

Those amendments were added, I believe, in the House of Representatives?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They were.

Chairman WALSH. And did the bill then go to the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It did.

Chairman WALSH. Did you appear before the Senate yourself, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Murphy appear before the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think not.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Jerome D. Greene appear before the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Whether he appeared before the Senate committee or not, I do not know. He appeared before some representatives.

Chairman WALSH. After the bill was amended, as I read the amendments to you, a unanimous report favorable to the passage of the bill was made by the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives, was it not? The bill was passed and sent to the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And in the Senate the bill was referred to the Judiciary Committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have no record of that. Very likely—doubtless that is true.

Chairman WALSH. I call your attention to page 102 of the answers to the questions there.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have it.

Chairman WALSH. When the bill reached the Senate Judiciary Committee I will ask you if Mr. Jerome D. Greene, on behalf of the other gentlemen—himself and the other gentlemen promoting the bill—did not send the following communication to the Senate:

"The bill to incorporate the Rockefeller Foundation, after a unanimous report by the Judiciary Committee of the House, was passed on January 20 by a vote of 152 to 65 and sent to the Senate.

"This bill was originally introduced by Senator Gallinger in 1910 and favorably reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia. At this point it received wide discussion in the press and some criticism, but the latter proceeded largely from sources by no means hostile to the general purposes of the proposed foundation, and directed toward the improvement of the bill in certain particulars. With the cordial approval of the incorporators the bill was accordingly amended and reintroduced by Senator Gallinger as Senate bill 2675, which is substantially the same as House bill 21532, the significant changes being the insertion of the words, 'By eleemosynary and philanthropic means,' as an explicit qualification of all the activities of the foundation; and the increase of the minimum number of members of the corporation from five to nine, together with a provision that no gifts could be legally made by the foundation so long as the members should remain by any chance less than nine. With reference to the criticisms and suggestions that have been made before the public the following features of the bill in its present form should be noted:

"(1) The element of perpetuity has been removed, provision having been made for the dissolution of the corporation and the distribution of its funds, either voluntarily or at the direction of Congress.

"(2) The amount of the endowment has been limited and the income is to be spent, not added to the principal.

"(3) The trusts are not to be a close corporation, the election of new members being subject to disapproval by certain specified representatives of the public interest.

"(4) Congress has complete power to impose such limitations upon the objects of the corporation as the public interest may demand; and all gifts must be accepted subject to this provision.

"(5) No exemption from State taxation is or constitutionally could be, conferred by the bill, and no exemption whatever is conferred with respect to real estate.

"(6) A charter is sought through Congress solely because the gift is to the people of the United States, and is to be controlled by them rather than in the interest, however beneficent, of any one section.

"The accompanying circular gives the history of the measure up to the time of its latest introduction into the House and also describes in some detail the changes referred to above and the considerations on which they were based. I trust that you will recognize in these features of the present bill an ample safeguard against any dangers that may have been attributed to the original plan, and that by promoting the early passage of the bill you will enable the incorporators to enter upon the important work along the lines of education, research, and public health, to which we are pledged.

"Respectfully, yours,

"JEROME D. GREENE,

"Trustee for the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research and member of the General Education Boards."

That circular, I believe, was sent to the Members of the United States Senate, that circular letter. Is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman; it is so stated.

Chairman WALSH. Please, now, refer to page 101 of the answers to the questionnaire: The bill, when it reached the amended stage in the Senate, provided it not—

"That the successors to the incorporators named herein and the additional members of the corporation and their successors shall be elected by the members of the corporation for the time being, but before such election shall become effective written notice thereof shall be mailed by said corporation to each of the following-named persons at his official post-office address, viz: The President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the presidents of the following institutions, viz: Harvard University, Cambridge, Mass.; Yale University, New Haven, Conn.; Columbia University, New York City, N. Y.; Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, Md.; and the University of Chicago, Chicago, Ill.

"If such election shall be disapproved by a majority of the persons above named, it shall be void; but it shall become effective if and when it shall be approved by such majority, or at the expiration of 60 days from the mailing of such notices, if it shall not have been disapproved by such majority."

Now, that provision had been added to the bill?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did that bill in that form pass the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It did not.

Chairman WALSH. Was it ever submitted to the vote of the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was not acted upon by the Senate.

Chairman WALSH. The Senate adjourned before the bill was acted upon, I believe; is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. The charter, which you are now operating under, was obtained from the State of New York?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And the bill that passed was a senate bill and introduced by Senator Foley, of New York?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not recall. Have you the facts? I presume that is correct.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know who drew the bill that was submitted by Senator Foley? We will assume that he introduced it; the record so shows.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it was practically the same bill that was originally introduced in the Senate in 1910.

Chairman WALSH. But without these amendments which I have read to you that were in the Peters bill?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. The original bill without these restrictions or so-called safeguards?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Without the amendments.

Chairman WALSH. Who asked Senator Foley to introduce the bill, if you know, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I presume Mr. Murphy did; that is my recollection.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Starr J. Murphy?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Was the request to Senator Foley in writing or verbal?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not recall; I do not know that I ever knew.

Chairman WALSH. Will you ascertain whether or not there was any request from Mr. Starr J. Murphy to Senator Foley to introduce this bill; and if there was such, will you kindly produce it to the commission?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Greene, who is here, says to me that he asked Senator Foley, not Mr. Murphy—Mr. Greene.

Chairman WALSH. Then I will leave that subject, if you have no knowledge of it, until Mr. Greene takes the witness stand. You do not know Senator Foley?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. You do not know what was said to him or anything that was written to him about this bill, of your own knowledge?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I might have known at the time, but I do not recall; it was simply a matter of routine business.

Chairman WALSH. Had the Congress of the United States adjourned prior to the time that Senator Foley introduced this bill in the New York Legislature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. When was it decided to seek incorporation in New York State?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As soon as Congress had adjourned and had not acted upon the measure.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any particular reason why Senator Foley was secured to introduce the bill—why it was introduced through Senator Foley—that you know?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I know of, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Was any written explanation of Mr. Rockefeller's purpose submitted with the proposed bill to the New York Legislature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Was the publicity material used in 1912 and 1913, while the bill was pending in Congress, submitted to the New York Legislature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As to any of that detail I could not tell you.

Chairman WALSH. Was the correspondence which Mr. Jerome D. Greene had with the Congress of the United States submitted to the New York Legislature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Was any public notice issued by your office of the intention to introduce this bill in the New York Legislature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would have been rather strange if there had been such public notice issued; I do not know that there was.

Chairman WALSH. You say it would have been rather strange if there had been?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What is your recollection of that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall any such notice being issued.

Chairman WALSH. Was any public hearing held upon the bill while it was pending in the New York Legislature?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not recall, from my own knowledge.

Chairman WALSH. The bill was introduced March 25, 1913, I believe your record shows?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not the records right here. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Greene has handed me this statement, answering that last question, and perhaps it will clear the matter up if you will allow me to read it.

Chairman WALSH. Just for the sake of time and having our record straight, I would like to take your testimony, and if you are not conversant with the details and you will say so and he will preserve this memorandum, he can answer as to that, and your testimony will be yours and Mr. Greene's testimony will be his. You may make any explanation on that score, as long as you have it in your hand.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is not material, but it answers your question and I have it here.

Chairman WALSH. Well, read it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Greene says:

"I asked the majority leader who should introduce the bill, and he suggested Senator Foley. I then went to the leaders of the Progressive and Republican Parties in the house and was assured of their hearty support. The bill was passed unanimously, and the charter was drawn following the precedent established by other foundations practically word for word."

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Rockefeller and his associates believe that the safeguards provided for in the amendment in the bill as submitted to the Congress of the United States were in the public interest?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. We all believed that the provisions were entirely satisfactory, if it were thought best to put them in. We did not ourselves think they gave a strength to the bill.

Chairman WALSH. I call your attention, Mr. Rockefeller, to the statement made by Dr. Jacob Schurman. Did you read that? It was made on Friday, April 22, 1910, before the Cornell congress?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I probably did read it, Mr. Chairman; but I do not know to just what you refer.

Chairman WALSH. I will read an extract from it referring to this bill that was introduced in Congress, and which afterwards became a law by the act of the New York Legislature, and ask you if you consider, as one of the incorporators of the foundation, that it has the scope suggested by Dr. Schurman, as follows:

"Under the terms of this broad charter there is scarcely anything which concerns the life and work of individuals or nations in which the Rockefeller Foundation would not be authorized to participate. As the safety of the State is the supreme condition of national civilization the foundation might in time of war use its income or its entire principal for the defense of the Republic. In time of peace it might use its funds to affect economic and political reforms which the trustees deem essential to the vitality and efficiency of the Republic. The foundation might become the champion of free trade or protection, of trusts, or of the competing concerns out of which they grow, of socialism or individualism, of the program of the Republican Party or the program of the Democratic Party. It might endow the clergy of all religious denominations, or it might subsidize any existing or any new religious denomination. Tomorrow it might be the champion of the Christian religion and a hundred years hence furnish an endowment for the introduction of Buddhism into the United States. It might build tenement houses for the poor in New York City or carry the results of science to enrich the exhausted soils of the East or the arid tracts of the West. It might set up an art gallery in every State of the United States or endow universities which would rival the great State universities of the West. With the consent of the legislature it might relieve any State of the care of its insane, pauper, and dependent classes or construct roads for the benefit of farmers and motorists. These may not be likely objects for the application of the funds of the Rockefeller Foundation. I am not, however, attempting to forecast its work but to understand its charter. And so far as I can see the proposed charter would authorize all these and a multitude of similar activities. If the object of the Rockefeller Foundation is to be coextensive with human civilization, then it may do anything and everything which its trustees think likely to effect reform or improvement in the material, economic, intellectual, artistic, religious, moral, and political condition of the American people or of mankind."

Do you take that view of the broad powers and scope of the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not, Mr. Chairman, because I think you will find in the charter that the Rockefeller Foundation is to proceed by philanthropic and eleemosynary means, a strictly legal expression which is put in such charters. I think those expressions are there.

Chairman WALSH. Now, are they all in section 1? Just go back to section 1, please.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Which page, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. Page 19 of the questionnaire, and I will ask you the question, to get it straight in the record, and to clear up the minds of the commission on it, if those very words were not left out of the charter introduced by Senator Foley in the Legislature of New York?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did not know whether they were left out or not. I supposed they were in.

Chairman WALSH. I will read it again to you, because I am going to ask you a few specific questions along that line, if this is what is not said in the charter under which you are now operating, and I want to get your understanding of this also, Mr. Rockefeller, and not the understanding of Mr. Greene or any person else, if this is what is not said, and if it is not all that is said:

"Sec. 1. John D. Rockefeller, John D. Rockefeller, jr., Frederick T. Gates, Harry Pratt Judson, Simon Flexner, Starr J. Murphy, Jerome D. Greene, Wickliffe Rose, and Charles O. Heydt, together with such persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of the Rockefeller Foundation, for the purpose of receiving and maintaining a fund or funds and applying the income and principal thereof to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world. It shall be within the purposes of said corporation to use as means to that end research, publication, the establishment and maintenance of charitable, benevolent, religious, missionary, and public educational activities, agencies and institutions, and the aid of any such activities, agencies, and institutions already established and any other means and agencies which from time to time shall seem expedient to its members or trustees."

Does not your present charter contain that provision and none other limiting your activities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; that is as it reads, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. As it reads. Now, then, I am going to ask you some further questions a little more specific, as to your ideas of the powers of this corporation. Could this corporation under that provision that I have read to you circulate a presidential message?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, I do not know. I could not answer that. I never have thought of the things that it could do.

Chairman WALSH. Could it circulate a party platform, a political party platform?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it would be utterly inappropriate and entirely contrary to anything that was in the mind of the founders or of the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. But as I understand you the founders are to be perpetuated by the vote of this board and go on through time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman; but at any point in the history of the world when the foundation has done anything that is in the judgment of the people contrary to the public interest, the charter can at once be rescinded or amended by the legislature, and that is the one power which we have always thought was utterly and entirely sufficient to protect it. We have purposely left the charter in that way, that it should be broad in its scope so that as the years went by each generation could do the things that it regarded in the common interest with those funds.

Chairman WALSH. Is the provision that you have just mentioned in the charter that you are now operating under?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The provision of the State legislature—

Chairman WALSH. Or do you say that that is the general law upon the subject?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The provision that the State legislature—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). May amend at any time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was not necessary to put it in because it is the law on the subject.

Chairman WALSH. You take that as your opinion of the general law upon the subject?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am told that that is the law of the State in regard to any charter.

Chairman WALSH. Please answer these questions—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The State has the power to rescind or to amend the charter and it was on that understanding that we presented the bill in this form.

Chairman WALSH. Was that provision put in the law as amended by Congress that it could be amended at any time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In what law, Mr. Chairman?

Chairman WALSH. In the proposed law that passed the House of Representatives, but did not pass the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The bill to incorporate the foundation?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; did it not contain the specific provision that it could be amended at any time?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It did; and it was put in simply because the public did not seem to understand that the Congress which was asked to grant the charter had the same power which the State and legislature had to amend it or to rescind it at any time.

Chairman WALSH. Did the person who advised you as to the law upon the subject make any suggestion as to what the state of the law might be with reference to contracts already entered into by the corporation under this charter before an attempt was made to repeal or modify it and which had been wholly or partially performed by individuals or organizations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, I will go through as rapidly as I can the certain activities that I wish to ask you whether or not in your opinion you think could be entered into legally under the provisions which I have read to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, may I say my opinion will be utterly valueless on that, because I have not thought of all the things that the foundation may do.

Chairman WALSH. You may answer it in that way by simply saying that you do not know, or you have not thought of it. I am going over them rapidly.

May it circulate a criticism of a church or religious body?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should have no opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Might it circulate editorials written by newspapers or other publications in regard to the Government and its branches?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I ask, for my guidance in answering the question, do you mean could it legally?

Chairman WALSH. Could it legally.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Has it the power to do it?

Chairman WALSH. Has it the power to do it. Suppose a speech was made in Congress, and a newspaper or magazine published an editorial—the speech was made in Congress at any time affecting some activity of the foundation—for instance, I will just take this: Suppose it was an investigation into industrial relations; would it be within the scope of the powers of the foundation when that editorial was published to use the money in circulating it among the people?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think a lawyer would have to answer that, Mr. Chairman; I could not construe the law.

Chairman WALSH. Might it buy a chain of stores?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say decidedly not.

Chairman WALSH. Might it decide to render its benevolent services through business enterprises, partially or wholly?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it could not.

Chairman WALSH. Might it organize a real estate company for the purpose of building model houses, or some such activity, and employ all of its capital in that company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression would be that it might.

Chairman WALSH. Might the foundation, if it wished, conduct a propaganda against trade-unionism?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say no.

Chairman WALSH. Might it conduct a propaganda in favor of workmen's compensation acts?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say no.

Chairman WALSH. Might it conduct a propaganda against workmen's compensation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Same answer.

Chairman WALSH. Might it finance its institutions subject to opposition to trades-unions or subject to the condition that they could not circulate literature upon the subject of trades-unions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say no.

Chairman WALSH. Might it pay for advertising space for its own activities and in behalf of its own activities, no matter what they might be?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Might it furnish funds to pay publicity agents to give out publicity regarding the activities of the company, of the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And suppose now the foundation—I will see if I can strike a concrete case. The foundation now has in its employ Mr. Mackenzie King, has it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Mackenzie King's letter to you upon the subject of the plan that might be used in Colorado, if made to the foundation, the funds of the foundation could be used to give that wide publicity throughout the Nation, could it not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think whatever the directors felt was in the interest of the work in hand would be appropriate.

Chairman WALSH. That could be sent out, and it could be in that way matched against any publicity that through individuals or portions of the press would be given to the other side of the work?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know what you mean by "matched," Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I will draw this illustration if I can or will take this concrete case: We will suppose that Mr. Frank J. Hayes, of the United Mine Workers of America, or Mr. Edward J. Doyle, made a speech in a hall some place, desiring great publicity and urging the proposition that the workmen—their proposition—I am not passing on it of course—that workmen could not be organized in a way to secure proper conditions except by national means, by means of a great body of men getting together with a treasury that might maintain them in case they wanted to strike and calling upon the thought of the American people to back them in that plea and furnishing whatever argument they might have. That speech might receive publication, we will say, in the Denver Post or the New York Sun; and under the constitution and powers of your foundation, if Mr. Mackenzie King gave forth his views to the effect that that was not the proper way, but that the proper way was to have a committee, one man from each mine or three single men selected by the management of a mining company, that being a member of the foundation the funds could be used to circulate broadcast the statement of Mr. Mackenzie King as a statement against the views of Mr. Doyle or Mr. Hayes.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't see why any foundation should not have the same right to legitimate means of publicity as any such organization as you have spoken of.

Chairman WALSH. So that could be done. Now, where would you draw the line, then, as the dispenser of the money for philanthropic and charitable purposes of yourself, Mr. Rockefeller, and in your capacity as a personal adviser to your father's investments and in your capacity as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? How could you, in human understanding, draw that line?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Will you repeat the question, kindly, Mr. Chairman?

(Question read, as follows: "Now, where would you draw the line, then, as the dispenser of the money for philanthropic and charitable purposes of yourself, Mr. Rockefeller, and in your capacity as a personal adviser as to your father's investments and in your capacity as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.? How could you, in human understanding, draw that line?")

Mr. Chairman, the question is apparently based upon the assumption that if a man has one interest he can not be conscientious in the performance of his duty in relation to any other interest. That is not the basis on which the foundation has proceeded. If that basis were accepted, no man could do but one thing. I am assuming that there are men in this country, and hundreds of thousands of them, who can be trusted to try to do what they think is right in various circumstances; and if there can not be found men who can be so trusted, then there should be no funds, and there should be no responsibility of any kind given to men. I think we must rely upon the integrity of men to a great degree in all the matters of life.

Chairman WALSH. I asked you if you felt—do you notice, Mr. Rockefeller, what might be called a divided duty in the matter that I suggested to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do.

Chairman WALSH. That is, as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., if you believed that the men ought not to organize, that it was financially to your disadvantage that they should organize, that as a director of the Rockefeller Foundation you were advised by Mr. Mackenzie King or by whomever made your investigation, that as an abstract social proposition they should be allowed to organize, and if the majority of the advisers of your father's investments should decide that they should be allowed to organize, but that certain definite limits should be put upon them, would you not recognize there, or do you not recognize there, a divided duty which might arise and which would make it impossible for you to act in one capacity without doing an injustice to the other or without contradicting your action in the other capacity?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Will you—was that question at the outset purporting to be a statement of my views with reference to organization, because you stated that I was opposed to organization?

Chairman WALSH. No, sir—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). Opposed to the organization of labor?

Chairman WALSH. No; that is a hypothetical question and contains assumptions that do not bind the interrogator or not bind you in the answer as proving anything therein.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, sir. It is understood that the question in its premises is hypothetical?

Chairman WALSH. Entirely.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should regard myself as unfit to serve either as a member of the Rockefeller Foundation or on the directorate of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. if I was not capable of forming opinions that would be fair in a case like that in relation to both matters.

Chairman WALSH. Suppose that Mr. Mackenzie King, in his letter of August 6, had said to you that from the study he had made that in his opinion the only fair way to handle the situation in Colorado was to recognize the United Mine Workers of America and allow them to put in the check-off system, to require the company to collect the dues of the men; would you have acted in that way as a director and followed that way as a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not consider that question as a director. If it came up in his report as a member of the Rockefeller Foundation, in which I have one vote with many others, I should hope as a director of that corporation to use my best judgment. I could not do more, Mr. Chairman; and I fancy that the officers of the Western Federation of the United Mine Workers of America would have confidence enough in me to believe that I would be fair in such a matter.

Chairman WALSH. Then upon the next day or the same day you met with the board of directors of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. you would feel free then to cast your vote in a way which would be diametrically opposed to the way you cast it in the foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should feel free to do what I thought was right on both occasions, if the two were diametrically opposed.

Chairman WALSH. And on the same day?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The date would not make any difference, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. The date would not make any difference? Now I read further from President Schurman's address, and I will ask you a question or two. He refers to Mr. Murphy's declaration as follows:

“That is one characteristic of all these boards Mr. Rockefeller has created. There is not on one of his boards”—

This is a quotation by Dr. Schurman of Mr. Murphy—

“There is not on one of his boards a single man who has been appointed there for any other reason than his qualifications to contribute something of substance to the work of that particular board. There is not a stick of deadwood in it, and there is not a piece of ornamental timber anywhere.”

Now, follow what Dr. Schurman says, and I say that because I am not going to read this all, and, as you probably know, Dr. Schurman here pays high tribute to the present organization and to the intent, objects, and acts of your father in making the gift.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I thank you for so stating.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I would not want it to appear as though I was giving extracts, but I want to call attention to what Dr. Schurman may have considered as a criticism and ask you your opinion on that. He follows:

“This is extraordinarily high praise for any board. And I doubt very much whether any of us who have had experience on different boards could truthfully repeat the encomium which Mr. Murphy passes, and I doubt not deservedly passes, on the boards established by Mr. Rockefeller. But this encomium, which I venture to say differentiates Mr. Rockefeller's boards from almost all other boards in the world, is not a proof but, if anything, a refutation of Mr. Murphy's claim that a self-perpetuating board of trustees is the best form of organization for the proposed foundation. Why is it that Mr. Rockefeller has secured boards whose members all have peculiar qualifications for the work, who all contribute something of importance to the position of the board, and not one of whom could be described as a stick of deadwood or a piece of ornamental timber? Is it because of any miraculous efficacy in a self-perpetuating board? Directly the reverse is true. It is because these boards are, as they very naturally should be, dominated by Mr. Rockefeller's influence, because Mr. Rockefeller and the associates whom he has trained have themselves selected the new members. In other words, the unique virtues and excellencies which characterize Mr. Rockefeller's boards are due ultimately to the single fact that Mr. Rockefeller is a man of transcendent genius for business organization. I desire that the public should have the benefit of that transcendent genius in all his philanthropic schemes so long as Mr. Rockefeller lives, and even so long as his spirit and influence may be supposed to survive in his family and associates. But his amazing skill and success in organizing his philanthropic enterprises is no argument for a close corporation with a self-perpetuating board of trustees. We can only hope that when the day comes—which we all fervently desire may be far off—that Mr. Rockefeller is no longer here to select his boards, some other elector or electors may be found who will in some measurable degree imitate the success he has so conspicuously achieved; but that fifty or a hundred years hence, when Mr. Rockefeller and his son are no longer living, the then existing board of trustees of the Rockefeller Foundation would be the ablest and wisest electors of their associates on the board is a proposition I can not accept, no matter by whom it is made or with what assurance it is asserted. Mr. Murphy's argument in a single sentence is that because Mr. Rockefeller has proved himself almost infallibly wise in the selection of his associates in the philanthropic work of giving away his fortune for the benefit of mankind, therefore a group of men fifty or a hundred years hence, who are named by men who have been named by other men who have been named by still other men who have been named by Mr. Rockefeller will evince the same infallible wisdom. What a stupendous claim to apostolic succession and infallibility! But it is a mere fiction of the lawyer."

Do you agree with that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that it was ever contemplated that my father or his associates could continue to have their influence felt; but at any time in any generation, when the board having the charge of such a foundation is not, in the judgment of the public, a proper board, the legislature can introduce an amendment limiting, qualifying, and modifying the method of election of directors, and adding at that time any restriction which it may think desirable. Our thought was that until experience had taught along what lines it was wisest to put up barriers the public interest would best be served by leaving the matter as free as possible, and leave each generation to put up such barriers and safeguards as it might think necessary at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any objection now to the charter being amended, the New York charter, so that the governor of the State of New York, the chief justice of the court of last resort of the State of New York, the president of the New York Senate, the speaker of the house of representatives, the presidents of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and the University of Chicago shall have the same veto power that was given to the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and those same college presidents in the act which passed the House of Representatives and was submitted in the Senate?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If you ask whether I have any objections, I say no. If you ask whether I think it is wise, I say I think it would not be wise.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. I have been asked to ask you this question by another commissioner, and I will ask it at this point: Can the legislature invalidate work already done by any action with respect to the charter of the original foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a legal question I could not answer.

Chairman WALSH. Why is it not, when it has the power of revision or repeal of the general charter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't know.

Chairman WALSH. Why do you think it is unwise in New York State to have the veto power which I have read to you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not think it is unwise in New York State any more than it would be unwise in Congress. I simply think we do not know enough yet about the desirability for limiting and protecting such a fund to make action at this time necessary or wise, when it can be done at any time. I should rather act on experience, rather than in forecasting the future.

Chairman WALSH. What study have you made of the work of the world on the establishment and maintenance of foundations for philanthropic and educational purposes?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What do you mean by "what study"? That I have written—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). No; I would have asked you what you had written on it, if I had wanted that. I asked you what study you had made.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have never made any study. It is a question I have discussed and thought of very extensively.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know that there has been a vast experience in the world on the subject of perpetuating large fortunes or large sums of money for specific purposes?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do; but that is not the condition here. When sums of money are perpetuated for specific purposes, which purpose may cease to exist as time goes on, I think such perpetuation very unwise.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have some attorney or some student of history or expert make a study of the activities of the world in times past with reference to tying up large sums of money for special or general purposes after the death of the owner?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I never caused such a study to be made; but a study of an informal character was made by various of the men interested in seeking this charter.

Chairman WALSH. Please state what studies, if any, you made of it, Mr. Rockefeller. What countries did it cover?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have made no formal studies. I have simply talked with other people who I thought would have information on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall with whom you talked?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I could not begin to say, Mr. Chairman. I have talked with any man who I thought might have information.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you stated that the foundation had decided to publish an annual report?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did.

Chairman WALSH. When was that decision arrived at?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think some time last winter.

Chairman WALSH. Was it the subject of a resolution by the board of trustees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I can not recall whether there was formal action taken. It was the consensus of opinion at a board of trustees' meeting that it was desirable and should be done.

Chairman WALSH. It was at a meeting of a full board of directors or a quorum of the board of directors?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is my impression.

Chairman WALSH. I don't know whether I asked you yesterday or not, but if I did, you may answer just briefly. Do you think that the charter for such an organization as this should require annual publications of the money spent and work done?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think you did yesterday, and I may have said "no." I see no possible harm, however, in such required publication, and I think there would be a certain advantage in having a definite requirement of that kind for any such bodies.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I will ask you a few questions in regard, again, to Mr. King. Mr. King's letter which you read—by the way, do you have the original letter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; I have it right here, Mr. Chairman. I have the original and I have a copy. Will you have both, or see the original and keep the copy?

Chairman WALSH. It is immaterial; just as you say.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Do you care to have me read the parts not included in the letter read yesterday?

Chairman WALSH. I do not, unless you have some desire in that direction.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; not at all.

Chairman WALSH. Now, this letter was written, I see, from The Roxborough, Ottawa, on August 6, 1914. Is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to that time had you had a conference with Mr. Mackenzie King at Tarrytown, N. Y., at which were present your father, Mr. Jerome D. Greene, and yourself?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't recall any conference at which all of those parties were present, Mr. Chairman, at Tarrytown.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a conference at Tarrytown at which were present your father, yourself, Mr. Mackenzie King, and Mr. J. F. Welborn, the president of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. We had no conference with that group. It is true that Mr. King and Mr. Welborn spent a night with me, and I invited my father to dinner; but we had no conference, simply an informal chat.

Chairman WALSH. Did you discuss the proposed employment, during that chat, of Mr. King with any of the Rockefeller activities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. We did not.

Chairman WALSH. Had you discussed with Mr. King prior to that time his probable or likely connection with the Rockefeller fund?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And this letter was written upon August 6, and laid down the plan, a portion of which you afterwards recommended to Mr. J. F. Welborn as being proper to put into effect in your industry in Colorado?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; only, in justice to Mr. King, I think we should say that he did not lay down a plan, because he apologizes for the rather hurried way in which he expresses his ideas.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; but the plan was suggested, and you submitted the plan to Mr. Welborn?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I did.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; and that plan, in its essence, was afterwards adopted by the Colorado Fuel & Iron?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There were certain features of it adopted and other features added.

Chairman WALSH. Well, were not the principal features or basic features adopted by the Colorado Fuel & Iron?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that is a fair statement of it.

Chairman WALSH. That is a fair statement of it. Now, that was in August, 1914? Is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And in August, 1914, the workers that had been formerly in your employ in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. were contesting with you for recognition of their union?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was said to be the issue of the companies; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, was there any compensation paid Mr. King for any work that he did prior to October 1, 1914?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. This was done at whose request?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As stated in my letter to Mr. Welborn, at my request.

Chairman WALSH. Have you produced, or did I ask you to produce—I probably did not, because I gather the information from the beginning of this letter, and do not recall whether I had it in the questionnaire before or not. This letter begins by saying:

"As stated in my wire to you, I did not receive your letter of August 1 until the late mail on Thursday, the 4th."

Have you produced the letter of August 1 which called for or brought forth this answer of August 6 of Mr. King?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You have not asked for it, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly produce that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I will.

Chairman WALSH. Your letter of August 1, to Mr. King, to which the letter of August 6, which you have submitted, is reply. You will produce that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I will, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Under the act of incorporation of the Rockefeller fund, can the number of members be reduced?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My impression is that it can not, below the number of incorporators.

Chairman WALSH. May I ask, Mr. Rockefeller, from where you get the idea that the number of incorporators can not be reduced? Is it under the general law of New York, or has the advice been given you that such is the law?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I had assumed that the number of incorporators never could be changed, Mr. Chairman; the incorporators are those who have asked for incorporation.

Chairman WALSH. And as a matter of general law or statutory law of the State of New York, they can not be reduced. That is your idea of it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I don't see how they could be.

Chairman WALSH. Now, first you have this foundation—you have these general philanthropic and educational activities—the foundation, the General Education Board, and the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, I believe?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Now, on the foundation board, the following gentlemen appear as directors, I believe, on each of these boards and upon the personal staff of Mr. Rockefeller, except Mr. Gates: John D. Rockefeller, Jr., Starr J. Murphy, Jerome D. Greene, and Mr. Heydt?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Heydt is not—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). He is your secretary?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not a member of the Rockefeller Institute board, as I recall it.

Chairman WALSH. But he is of the General Education Board?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is of the General Education Board, and the Rockefeller Institute—no; pardon me, he is not a member of the General Education Board. He is a member solely of the Rockefeller Institute board—no; I mean the foundation board—solely of the foundation board, Mr. Heydt.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the funds of the Rockefeller Foundation are paid out on the orders of a finance committee, I believe?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They are paid out, Mr. Chairman, as stated quite fully in answer to the questionnaire, on the general vote of the board of directors or of the executive committee.

Chairman WALSH. Who are on the executive committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that is also stated there.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Rockefeller, could you recall it and state it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The members of the executive committee, if my memory serves me, are Mr. Murphy, Mr. Greene, Dr. Simon Flexner, Mr. Heydt, and myself. That is subject to correction. I think that is correct; but we have given that information there, and, if I am not correct, it will be corrected by the data there.

Chairman WALSH. Has any estimate been made of what the taxes would have been upon the property contained in the Rockefeller fund?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Has any estimate been made by any member of your father's personal staff as to the relation that the amount of taxes exempted by the foundation would bear to the income of the foundation minus the cost of operation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Now, then, with reference to the time of the incorporation of the foundation, did the securities go into it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There was a gift made, I think, as I stated in answer to the questionnaire, of a few millions of dollars shortly after the time of incorporation. Later that same year my recollection is that there was a further gift of something around $30,000,000; and the final gift, making the total of $100,000,000 was made, my recollection is, some time in 1914. Just when, I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. The following condition, I see, is contained in the deed of gift from your father:

"It is a condition of this gift that from the income of the foundation the sum of $2,000,000 annually, or as much thereof as I shall designate, shall be applied during my lifetime to such specific objects within the corporate purposes of the foundation as I may from time to time direct. If, at the close of any fiscal year, there shall remain any balance of the $2,000,000 which I have not thus designated during that fiscal year, such balance shall be transferred to the general unrestricted income of the foundation, to be used as the foundation shall see fit. Subject to the foregoing provision, the principal, as well as the income of this gift, may be used in your discretion for any of the corporate purposes of the foundation."

Now, what was the total income of the foundation last year?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that appears in this statement.

Chairman WALSH. Please refer to it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; that does not, Mr. Chairman, because the statement was made before the end of the year. I may have it here. The total income from January 2, 1914, to January 1, 1915, was $5,152,761.50.

Chairman WALSH. Does the Rockefeller fund keep a statement of the disbursements of the $2,000,000 retained for the personal benefactions of your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And that will appear, I take it, in the annual report?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It will, in full. I might explain, Mr. Chairman, that the development of the foundation was simply a development into a more permanent form of the philanthropic work which my father had been carrying on personally before.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please make a chart for us, or have one made in your office, Mr. Rockefeller, showing all of these activities and the names of the persons who are on them. To make it very clear to you, I asked you yesterday several questions along the proposition of what might be called "interlocking directorates," and I would like you to just state the facts, if you will, in a simple little chart.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that information is here, and I will be glad to give it to you again.

Chairman WALSH. I wish, of course, you would include in that the committees—the executive committees and the finance committees—showing who the individuals are.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The members of the board and the executive committee?

Chairman WALSH. And all of the standing committees of the organization, such as the executive committee or finance committee and such others as you may have.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of the foundation, the General Educational Board, and the institute?

Chairman WALSH. Yes, sir. Is the Bureau of Social Hygiene part of this and does it have standing committees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is not a part of this and has no standing committee.

Chairman WALSH. Is the sanitary commission—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The International Health Commission is, as I stated yesterday, an organization which has been created by the Rockefeller Foundation to enter into the field of sanitation.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please submit any standing committees that there are on that, along with this little chart? How many meetings a year must the corporation hold, referring to the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the stated number of meetings is three—maybe four; but my recollection is three.

Chairman WALSH. How are the absent members notified, or are they notified of the action taken?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think not, except as they get the annual report—as they will get it.

Chairman WALSH. Are the minutes of the meetings printed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The minutes of the meetings are typewritten and sent to the—I am not sure whether they are sent to the members or simply laid on the table at the current meetings. I have forgotten which.

Chairman WALSH. Between meetings I suppose that the control of the corporation is in the hands of the executive committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Along lines laid down by the board.

Chairman WALSH. And that committee consists of yourself, Mr. Murphy, Mr. Greene, Mr. Heydt, and Dr. Flexner?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And they are all, as you have stated—see if this statement is correct—all connected with your father's investments, with the companies in which those investments are had, or upon your personal staff or your father's personal staff, with the exception of Dr. Flexner, who is the salaried head of the Rockefeller Institute?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that is substantially correct.

Chairman WALSH. I am going to ask your opinion upon some things here. Do you think three meetings a year frequent enough for the trustees of so powerful a corporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do.

Chairman WALSH. How many meetings a year does the executive committee hold?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Just as many as may be needed. There is no stated number.

Chairman WALSH. Can you state how many the executive committee held last year?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that shows here, Mr. Chairman, with the attendance at each. The number does not remain in my mind.

Chairman WALSH. And the record is kept of the proceedings of the meetings of the executive committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Definite minutes of all the actions taken.

Chairman WALSH. In what way are trustees who are not members of the executive committee notified of its action taken between board meetings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My recollection is that the minutes of the meetings of the executive committee are read at the next meeting of the board, if not submitted to the directors for their perusal.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any formal machinery for notifying the trustees of action taken by the executive board between meetings?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. There is not.

Chairman WALSH. How are the executive committee members notified of action taken in their absence?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They are not notified.

Chairman WALSH. What is a quorum of the executive committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Three, I think. That is stated in the answers. I think three, of course.

Chairman WALSH. Should the charter require the minutes of the board and of the executive and finance committees to be printed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. We have not thought it necessary or we would have inserted that requirement in the charter.

Chairman WALSH. Would you welcome an amendment to the charter of the foundation which would provide for the printing of the minutes?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I would not think it necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Then I take it you would not welcome it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not be hostile to it, but I should not recommend it. I should simply think it was unnecessary.

Chairman WALSH. Please state as briefly as you can the provision or provisions that the foundation has made for making public its work.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know of any provisions that it has made.

Chairman WALSH. There is no provision for such publicity in the charter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, if there is—

Chairman WALSH. In the charter granted from the State.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. There is no provision for publicity in the constitution of the body itself, the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I know of.

Chairman WALSH. And there is no provision for publicity in the by-laws of the corporation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Was the decision to publish annual reports made at a meeting of the board of trustees, or by the executive committee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I stated in answer to a previous question, by the board of trustees.

Chairman WALSH. What mailing list does it plan to use in distributing this report?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it has made no plans as yet.

Chairman WALSH. Who will prepare this publicity matter for distribution?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The secretary of the foundation will prepare the report. No plans have been made with reference to its circulation.

Chairman WALSH. Was there some one present in charge of the preparation of this printed document, the questionnaire, or was the actual work of writing done by some particular person?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It was done by the several of us in the office who are familiar with those matters, each contributing as he might have time.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Lee have anything to do with that, Mr. Ivy L. Lee?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is highly probable that he did, as one of our associates.

Chairman WALSH. Is it within your knowledge whether he did or not?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. He did?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did he write a number of the matters that went to the newspapers with regard to the Rockefeller Foundation; did Mr. Ivy L. Lee prepare that publicity matter?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know whether he prepared it. He has cooperated with us in any way that we have desired to have him. As I stated yesterday, in seeking his advice last spring, it was quite as much in the interest of the various matters which we were interested in as—

Chairman WALSH. How is that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I stated, in seeking Mr. Lee's advice last spring, it was quite as much that matters with respect to our own affairs and the philanthropies and other work which we had in hand might be given proper publicity as that the situation in Colorado might receive attention.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand that Mr. Lee receives part of his compensation from the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He does not.

Chairman WALSH. He receives none of it from the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He does not; he receives none of it.

Chairman WALSH. You have already stated that the pay for his work in distributing the bulletins containing the facts with regard to the Colorado situation was paid by your father?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; and I have the entry here if you care for it.

Chairman WALSH. What entry is that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You asked me to produce the entry in my father's books in connection with the payment of that amount to Mr. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. I would be very glad to have it now.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It reads—this is a copy by the bookkeeper:

"November 25, 1913, check No. AG4938, to the order of Ivy L. Lee, instructions J. D. R., jr., November 24, at the rate of $1,000 per month from June 1 to December 1, 1914, $6,000. Charged to office expense account."

And the check itself, which I have here, as is customary with the checks of our office, has certain references to vouchers, etc., in the printed place for the date, November 24, 1914. J. D. R., jr., and makes reference to my letter instructing—my letter to Mr. Lee inclosing the check, which is here, and I shall be glad to read it.

Chairman WALSH. If you please, you may do so.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (reading):

"Mr. LEE: Inclosed please find check for $6,000, being the compensation agreed on at the rate of $1,000 a month for the services you have rendered to our interests from the beginning of our relationship—the 1st of June to the 1st of December. It is understood that compensation at the same rate is to be continued for the month of December.

"Greatly appreciating the valuable assistance you have rendered to us, I am,

"Very truly,

"JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, Jr."

Chairman WALSH. Please hand that to the sergeant at arms.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. May I ask that it be returned?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I will see that it is returned at once. Was there any reason why Mr. Ivy L. Lee was not paid $1,000 a month as he went ahead with the work?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The question of compensation was not discussed when I made the arrangement with Mr. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. I think the sergeant at arms did not get the book entry.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. This is the book entry [indicating].

Chairman WALSH. This general expense book of your father, are you familiar with it?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No; except that I know that any office expenses, such as salaries, incidental stationery, and other things of that sort—traveling expenses—are charged to it.

Chairman WALSH. Is Mr. Lee receiving any compensation for the publicity matter he is writing for the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. He is not.

Chairman WALSH. He is just contributing that on account of his employment upon your father's private staff?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Lee, as one of the members of my father's staff, and just as the rest of us do, contributes any services that may be in the interest of any of the general matters we have in hand.

Chairman WALSH. Financially?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. On any subject.

Chairman WALSH. In the business management of corporations?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Or in the philanthropic activities?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In all my father's interests.

Chairman WALSH. Did the normal school department of the National Educational Association at its St. Paul meeting in July, 1914, pass the following resolutions:

"We view with alarm the activity of Carnegie and Rockefeller Foundations, agencies not in any way responsible to the people, in their efforts to control the policies of our State educational institutions, to fashion after their conception, and to standardize our courses of study, to surround the institutions with conditions which menace true academic freedom and defeat the primary purpose of democracy as heretofore preserved inviolate in our common schools and normal schools and universities."

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I was not invited to attend that meeting, and I could not say whether such resolution was passed or not.

Chairman WALSH. You were not invited to attend the meeting of the International Educational Association?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Chairman WALSH. Was the resolution called to your attention after it was passed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I saw it in the papers.

Chairman WALSH. Kindly make any comment you might wish to make on that.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not any comment to make, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. And a State superintendent of education in the South wrote to the commission to the effect educational freedom in the South was being threatened by private donors—the colleges and public universities—the private colleges and public universities.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What letters might be addressed to this commission I am not in a way to know, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Has there any such letter been addressed to your institution, to the Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not that I have heard of.

Chairman WALSH. Do the southern colleges to which this General Education Board gives money for the purposes of secondary education consult the board informally in regard to the persons to be appointed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know. They certainly do not consult the board. It is a matter in the hands of the officers of the board; and I understand that the secretary of the board is to appear before you and he can give you the information and I can not.

Chairman WALSH. You have no recollection upon that subject?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My recollection is not clear on it.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson has a few questions he wishes to ask you, Mr. Rockefeller.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Rockefeller, in speaking of the question of discipline or removal of trustees, you refer to the fact that a veto power as to the election of trustees would be sufficient, in your opinion?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is not the veto power purely preventive and not corrective?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Garretson, it had never occurred to us that men could get on this board who would need correction.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are there not rather striking examples of the inability of any power to choose a number of men among whom there might not be, to use the Methodist term, backsliders?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If such a backslider were to develop in any of these boards, in the first place he would be entirely in the minority, and in the second place, at the end of his term of office, which does not exceed three years, he could easily be replaced, if he could not be put out at an earlier date.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Might it not be necessary, with the formal re-education, to place the foundation on record as passing judgment?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It might, but we did not consider that possibility.

Commissioner GARRETSON. With a sort of perpetuating power as is here described—by the way, have you followed up any of the analyses of the war situation in Europe, particularly by noted university men of those countries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have not read them with any care at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Where it is asserted, wrongly or rightly, that there has been a continuous campaign, for instance in Germany from 1848, accentuated since 1870, of domination by the militarist idea of all channels of the State, church, educational, social, and otherwise with the apotheosis of the divine mission of Germany to regenerate the world, considered as connected with the present condition there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have heard that theory advanced, Mr. Garretson.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Might it be possible that a foundation of the character of some that exist that with a change of the personnel, and I am applying this absolutely to a condition which may arise after the present generation is gone—that with a personnel devoting the potential power to a domination of the educational, as outlined in the resolution passed by the educational association, to the spiritual as applied to the endowment of churches or of theological universities—to the social as applied by ordinary, well-recognized methods of molding public opinion—could a foundation of that character, self-perpetuating in its nature, exercise an influence that would be deadly to liberalism? I go no further than liberalism?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is remotely possible, Mr. Garretson, but my answer would be that with the power of the legislature to amend and restrict in any way, that such power at any time ought to be sufficient to safeguard against that possibility.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But, if that campaign were so thoroughly conducted, under the rose, that before thinking men wakened to its influence it had been able to exercise and create a degree of domination, what then?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that would be hardly possible; that the American people would know the trend of such an attempt before it had gotten any such hold. And may I say, Mr. Garretson, right here, that I think it must be obvious to you all that one reason why the founders of the Rockefeller Foundations made such strenuous, persistent, and patient efforts to get a Federal charter, was that this large work, running through the ages, might be most conspicuously located, might be at a point where the eyes of the people of the whole country would center upon it, and where the representatives of the people, as a whole, would be constantly working and where they could see what it was doing, and direct, as they might see fit, or limit its activities.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Going, for a moment, to the plan that has been in effect tentatively for relations between employer and employee in the mining region of Colorado, what safeguard is there, Mr. Rockefeller, in that plan for the independent man who is chosen by his associates on that committee as their representative?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Safeguard in what respect?

Commissioner GARRETSON. His service with the corporation as against the resentment of any petty officer?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think the large number of men who were back of him would be a pretty strong safeguard.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you aware of the fact, Mr. Rockefeller—I will draw from my own experience—that the railway organizations that are recognized as having as great a voice in dealing with their own affairs with their employers as almost any labor organization—that they for 20 years have found it necessary to have inserted in all their agreements, as outgrowth of large experience with men behind those committeemen, that no committeeman should be discriminated against in his service on account of contending against the views of the company—against the companies' viewpoint—and that 1,000 men would be a small estimate of the number of men who have been protected under this clause against that very thing?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. What is the question?

Commissioner GARRETSON. How could men be protected against this plan, this plan that is suggested or that is put in effect?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. As I understand it, Mr. Garretson, this plan is a plan which is doubtless going to develop as occasion may require. I fancy the officers of the company and the men who have cooperated in its execution to this point will purpose to develop any additional features which their common counsel and experience might indicate to be desirable, and I should not regard it as a finished and final plan, but subject to such strengthening in weak points as you have suggested or as others may suggest.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You realize, of course, the absolute necessity of such safeguards as long as officers remain human?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Your experience I should take as final on that, Mr. Garretson.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It has not been final yet; we still have occasions for it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would have great weight with me.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You spoke of the necessity for a corporation performing certain services under pioneering conditions. When a corporation takes upon itself, either pioneering or otherwise, to furnish all the elements of community life, and that naturally comprises schools, churches, publications in many cases, school boards, city governments—all of those agencies when they come from the company and are administered by the company—is there not thereby created an element of feudalism?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is a highly undesirable situation to have exist.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, is it not true that passing to the final stage, and that is with an open mind, because that can only be properly applied to that one condition—that of taxation—the company owning the property for taxation, and that is applied only on the farm lands, all of the funds necessary for the community to provide for itself should be properly available as in any other community?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should hope that just as quickly as the community could take care of those interests it should do so.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Has there been any tendency in that direction in what are known as closed camps?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you know as to the truth or not the company activities have, first named the tax commissioners through political action, next lowered the tax rate until funds were not available, and then proceeded on the surface to furnish those facilities as philanthropic necessities after throttling the right of the people to them from the State source?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It would be an undesirable condition, from my standpoint, if it were shown that that did exist, and that that was the reason why the company had to exercise those patriarchial rights.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Utterly undesirable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You gave expression in your original statement that you believed in the right of organization of labor on precisely the same lines or to exactly the same extent—I am only making a free quotation—that you believed in it for capital. I am not misquoting you there, I think?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You are correct.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you followed that with a statement, in another part of the testimony, as to the responsibility of stockholders and directors, in which you took a view that the executive must of necessity conduct the business. I am using the executive in the sense of the full executive staff, presumably the president and those below him, but the president being held responsible for that executive staff. Now, if the executive of a business corporation has plenary power and is held responsible for the conduct of that business, are you prepared to accept exactly the same idea as applied to the conduct of the labor union; that is, the organization of the men? In other words, I want to make an example, to illustrate so that you will know what I mean before you reply. You, as the president of a great corporation, decide all questions that arise on the labor question—we will take that alone—without referring to your board of directors, under the plenary powers that you have described as being necessary. I, as the executive of labor union, come to you to deal for your employees. Would you consider that any labor union should place in an executive officer's hands, the executive of that union, power to put those men on strike without the consent of the men?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That is a question leading into your field, Mr. Garretson, that I do not feel I could answer.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Wouldn't it be a damnable power?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it would be.

Commissioner GARRETSON. To apply to us?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It might be.

Commissioner GARRETSON. For instance, the brotherhood of which I am a part, if its members all went on a strike, associated with those who follow the same pursuit—the trainmen and engine service—for one day, tied the continent up, we could paralyze commerce; and if it extended beyond three days, make a large part of the population hungry, if, as it is claimed, the city lives from hand to mouth. Should the law permit power to be in the hands of four men to do that?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think it was very unsafe.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it more unsafe that the men we deal with, representing exactly the same relation to the public—that is, the president of the railway—should have the power to precipitate war without returning to their constituency to know whether or not it was proper?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have said, Mr. Garretson, that I should think, as a director—that the director of any corporation must take the final responsibility for the acts of the officers whom they elect, and it is their responsibility to get the best officers. Now, it would come back on to them, and if any such situation did arise it would be entirely appropriate that it should come back to the directors for consideration.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you consider that it could be appropriate that the power should be placed on the other side on the same way?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think the situation ought to be paralleled absolutely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, in that connection—if I thunder out my subject, will you kindly understand I am not thundering at the man?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I quite understand it, sir.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You heard—or were you present when Mr. Brandeis gave his testimony?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did you read the excerpts of it with regard to the responsibility of stockholders and directors?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not carefully. I just glanced at it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you had any—this is a question that is purely personal, and you are at liberty, perfect liberty, if you do not want to answer it, I will have no fault to find—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I want to answer it if I can.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Have you seen any reason in the past—and I am going to make it wide enough, six months—to change your views in any degree in regard to the responsibility of either stockholders or directors for the conduct of a corporation or of any other institution of which he is a part?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. You mean as regards the views which I have expressed in my written statement, or those previously stated?

Commissioner GARRETSON. I put it back six months so that it would cover a very considerable period, probably cover all your public expressions on the subject to any tribunal or through any channel.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should hope, Mr. Garretson, that I would never reach the point where I would not be constantly progressing to something higher, better—both with reference to my own acts and with reference to the general situation in the company. My hope is that I am progressing. It is my desire to.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You are like the church says, you are “growing in grace.”

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I hope so, too. I hope the growth is in that direction.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What is the function of a publicity agent, Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not know. I never was one.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What is his value based on?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I haven't any knowledge.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Bear in mind this is purely a practical question. I have been wondering if the publicity agent's value was based upon, first, his ability to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, if I—

Commissioner GARRETSON (interrupting). Or upon his ability to put in enough of truth in a statement to make it appear plausible, or, to put across, to use the train phrase, the views that his employer desires put across?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Garretson, if I had information that an employee, a publicity agent, did not have that first qualification, the ability to tell the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth, and was willing ever to tell anything else in reference to matters that I had anything to do with, I would not want him related to me in any way for a minute. That would be the prime qualification, in my judgment.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would you expect to find him in the regular trade?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I dare not answer that question.

Chairman WALSH. We must have perfect order. I know it is rather difficult under such a provocation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If the witness will agree with me we will not break the rule, I mean agree that we won't break it, not on the subject matter.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think I can agree in both.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe, Mr. Rockefeller, that a director has any moral right to set up the plea that he is too busy to perform his duties for which he is elected as a director?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your statement you recited three conditions that went with the exercise of a certain—well, whether rights or privileges is always debatable—but that an enterprise should render the remunerative rate and fair conditions for its labor; that is, should pay that to those who serve it; that it should render service to the public, presumably satisfactory service, proper service; second, the return on capital. Which of those three would you give precedence as the obligation resting upon a business enterprise?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. If I was the only one to be consulted I would give preference to the proper living conditions of the employees. That would be my own feeling. If I were representing the management of a company, the directors of a company, and had to secure capital for the company, however much as an individual I might want to make that the first consideration, my ability as a director to get capital in order to give employment to labor in that industry would depend upon my ability, my being able to show that a reasonable return upon that capital could be expected. If I could not show such a reasonable prospect I could not hope to secure the capital which would be necessary in order to develop the business.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And has a business a moral right to exist, an enterprise, unless it can support its employees in human style?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Just because I believe with you there I stated that if it could not do that and make a return to capital the alternative would be to go out of business.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is the only legitimate thing to do. Does not business itself in dealing with business fully recognize that idea? To illustrate, you as a coal merchant won't sell coal to a railway company or a business enterprise whose balances are all written in red for any less money than you will one paying 85 per cent, will you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You referred, when you first came on the stand, when you were asked regarding labor troubles, the necessity of strikes taking place—you referred to the Lackawanna Railroad. Did you refer to the trouble between that road and its train and engine men in 1910?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. That was what I had in mind. I did not know the exact date.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Are you aware of the fact that that never came to a strike; that 15 minutes before the strike was set a settlement was reached, and consequently the men did not quit?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I probably was at the time. But it had slipped my mind. I knew there were troubles brewing, at least.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Ballard would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Rockefeller, do you believe the person in hiring help, domestic help or otherwise, in the private family, has a right to inquire about the character, and so forth, of the help that may apply for work?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think it is essential that they should so inquire.

Commissioner BALLARD. Do you believe that a person in the profession of law, for instance, has the same right to inquire about the past record and opinions of those who apply to him for positions?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should think so.

Commissioner BALLARD. Don't you think that same privilege should be accorded to those in industries?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I do not see why they should be differentiated against.

Commissioner BALLARD. We have heard a great deal of the great high-sounding phrase that workmen have a right to organize for their own protection. I think no one—I do not think you have ever stated anything that would indicate that you do not approve of that.

Is not that a very different thing from a union sending paid organizers and agitators into camps for the express purpose of making the men discontented, and inducing them to organize a union?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would seem to me entirely different.

Commissioner BALLARD. The habits and customs and relationships in the coal mines in Colorado are not very different from other coal mines in the outlying districts, are they?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have assumed they were very generally the same.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understood you to say in your direct testimony that in the outlying districts where men started to build, to develop mines, it was necessary to build houses and to have doctors and to build schools, because there were none in that district. And I also understood that as time went on and those developments increased, then the public could take them over themselves and handle them. There is no objection to that in Colorado, is there?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should say there should never be objection to that, and the time at which that transfer is made should be reached as rapidly as possible.

Commissioner BALLARD. Something has been said about directors' responsibilities and stockholders' responsibilities. Don't you think that the whole country has been educated, has been undergoing very considerable change in the last few years as to the duties and responsibilities of employers toward their labor?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I am glad to say that I do think so.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is, the employer and the employing class are willing to establish and to extend the helping hand to the laborer wherever they can?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. In every way.

Commissioner BALLARD. The chairman suggested the other day that might it not have been better to distribute all the profits in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. to the workmen rather than to receive them partly in the form of profits or dividends, and let the workmen enjoy them in their own way. Could that have been better than to have received them and then to have established foundations and to give educational institutions an authority which would be permanent and continuously benefit mankind?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I should not think it would, Mr. Ballard.

Commissioner BALLARD. Is there any law in the State requiring publicity of foundations and trusts of that kind.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not in the State of New York, that I know of.

Commissioner BALLARD. It has been brought to your attention, of course, during the investigations of this foundation and this work that this commission is making studies of that kind. Would you be willing to receive suggestions from this commission and give them serious consideration if the commission came to any conclusions that might add to the permanent welfare and benefit of the public through your foundation?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. AS I said yesterday with reference to the industry in Colorado, in so far as our relationship is concerned, I not only would welcome but I would invite any suggestions, and the same would be equally true with reference to the foundation.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Commons would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. Mr. Rockefeller, would it be advisable in a large corporation to have a director whose business it should be to give his attention to the labor conditions? I understand that some corporation has chosen Mr. Neill, who was formerly Commissioner of Labor, whose special duty it is—I don't know whether he is a member of the board of directors or simply a subordinate—

Chairman WALSH. He said he was a member of the board of directors.

Commissioner COMMONS. A member of the board of directors?

Chairman WALSH. That is the testimony.

Commissioner COMMONS. The essential thing is he does not report to the executive officers, he reports to the directors. Did you ever consider whether that would be a useful way in which the directors themselves could have information apart from that which would come up to them from the superintendents and general managers?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The matter had not been brought to my attention, but as you present it I should think it was an excellent idea.

Commissioner COMMONS. I do not intimate that it should be a person connected with labor at all.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I understand.

Commissioner COMMONS. But a person selected with reference to his especial aptitude for making that class of investigations and keeping the company informed on those things. You feel that would keep the directors informed in ways that would be valuable in carrying out a scheme of this kind that has been installed?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It would seem to me very applicable.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is the only suggestion I have.

Chairman WALSH. Did you have some questions, Mr. Weinstock?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

The question has been raised, Mr. Rockefeller, about the wisdom of using surplus along the lines of foundation work, and as to whether it would not have been better to take this surplus and use it in the way of a higher wage. Now, I do not know, of course, what is the policy of the Rockefeller enterprises on the Atlantic seaboard, but I do know what is the policy of the Rockefeller enterprises—the Standard Oil Co.—on the Pacific coast. So far as I know, the Standard Oil Co. on the Pacific coast pays the full standard wage, and in the matter of workmen's compensation, in which I happen to be interested as State commissioner, I do know that the Standard Oil Co. was one of the first companies to come in under the compensation law when it was voluntary, and that it has treated its injured workers with unusual liberality. Recently there was a case where an injured worker brought suit against the company, believing he could get more out of the courts than he could out of the compensation. The case was decided against him and in favor of the company. But, despite that fact, the company paid him the full compensation, not desiring to take advantage of a legal technicality.

Now, if the policy of your enterprises at this end of the continent are the same as they are on the Pacific slope, and the full standard wage is paid, and the workers are treated with every consideration, then this surplus rightfully belongs to the company, to the owner; and if he sees fit to use it in the manner in which it is being used—through foundations—can not a greater good be accomplished by that surplus treated as a unit than the same amount would accomplish if distributed in small amounts among a great many people? In other words, can it not in a concentrated form, if wisely and intelligently used, bring about a greater good to society than if scattered in very trifling sums among a multitude of people?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Weinstock, you speak of surplus. The opinion seems to have prevailed, in the discussion of the matter of the return which has come to my father on his investment in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the opinion seems to have prevailed that the return was surplus belonging to the company. That is an entirely incorrect impression. What surplus there has been in the earnings of the company from year to year, as has been stated, has gone back into the company, either in the development of its properties or in increasing wages and in improving living conditions.

Now, this amount of money under discussion is not surplus. It is firstly the interest paid on a debt, the bonds which my father holds being the debt. The company has not anything to say, nor the public, I should assume, with reference to whether that interest should be paid on the debt or not. That is a question, of course, that is self-evident. A debt should be paid and its interest should be paid. If that interest were paid to some other bondholder than my father, we would concede the right that he should have the interest and do with the interest what he saw fit, whether it was to establish foundations or whatever he desired to do with it.

Now, the same is true with reference to the trifling amount which has been returned to my father as a dividend on the capital stock, and all of the other stockholders have been treated in the same way.

I want first to make clear that those returns are not surplus, they are, firstly, the payment to capital of interest on a loan, at a fixed rate agreed upon, and, in the second place, such return in a dividend upon the stock as the earnings of the company justified at the time the dividend was paid. I hope I have made clear that point.

To answer your specific question, no one raises the question as to what should be done with the bond interest paid to any of the other bondholders of the company, of which there are a very large number, nor what should be done with the trifling dividends that have been paid to such parties. They are at liberty, of course, to use that legitimate return in any way they see fit. Just because that return comes to my father, and because, in order to feed and clothe himself, he may not be dependent on that particular return, the impression seems to arise in the public mind that he should not keep it, as every other stock or bond holder does who has no greater right to it than he, but just the same right, simply because he does not need it. Why should he not throw it back into the hands of the public as he may think wise? I simply want to make the point that, it seems to me, the stockholders and the bondholders should all be conceded the same rights. So much preliminary to the answer to your question.

As to the relative wisdom of a bondholder or a stockholder using the return on his investment or his debt in voluntarily increasing a wage already as high as the standard average wage in the industry throughout the country, as regards the relative value of his doing that voluntarily, or putting that money in some, to his mind, useful public service, I should think that the latter course, under these particular circumstances, would be productive of a greater general public benefit. Because only when funds which are not required for the support of the owner exist in sufficient quantity is it possible to endow colleges, to establish hospitals, to build institutes of medical research, and to forward those kinds of work which need large aggregations of capital and which, if dependent upon the small giver for establishment, could hardly be expected to be established. Is my answer clear?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; entirely so. In connection with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., Mr. Rockefeller, I have been endeavoring to reconcile certain figures, and they have confused me, and I would ask you to help me out in it and see if I can get the thing straightened. In your preliminary statement, among other things, you said, on page 6:

"Since we first acquired an interest in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., in 1902, the company has paid in wages to its employees over $92,000,000. During the same period we have received dividends amounting to $371,000 on our investment in the capital stock. Therefore our stock interest in the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. has yielded a return of about two-thirds of 1 per cent per annum on the actual cash investment of about $6,000,000."

Now, I understand your interests in that company do not exceed 40 per cent.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you own and control 40 per cent of the stock. But in looking over the reports that were handed me yesterday, the annual reports of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., I noted that the capital stock was $36,000,000. Is that correct?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Why, I think it is; I am not sure.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, 40 per cent of $36,000,000 would be equivalent to about $14,400,000.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. But you are figuring at par, Mr. Weinstock. This is the actual cash at the market price at which the stock was purchased.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I see. Now, what is the market value of that $36,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. It is constantly changing from day to day. I have no idea what it is to-day. But taking the different investments made in the stock from time to time as they appear on my father's books, it shows that he had spent $6,000,000 in buying the stock at whatever the price of the stock might have been at the time of the respective purchases.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is the stock, purely and simply, and nothing to do with the bonds?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not in that transaction, nor has it anything to do with the par value of the stock. You see this statement does not indicate how many shares of stock my father had. This simply says that he has invested $6,000,000 in the stocks of that company. He may have paid $75 a share for some, and $50 a share for some. I do not know, but that is the way it stands.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If he had bought at par value, he would have one-sixth and not 40 per cent? He would have $6,000,000, or one-sixth of $36,000,000?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So evidently he must have bought a good deal of it below par value?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have never known the stock to be anything approaching the par value. And, as I showed in the subsequent statement, the investment stands my father to-day, at the present market price, a number of millions of dollars of loss.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, in common with myself, you probably have heard and read the statement made broadly by anticapitalistic advocates that in industry, under our present system, capital gets the lion's share of the production and labor gets the small end. Haven't you heard those statements made and seen them written?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. They have a familiar sound.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes. In fact, I have heard the statement made at public gatherings that under our present system of production labor gets not to exceed 10 per cent of the production and capital gets the remaining 90 per cent. Now, in looking over the figures that have been presented here I find these facts—I will not vouch for their accuracy; I think they are approximately correct, and for the information of the commission and for part of our record I am sure we would appreciate it if you would be good enough to have your office go over these approximate figures and verify them and make them as accurate as possible so we may have them as part of our proceeding.

(See Rockefeller, jr., Exhibit No. 4.)

I find from the annual reports that I looked over yesterday that the gross earnings from 1902 to 1914 of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the gross earnings were $241,000,000, in round figures. The pay roll, according to the statement made here, during that period was $92,000,000, and the amounts paid out for interest, dividends, and reserves, as taken from your annual report rather hurriedly, aggregate in round figures $24,000,000. That means this, that for every dollar received by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., 33 cents was paid to labor, nine and a fraction cents was paid to capital as interest, dividends, and reserve funds, and that fifty-two and a fraction cents on the dollar was used for all kinds of other expenses like taxes, insurance, depreciation and betterments, etc. If these figures are correct, and I think they are substantially correct, this would indicate that labor has gotten four times as much out of the industry as capital has.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. And may I suggest, Mr. Weinstock, that to make that statement quite complete, it ought to be indicated that a large part of that 9 cents—was it 9 cents that capital got?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; nine and a fraction cents.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (continuing). Was payment of interest on debt. It was not a profit, because the bond interest is the very large charge there.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; the bond interest. I think I have those figures here—

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. (interrupting). I think the total dividends that have been paid in that company to all the stockholders have been under a million dollars.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The bond interest was $17,673,000; the amount put into reserves was $5,780,000; and the dividends were $2,060,000.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Well, now, the $17,000,000 of bond interest, of course, is simply paying interest on capital borrowed.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; but still that would be capital's end of it.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Yes; but it is not profit.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. No; it is not profit.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. The $5,000,000 that has gone into reserves, my understanding is, is simply to preserve the integrity of the mortgage and provide for its retirement. So that that $5,000,000 is simply related to the payment of interest on the debt and keeping the debt—to keep it in perfect condition. The $2,060,000 is the return on the capital invested.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You explained also in this statement, Mr. Rockefeller, that since the strike has been declared off in Colorado the company is organizing a system whereby the men will be afforded a hearing through their own committee. Now, specifically you say this:

"With reference to my attitude toward labor unions, I believe it to be just as proper and advantageous for labor to associate itself into organized groups for the advancement of its legitimate interests as for capital to combine for the same object. Such associations of labor manifest themselves in promoting collective bargaining, in an effort to secure better working and living conditions, in providing machinery whereby grievances may easily and without prejudice to the individual be taken up with the management."

Now, is it contemplated that this joint committee that has now been appointed representing the employers on the one hand, the workers on the other, shall not only deal with grievances, but shall also enter into collective bargaining? Can you give us any information on that particular point, Mr. Rockefeller?

MR. ROCKEFELLER, JR. As I have undertaken to indicate, Mr. Weinstock, this plan in its present form is as far as the officers and the men have developed it at this moment. I assume that it is the purpose of the officers to add to the plan and to develop it in cooperation with the representatives of the men just as rapidly and along just such lines as the experience in the working of this part so far agreed on shall indicate to be wise; and that it will include collective bargaining is certainly one of the possibilities. I have no information as to the thought in the mind of either the officers or the men as to what further development there may be.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. At this point we will stand adjourned until 2.30 o'clock this afternoon, instead of 2 o'clock.

Will you kindly resume the stand at 2.30 o'clock, Mr. Rockefeller?

(Thereupon, at 12.35 o'clock of this Wednesday, January 27, 1915, a recess was taken until 2.30 o'clock p. m.)

AFTERNOON SESSION—2.30 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will be in perfect order and we will proceed with the inquiry.

Mr. Rockefeller, will you kindly resume the stand?

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN D. ROCKEFELLER, JR.—Continued.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell says he would like to ask you a few questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Rockefeller, I want to ask a question in connection with this proposed investigation, this industrial investigation. I want to state very frankly I know of no work in which you might be engaged that would bring greater results to the entire populace of the country than a work of that character. I am intensely interested in knowing with what thoroughness the investigation is to be made; whether it is simply to be an academic investigation and then pass off, or whether there is to be represented in that investigation men of scientific knowledge, men with practical knowledge. I should like very much and I am sure the commission will be interested to know just what the plan is or who will be associated with the investigation that is to be undertaken.

MR. ROCKEFELLER, JR. Mr. O'Connell, that question in substance, I think, was one of the questions in one of the questionnaires. I am glad to have this further opportunity of answering it.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes. I read the answer in the questionnaire, but I think it might be elaborated a little to enlighten us all.

MR. ROCKEFELLER, JR. I have taken a good deal of the time of the commission during this examination in explaining somewhat fully the method which has led to the development of several of the activities which have been discussed here. I took time yesterday to speak of the development of the idea of the Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research, how that it started with a group of able scientific men into whose hands, without any suggestion or restriction, was put a limited sum of money, and how the whole thing has developed from that beginning of $200,000, without any suggestion as to the line to be followed, into the present Rockefeller Institute of Medical Research. That is only typical of the method which has always been my father's method in developing any such work, and it is the method which the directors of the Rockefeller Foundation propose to follow in connection with this study of industrial relations to which you refer. The purpose is to select the ablest men whom the directors can find for a work of that kind. And with that in mind Mr. Macenzie King was selected.

Now, it would be quite contrary to the policy of the board, quite contrary to what I think the views of the members would be as to the way to get results, were the board to undertake to make any plans or any suggestions to Mr. King as to what methods, what line, what process he should follow in making this study. We leave ourselves entirely in Mr. King's hands. He is absolutely free to develop the investigation along any line that seems to him to be in the public interest. To answer more specifically, the foundation would have no interest in such an investigation or in any investigation which it did not believe eventually might give promise of resulting in some large or small contribution to the general well-being of the people at large. That is the goal, a very practical goal. But the merely scientific investigation, an academic study, simply the collating of facts would not seem adequate or satisfactory or sufficiently worth while to the board of directors of the Rockefeller Foundation. Their hope is that under Mr. King's leadership something that will appeal to the labor interests of the country, to the capitalistic interests of the country may result. If it does not appeal to both of those groups, if the result of the study is not something practical that both desire to try and may find to work, that is the end of it; nothing will have been accomplished.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then I take it from that that some thought has been given by your board to the fact that there is some industrial unrest existing in the country; that there is some fundamental difference between employer and employee in the country; following that up, this commission is instructed by act of Congress to investigate the underlying causes of industrial unrest. I am sure this commission and myself personally, and I think the public generally, would be glad to know what you consider to be the underlying causes of industrial unrest. You are engaged in a large way in employing people, you have to do with big things financially, you have your board, and you have given notice to the world that you are going to make an investigation of this kind, and some thought must have been given to it, and I am sure that this commission would appreciate your experience and what you believe to be the underlying causes for industrial unrest.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. With all men who are interested in the highest and best interests of their fellow men, I have been conscious of this spirit of unrest to which you refer. As made plain in my statement made at the outset of the inquiry, the difficulties which developed in Colorado emphasize in a concrete way that spirit of unrest, and as stated in that same paper, the developments there led me to feel the great importance of undertaking, in as far as I might be able through any influence I might have, to contribute toward a discovery of the underlying facts of which you speak. Now, if I had myself known those facts, or felt that I was myself capable of discovering them, I should have in the one instance made an utterance as to my views, if I thought that would be helpful or would, in the other instance, have proceeded to make a personal study. But, as I felt that one trained to investigate, with broad experience on the human side of the problem and having represented the people's interest, would be far better able than I to make such a study, with a reasonable measure of hope that results would eventuate, I was glad to use my influence as a director of the Rockefeller Foundation in urging upon the foundation that it should enter upon such a study, and I am utterly incapable, Mr. O'Connell, of venturing an opinion as to the causes of this unrest.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Just one other question, please, and this will probably be answered in the other. In my opinion a large part of the struggles that have occurred between employers and employees is caused by the fact that they do not meet each other and do not get together; that there are no means taken to bring them together, and as a result of that differences arise, strikes and lockouts, and all that sort of thing. Do you believe that if the Government established a board—a national board—with authority to investigate, with the natural influences of the Government attached to it, that, for instance, this commission has, that would stand as a permanent institution for the purpose of mediating, adjusting, and facilitating the adjustment—nothing compulsory about it, but purely voluntarily—of such differences, that an institution of that kind might have a considerable influence in minimizing the differences that may arise between employer and employees?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I fully agree with your first statement and I make it even broader than you have, that most of the differences in life are the result of misunderstanding, simply because we do not know each other. If men and women could get closer together and talk face to face, I think there would be vastly less misunderstanding and unrest. I think anything which leads toward that end would be very helpful. As to your direct question regarding the efficiency of such a national organization, I hardly feel that I could express an opinion which would be of any value on that matter.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Rockefeller, you have been—you have not yet heard as to any of these subjects which were discussed between the managers in Colorado and the committee of 25, have you?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Not yet; no, sir.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, if a deadlock should arise in a conference of that kind, would either party—would the representatives of labor have the right to appeal to the directors of the company?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I have tried to make clear, Mr. Lennon, that this plan which I have stated I am advised has been entered into by the officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in cooperation with the representatives of their men, is in a formative stage. These different points have been mutually agreed on. I think it seems but natural that the further development of the plan will best be worked out by the two parties in interest, as they consider in this friendly spirit of contact their mutual interest, and I would be unable to prophesy as to what further steps might be taken; but I should feel sure that both sides would be anxious to have their views meet in planning for what would be in the common interest.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, if such agreement as to methods of appeal has not been arrived at yet—has not reached that development—do you believe that a matter of that character would be conducive to peace in the industry—that if the workmen were dissatisfied and a deadlock ensued that they would have a right of appeal to the board of directors and bring the matter up to headquarters?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. My personal opinion is that it would be entirely advisable that they should feel perfectly free to lay their case before the directors, and I should feel that the officers would be entirely glad to have them do so.

Commissioner LENNON. Are you aware of the fact that in industry one of the great causes of unrest is the fact that the laboring people have to meet with only the representatives and not the employers themselves, and that the working out of this plan so that they could reach the directors, if that could be arrived at, possibly some of that unrest might be eliminated?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I think that is quite in line with the suggestion made by Commissioner O'Connell, and I think it would help very much to increase and advance mutual understanding if there was contact between the representatives of the men and the directors. I should think it would be desirable, and I hope, Mr. Lennon, when I go to Colorado as a director that I may be so fortunate as to be able to meet with the representatives of the men.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to ask one question regarding the foundations. Should the legislature enact some law that had a bearing on the foundation, amending the charter and its operations to an extent that was entirely unsatisfactory to the trustees, how could the fund be distributed? What would then become of the foundation itself? Would it go on as a personal institution or would the trustees probably distribute the money?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Of course, there, it is only a question of opinion—a guess, and your guess would be as good as mine, but I should think that the State, through its legislature—any amendments which it felt were in the interests of the public, the directors at the time would, of course, acquiesce in. I think it would be their duty to express their views as to the advantage or disadvantage of the proposed amendment, but if it passed, to most cordially cooperate in operating thereafter under the amendment. In the event of the charter being rescinded, the fund would, I understand, pass into the hands of the State, to be controlled by the legislature or some court, and as would be customary, to be used for such purposes within the judgment of either of those bodies as would most nearly relate themselves to the charter purposes of the organization.

Commissioner LENNON. This point I want to get at: Is it your understanding that under the law, if the charter is recalled, that the fund then comes under the control and power of the State?

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. I understand that is the law with reference to any such foundation.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, Mr. Rockefeller. You may now be excused permanently; thank you.

Mr. ROCKEFELLER, Jr. Mr. Chairman, may I express to you and the other members of your commission my great appreciation of your courtesy and patience? I fear I have tried the patience of the entire commission in my efforts to answer in a clear and accurate way the questions which have been put with reference to these very important matters that have been under consideration.

I greatly appreciate the courtesy that has been shown me, and I want to repeat what I said the other day, that I am anxious to avail myself of any suggestions that the commission may feel disposed to make with reference to any of the matters under consideration, and that I very much hope that as a result of this full and patient hearing which you have accorded me, there may be developed a better understanding among all the parties at interest in connection, not only with this general western situation, but the general questions that have come up, and that as a result a real improvement may be forthcoming in this general situation.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you, Mr. Rockefeller. That will be all [Applause.] Any person that gives any audible expression will be asked to retire. Dr. Allen.

TESTIMONY OF DR. WILLIAM H. ALLEN.

Chairman WALSH. Will the house please be in perfect order?

Please state your name.

Dr. ALLEN. William H. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Mr. Allen?

Dr. ALLEN. In this city.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business, please?

Dr. ALLEN. The promotion of public knowledge of public business.

Chairman WALSH. What positions have you occupied here or elsewhere? Please state and describe what your field of activity has been, Dr. Allen.

Dr. ALLEN. My last work has been jointly directing a survey of the University of Wisconsin. Prior to that I was director of the Bureau of Municipal Research of New York and of the training school for public service. Prior to that, general agent of the New York Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor; formerly the secretary of the New Jersey State Charity Aid Association; and prior to that, instructor at the University of Pennsylvania.

Chairman WALSH. What were you doing at the time you were invited to assist in this study that the commission is making?

Dr. ALLEN. Completing a survey of the University of Wisconsin.

Chairman WALSH. How did you come to participate in this work?

Dr. ALLEN. I received a long-distance telephone from Chicago, and was asked to meet Mr. Manley, who was in charge of public hearings, had a conference with him there, after which a formal invitation to participate was extended.

Chairman WALSH. Please give your instructions as to the scope and method of the study that you were to make and that the commission is to make upon this subject, Dr. Allen?

Dr. ALLEN. We were asked to learn the names of the principal foundations, particularly those bearing nationally, to learn and state their purposes, their powers, financial and legal, their methods of operation, results so far as could be obtained in the limited time; questions arising with regard to their method of operation, powers, and results, and get as quickly as we could through the questioning of witnesses and examination of records any constructive suggestions that might seem serviceable at this time.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state now who has been asked to testify and give the nature of the questions asked the foundations or individuals to be questioned.

Dr. ALLEN. The foundations it seemed feasible to get information about in a short time were the various Carnegie Foundations, the Carnegie Institute at Washington, the Carnegie Foundation for Advancement of Teaching, and certain facts as to the hero fund and the peace fund, and the Carnegie Corporation; the Sage Foundation, the American Scandinavian Foundation, the Cleveland Foundation, and the three Rockefeller Foundations, so-called Rockefeller Foundations, the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research, and the General Education Board. The method that has been used—

Chairman WALSH. First—well, if you are still on the subject you may proceed.

Dr. ALLEN. I was going to say, we have written to the officers of these various corporations asking first for a constitution and by-laws, articles of incorporation, their officers, their securities, the powers as defined, programs as defined in their various publications. These have been followed up by questions, generally in installments, based upon a study of these first returns as to legal powers and financial status. In several instances there have been visits to the offices of these corporations. Mr. Manly has interviewed Mr. Carnegie and there have been visits to the Carnegie Foundation, the General Education Board, examinations of documents, follow-up letters to individuals and to officers based upon the examination of documents and answers to questions. So far as possible we have tried to establish facts in cases where allegations have been made through the press and by letter or orally to the commission with regard to the foundations, and the type of questions asked was fairly well illustrated in several of the questions asked this morning. Who the officers are, what the interlocking of directorates, as these groups, Carnegie-Rockefeller group, or as between groups, and the questions have gone further into the relation of these different groups and the outside bodies which they have given funds to or have investigated.

Chairman WALSH. I asked you, I believe, to give the names of the witnesses who have been asked to testify.

Dr. ALLEN. For the Carnegie group, Mr. Carnegie and the president of the Carnegie Foundation for Advancement of Teaching, President Pritchett. For the General Education Board, executive secretary, Mr. Buttrick; for the Sage Foundation, Mr. Glenn, a director; for the Cleveland Foundation, President Goff.

Chairman WALSH. In a general way, what is the Cleveland Foundation?

Dr. ALLEN. The Cleveland Foundation is different from any of the others. It is a foundation established by the Cleveland Trust Co., first, for securing gifts, by endowment or otherwise, in the hope of having a clearing house within the city, of information regarding what is needed by the city, so that those who give may be assured that their gifts will be directed to the need that is uppermost at the time that gifts become available.

Chairman WALSH. Have you illustrated enough to show the general nature of the study by concrete example?

Dr. ALLEN. You mean have we studied enough to furnish some illustrations?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Dr. ALLEN. I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Can you give us an illustration so that we can get the general drift of it, and the different further witnesses that are called?

Dr. ALLEN. Well, the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching is an investigating body and at the same time a giving body. It gives—maintains a retirement plan for professors of colleges and universities. We have learned how extensive those retirement allowances are, and we are asking the question what the net result of the Carnegie allowances has been upon the independence of the universities, upon the interests and independence of the States that are relieved from paying allowances because of the Carnegie allowances; the extent to which other divisions of public education have been provided with an allowance has been through secondary schools and the normal schools, etc.

With regard to the investigations the Carnegie Foundation, for example, has made an examination of the public schools of Vermont. We have attempted to ascertain the nature of the findings, how the study was outlined, how it was supervised, how the results were checked, whether the findings were submitted to the officers whose work was described by the foundation, what steps were taken to come into agreement as to facts before publicity, and what constructive suggestions were made and how far they were carried out.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly state what effect in your opinion has the teaching of political economy upon the first-hand, everyday, industrial life thereafter. Are studies of labor being made in all of those departments?

Dr. ALLEN. You mean, now, within the colleges or within the foundations?

Chairman WALSH. Within the colleges.

Dr. ALLEN. Within the colleges. Because of the men turned out from a college or university, especially because I know extension work that may be done within colleges or universities, it is possible through imparting information and teaching methods of examination to make a university or college a center for study and a center for propagating interest in a sense of justice regarding labor questions. It is possible, of course, and perhaps the most important relation can be found up to date in the effect of such studies upon the governmental agencies with which universities may establish contact and for which they may furnish men.

Chairman WALSH. Could you suggest, Doctor, what constructive results may be hoped to be accomplished by this particular study of foundations?

Dr. ALLEN. So far as our instructions are concerned as to who are to make investigations, we have been asked to look into the powers granted to great foundations, to see whether or not that power should be more clearly defined in acts of incorporation. If the inquiries develop that during these hearings facts which would lead the commission to feel that as yet the powers of foundations have not been adequately limited or defined, it would be an important next step for Congress, for legislatures, to consider how to prescribe the relation between the general public and those who establish and conduct foundations.

With regard perhaps to the publicity that shall be given to the working of foundations, it was thought even from the studies that have been made and from the testimony that has been heard to date that perhaps constructive suggestions, easy to carry out, can result from this study.

With regard to the inspection studies of the holding of foundations accountable through some State or national department, in effect, licensing, such as one of the witnesses this morning has suggested, it may be testimony will suggest that it would be of great help to the work that the foundations do and a great protection to the public if there is somebody representing the public that is permanently responsible for the use made of powers, financial and legal, by the various foundations.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you have made studies during your connection with this commission and have discovered many facts bearing upon the general topic; that is, the attitude of certain groups of people toward the foundation and their attitude toward certain groups, and the light that would grow particularly, dropping into the line of the foundations that would disclose these facts, and I will ask you, Doctor, at this time, to put off the further giving of your evidence until after we call some other witnesses. I just want you to know that you will be called upon to give all of these facts growing out of your studies. That will be all for the present.

Mr. Ivy L. Lee.

TESTIMONY OF MR. IVY L. LEE.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. LEE. Ivy L. Lee.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. LEE. I am a member of the personal staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you been a member of the staff of Mr. John D. Rockefeller?

Mr. LEE. Since January 1, 1915.

Chairman WALSH. And what was your business prior to that time?

Mr. LEE. I was executive assistant of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

Chairman WALSH. What were your duties as executive assistant of the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.?

Mr. LEE. Well, Mr. Chairman, the Pennsylvania Railroad has a book of organization which describes the duties of each officer, and, as near as I can recall it, my duties were described about as follows: The executive assistant shall perform such duties as may be assigned to him by the president, vice presidents, or the board of directors.

Chairman WALSH. Just what duties were assigned to you?

Mr. LEE. I had general charge of the publicity department of the company. I also performed a great many special assignments on behalf of different officers.

Chairman WALSH. Please state first what your duties were in the publicity department.

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, the theory of the Pennsylvania Railroad was that it was desirable that the public should be fully informed concerning its various activities. It was in a general way my duty to keep in close touch with the activities of the company and to advise with the officers as occasion suggested itself as to matters in which the public would be interested and as to how they should be made public. But I should also add that the feeling developed that publicity would pretty generally take care of itself providing the things to be made public were in themselves interesting and praiseworthy. Out of the functions of publicity grew the additional function of constantly studying the activities of the company, the activities which the company should undertake, with a view to making suggestions as to policies which should commend themselves to an enlightened public opinion.

Chairman WALSH. When you found them out, what did you do?

Mr. LEE. Those were suggested to the officers in different departments, and if they approved the suggestion it was carried out.

Chairman WALSH. That is, you gathered what you thought would be interesting facts and praiseworthy facts, I believe you stated, and then submitted them to the officers, and if they approved did you write them for distribution?

Mr. LEE. Oh, no.

Chairman WALSH. Then I did not understand you.

Mr. LEE. What I said was, I suggested to officers as occasion developed any policies which it seemed to me the company should undertake in addition to those it already had, which would commend themselves to an enlightened public opinion. My feeling was that the writing of the facts and the actual routine of the publicity were matters that would pretty likely take care of themselves.

Chairman WALSH. Then you did not write anything about the policy, did I understand?

Mr. LEE. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. Well, what did you do?

Mr. LEE. I did not catch that.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe what you did then with the same policies you discovered, you thought, and told them to the management, and then what was done.

Mr. LEE. I assisted constantly in the preparation of material to be given to the press.

Chairman WALSH. Did you write the material yourself?

Mr. LEE. A good deal of it. Some of it was written by others, while many of the statements and much of the information given to the press by the Pennsylvania Railroad I had nothing to do with writing.

Chairman WALSH. Was it under your general charge?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you pass on it before it was given to the press?

Mr. LEE. Not if it had been previously passed on by some officer of superior authority.

Chairman WALSH. Well, now, what officer would you say in the Pennsylvania organization had that authority?

Mr. LEE. Well, certainly the president and vice presidents and the general manager. I should like to answer your question more comprehensively, but I am afraid I could not; I would not mean to assume I was superior in authority to officers other than those.

Chairman WALSH. Very good. So much for the publicity. Now what were the other duties that were given you outside of the publicity department?

Mr. LEE. I should say I had many special assignments.

Chairman WALSH. Of what nature generally? I do not want specific assignments, but what was the nature of your general assignment outside of the publicity department?

Mr. LEE. In a general way, my job was to study the activities of the company; to criticize at any point where it seemed to me criticism was deserved; to bring, if I could, a somewhat detached viewpoint to the service of the railroad, in order that the viewpoint of a layman might be obtained with reference to the various policies of the company.

Chairman WALSH. Prior to your employment by the Pennsylvania—how long were you in the employment of the Pennsylvania Railroad?

Mr. LEE. I was in their employment twice; the last time for a period of somewhat over two years, I think. Before that I had acted for three years as general manager in Europe for a banking house, and before that time I had been connected with the Pennsylvania for several years.

Chairman WALSH. What was your general connection with the banking house—was it in the publicity business?

Mr. LEE. No.

Chairman WALSH. In the interval between the time that you worked for this road what did you do? You say you worked for them twice. Was it in the interval you worked for the banking house?

Mr. LEE. Yes; for three years I had charge of the business of this firm in Europe.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever been in the newspaper business?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. As a reporter?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what papers?

Mr. LEE. I was on the New York Journal, as it was then called, now the American; the New York Times, and the New York World.

Chairman WALSH. When were you first approached in regard to undertaking the publicity work in connection with the strike in the coal fields of Colorado?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, if you will permit me, I will tell you the whole story of the Colorado publicity and perhaps save your time.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. LEE. It was about the last of May that Mr. Rockefeller, jr., asked me to come to see him.

Chairman WALSH. Had you ever met him before?

Mr. LEE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know how he came to ask you to come?

Mr. LEE. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. That was May, 1914?

Mr. LEE. 1914; yes.

Chairman WALSH. The strike was going on then?

Mr. LEE. Yes; I understand so. Mr. Rockefeller asked me to come to see him. His first request was to know if I could suggest some one who could cooperate with his office and his associates in Colorado in getting the facts concerning the situation in Colorado before the public. We had quite a talk concerning the general situation. Mr. Rockefeller explained to me his very strong feeling that the public had wholly misunderstood his attitude and had misunderstood the essential attitude of the operators. We discussed various ideas, and I told him that so far as I was concerned I should be glad to think the matter over, and if I could suggest anyone to do this work for him I should be glad to do so. I went to St. Louis, I believe, the same afternoon; and while I was away Mr. Rockefeller had a talk, I understand, with the president of the Pennsylvania Railroad, and asked him if he could lend my services to him for the time being. Mr. Rea, I think, told Mr. Rockefeller that that would hardly be feasible, but that there would be no objection to my advising with him to such extent as would not interfere with my regular duties with the railroad. I then saw Mr. Rockefeller again, and told him that it seemed to me the first and most important feature of any plan of publicity should be its absolute frankness; that there should be no devious ways employed. It had been suggested to Mr. Rockefeller that it would be a good idea to advertise in the newspapers extensively his viewpoint on this subject. I advised him that that would be in the highest degree unwise, and that no money should be used in any way, directly or indirectly, to influence the attitude of the press on this subject; that if the operators had a story to tell they ought to tell it themselves, and tell it frankly, and tell it fully, so that everybody would know it was they who were telling it. Mr. Rockefeller fully agreed with this idea.

Then the question came up as to how this might be done. This was in the early part of June. The excitement in Colorado had died down somewhat. There was no newspaper interest in the subject at the time. It was quite obvious, therefore, that the newspapers would not print any information that would be given to them. And yet it was of the greatest importance, it seemed, that the true attitude of the operators, as they themselves understood it, should be made known to the public. I therefore suggested a plan which had been followed by the railroads in their propoganda for an increase of 5 per cent in freight rates, with the publicity in which case I had had the pleasure of having something to do. The plan there was to prepare abstracts of the more important material in hand and send it out from day to day to the newspapers, to Members of Congress, commercial bodies, to economists, and to anyone else who might have a reasonable interest in that subject, always sending it in the name and on behalf of the committee of railroad presidents which had the matter in charge, declining at all times to pay anybody for the printing of it, sticking as closely as possible to the text of the material presented to the Interstate Commerce Commission. It seemed to me that the only way of getting before a considerable number of people in the country the essential facts of the attitude of the Colorado operators was to issue a series of bulletins of somewhat similar character.

I therefore asked Mr. Rockefeller to put me in touch, if he would, with the operators, and I suggested to him that anything that was put out should be in the name of the operators and on their full responsibility; for it was quite impossible for me to make an investigation of the conditions; and even if that had been possible and I should have put out anything in my own name it would have been of no value, for the people directly involved should be the ones to tell their story. Mr. Rockefeller then put me in touch with the committee of which Mr. Welborn was chairman. Various bulletins were prepared on the basis of information supplied to me by Mr. Welborn. I think that was in the latter part of June when the issuance of the bulletins began. I was unable to go to Colorado myself until my vacation period in August. Up to that time—

Chairman WALSH. What time in August?

Mr. LEE. I think it was the 3d or 4th, Mr. Chairman. Up to that time all the bulletins issued had consisted of extracts from material which had been published by some official authority or of material which I had sent to Mr. Welborn for his approval before putting it into type. In order that the typography might be as effective as possible, the bulletins were printed in Philadelphia, where my office was. In order, however, that the full responsibility for the bulletins should be placed upon the operators, the envelopes, addressed from a list prepared in my office in Philadelphia, and the bulletins were sent in separate packages to be inclosed in Colorado if they met the approval of the operators; and that policy was followed from beginning to end.

Chairman WALSH. Did you intend also, or was it any part of your intention, to convey the idea that they came from Colorado, that they were compiled in Colorado?

Mr. LEE. That thought never entered my mind. The essential point was that they should be issued by the operators. It would not have been in keeping with that thought if they had been mailed anywhere else.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

Mr. LEE. Now, in October I went to Colorado, where I met a number of the operators, and had many conferences with the members of the operators' committee. One or two bulletins were prepared in Colorado.

Chairman WALSH. How long were you there in August?

Mr. LEE. I should say about three weeks; maybe four.

Chairman WALSH. Was publicity given to the fact that you were there and what your business was?

Mr. LEE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed.

Mr. LEE. The reason for no publicity being given to my presence was that I was still acting in a purely advisory capacity and was in no sense an intermediary, represented no one, and was spokesman for no one. Therefore, for me to have injected my personality into the matter would have been to introduce a foreign note which would have been wholly unnecessary. As noted while I was in Colorado several additional bulletins were prepared after consultation with members of the operators' committee. Using extracts from the official documents, using material which was supplied me by the different operators—

Chairman WALSH. Just describe the material as you go along. That is, what it consisted of.

Mr. LEE. It consisted of statements, compilation of material—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Personal press notices?

Mr. LEE. Press notices and clippings and a great variety of matter which would naturally be called to my attention in such an undertaking. That plan was continued until along in October, I think it was, when we found a very great demand had grown up for copies of these bulletins, and we thought the wisest plan would be to reprint them in a small pamphlet, to include in addition to the bulletins a summary of the whole situation. The material for that summary was obtained from Mr. Welborn and Mr. Gove, one of the officers of the Victor American Co.

Chairman WALSH. That was in October?

Mr. LEE. The document was published in October. In order that even this compiled document should still be subject to the supervision of the operators' committee, after some hesitation I sent these documents out to Denver—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). From where?

Mr. LEE. From Philadelphia—where they were all printed. It was a very expensive proceeding to send them out to Denver, but it seemed to me the responsibility should be definitely placed and that everything sent out in the name of the operators, should be sent out by them, so that everybody would know whence it came.

While these documents were en route I received a telegram from Mr. Welborn stating that there was an error in one of the bulletins, and asking if I did not think that this error should be corrected in the compiled pamphlet. I wired him, I think October 1, to the effect that the pamphlets had been shipped, but I suggested that an errata slip be printed in Denver and be inclosed with the pamphlets when sent out. I did not know what the error was, or anything about it. It never occurred to me that it was an error of any consequence. The error, as I afterwards learned, was one which was serious and unfortunate; that was, a mistake in stating the amounts of salaries which had been paid to union officers as being for a period of nine weeks when the amounts had actually been for one year.

Chairman WALSH. Who discovered that error?

Mr. LEE. My first knowledge of it was in this telegram from Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. And what was the date, your say—the 1st of October?

Mr. LEE. That was the 1st of October.

Chairman WALSH. That was about two months before the hearing of this commission in Denver?

Mr. LEE. I so understand. I assumed, of course, that this correction had been made. I knew nothing of the nature of the error, because the original matter on which this particular bulletin had been prepared consisted of an advertisement which had appeared in one of the Colorado papers, a copy of which had been given to me by Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. What paper was it, do you know?

Mr. LEE. I really do not know, Mr. Walsh, but I had no doubt of its authenticity. As I say, I knew nothing of the nature of the error which had been made, but sent this telegram as one would concerning any error which had been discovered. The next information that I myself had concerning the nature of the error was in the newspaper reports which I had seen concerning the hearing of this commission in Denver. As soon as I found out what had been done I again telegraphed Mr. Welborn my own view that a new bulletin should be issued correcting the error and any other errors that might have been made in the bulletins.

After sending that telegram I advised Mr. Rockefeller that I had sent the message, and he told me that he would like me to send a message in his name saying the same thing—saying that we felt that the cause for which the operators stood was sufficiently strong to be justified upon the basis of the facts and facts alone. In order that there might be no delay, and in order that the suggestion might be put in concrete form, as soon as I could find out just exactly what the situation was and what had happened I myself prepared an additional bulletin setting forth the fact that this error had been made, and stating the facts as we had ascertained them. I then recommended to Mr. Welborn that this new bulletin should be issued and that though the reason for a continuance of the propaganda had ceased a copy of that bulletin should be sent to every person who had received any of the others. Such a bulletin, I think, was issued about the 1st of January.

Chairman WALSH. That covers the whole situation?

Mr. LEE. That covers all that I have to suggest.

Chairman WALSH. Were any letters written to you either proposing or making arrangement for your going to Colorado?

Mr. LEE. I don't think so, Mr. Chairman. As I recall it, Mr. Rockefeller said during our first few talks that he thought it was desirable for me to go to Colorado as soon as I could to have a talk with the operators' committee in order primarily that they might understand his point of view and my point of view with reference to the policy of this publicity, and that we thought above all else it should be frank, open, and on the responsibility of the operators.

Chairman WALSH. Did any letters pass between you and Mr. Rockefeller before you went to Colorado?

Mr. LEE. Yes; I had many letters from Mr. Rockefeller between the date of my first relationship with him and the date I went to Colorado.

Chairman WALSH. With reference to the Colorado situation?

Mr. LEE. I don't think so, Mr. Chairman. I think all his letters were of a general character relating to—

Chairman WALSH. With reference to publicity?

Mr. LEE. I don't recall their nature.

Chairman WALSH. With reference to your employment?

Mr. LEE. May I ask what you mean by that question?

Chairman WALSH. With reference to your employment in the publicity line?

Mr. LEE. No; he had no occasion to write me any letter on that subject.

Chairman WALSH. Well, upon what subjects were the letters—you didn't know Mr. Rockefeller before?

Mr. LEE. No.

Chairman WALSH. Well, would you have any objection to just producing the letters themselves?

Mr. LEE. I will be very glad to show you all that I have.

(The letters referred to were subsequently submitted by Mr. Lee, but having no relevance to the work of the commission, it was not considered necessary to make them a part of the official records.)

Chairman WALSH. Did you have a discussion with Mr. Rockefeller before you went into employment as to what your duties were to be, any other than what you have already detailed?

Mr. LEE. None.

Chairman WALSH. When you went to Colorado you were sent there to publish the facts as given to you by the executive officers of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., or whom?

Mr. LEE. I was to get my information, and this work was to be done in co-operation with and under the supervision of the operators' committee.

Chairman WALSH. And Mr. Rockefeller told you to be sure to get the truth about the matter?

Mr. LEE. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Now, take the material they gave you in the form of newspaper clippings, did you ask them what newspapers they came out of?

Mr. LEE. I don't recall that the necessity of asking that question arose.

Chairman WALSH. Did they tell you that one of their attorneys owned a newspaper in Trinidad, that was giving very great publicity to one side of the case out there?

Mr. LEE. They did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did they tell you or did you know that any of their employees owned newspapers out there?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ask them whether or not they were interested in any way in the newspapers that contained these clippings?

Mr. LEE. I did.

Chairman WALSH. What did they say?

Mr. LEE. They said they were not.

Chairman WALSH. Just detail now what steps you took to ascertain the facts before you wrote any of these articles—give us all of the steps.

Mr. LEE. I had no opportunity, Mr. Chairman, to ascertain the facts from my own point of view. I had to ascertain the facts as the operators' committee saw them. It was their story that I was to assist in getting before the public, and not my own.

Chairman WALSH. And, therefore, you did not question any fact that was presented to you, any alleged fact that was presented to you, as to its alleged authenticity?

Mr. LEE. Not when presented by Mr. Welborn or one of his committee.

Chairman WALSH. You were expecting to get as wide publicity as is possible for the case of the operators alone in Colorado, were you not?

Mr. LEE. I was expecting to get their point of view and their case as they saw it as definitely as I could before the largest number of people who would be apt to read it.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would just describe now, when the material was handed you, that went into this book, what personal efforts you made to ascertain its accuracy or reliability.

Mr. LEE. None whatever, beyond what Mr. Welborn told me and the information that he and the members of his committee gave me. I took their word as being given with the utmost good faith, and I still believe it was done with the utmost good faith.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any attempt to secure the statements of disinterested persons?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you make any efforts to secure statements from the workers themselves or from the representatives of the labor unions?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the testimony that had been given before the congressional committee?

Mr. LEE. I did not read it all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. What part did you read?

Mr. LEE. I don't recall the part that I read. I read a considerable portion of it, because, to my mind, my effort was to assist the operators to tell their own story. I can not too strongly impress upon you the fact that it was the operators' story being told, and not mine.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the testimony before the commission on the militia appointed by the governor of Colorado, Gov. Ammons?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. How many copies of the bulletin were issued?

Mr. LEE. Approximately 40,000.

Chairman WALSH. From whom did you get your mailing list?

Mr. LEE. The mailing list was prepared mainly under my direction, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. How was it prepared? Where did you get the names?

Mr. LEE. I suggested to one of my clerks that he get up a list containing the names of Members of Congress, of members of State legislatures, of the leading newspapers of the country, of the leading officers of the American Federation of Labor, of all of the officers I could obtain of the United Mine Workers of America, of all the other important labor leaders in the country, as well as a good many others. The idea was, and it was Mr. Rockefeller's idea, that the truth, as it was understood by him, and as it was understood by the operators, was sound; that we ought to make it known to the public; that if it was not sound, any publicity for it would clear it up; and we wanted everybody, the labor leaders, the press, and everybody else to get our point of view.

Chairman WALSH. Then, you assume the full responsibility, as I understand it, of securing the mailing list to whom these bulletins were to be sent?

Mr. LEE. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Who paid for the publication of the bulletins?

Mr. LEE. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. paid the bills I submitted to them.

Chairman WALSH. By whom were the bulletins printed—what printing house?

Mr. LEE. Beck Engraving Co., of Philadelphia.

Chairman WALSH. What did it cost?

Mr. LEE. I don't recall. I think Mr. Welborn testified all the bills were sent to him.

Chairman WALSH. Well, approximately the cost.

Mr. LEE. The only summary I have seen of the cost was the one which Mr. Welborn made, which I understand was $12,000.

Chairman WALSH. Who paid for the mailing of the bulletins?

Mr. LEE. The same.

Chairman WALSH. What was the cost?

Mr. LEE. I really don't know, Mr. Chairman. I should be very glad to submit to the commission the entire detailed bills.

Chairman WALSH. You are now connected with Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had occasion yet to read the record of the hearing before the congressional committee in this matter in Colorado?

Mr. LEE. I have not had occasion to read the entire record.

Chairman WALSH. Have you read the testimony given in Colorado before this commission?

Mr. LEE. I have not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the newspaper accounts of what purported to be the testimony given before this commission in Colorado?

Mr. LEE. Some of them.

Chairman WALSH. After acquiring any additional knowledge that you may have acquired I would ask you whether or not you consider this book, Facts Concerning the Struggle in Colorado for Industrial Freedom, fairly representative of the publicity of average corporations—large corporations?

Mr. LEE. I would not be able to answer your question, Mr. Chairman, but I would say that I believe the book represents the honest point of view of the operators' committee in Colorado, with the exception of the error which has been corrected.

Chairman WALSH. What arrangements were made in advance for the correction of any inaccuracies that might be discovered in the bulletins?

Mr. LEE. They were sent to Mr. Welborn in Denver not inclosed in envelopes, so that in the event that any corrections should be necessary they could be made before mailing. The inclosing and mailing was done under Mr. Welborn's direction, and the entire responsibility for getting them out was that of the operators' committee.

Chairman WALSH. Have you written publicity in labor disputes before?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. For coal companies?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. And you were acquainted with Frank J. Hayes?

Mr. LEE. No, sir.

Chairman WALSH. You knew who he was, that he was an executive officer of the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. LEE. I don't think, Mr. Chairman, that I ever saw Mr. Hayes; that is, in connection with this.

Chairman WALSH. Or knew who the gentleman was?

Mr. LEE. Not as far as I remember.

Chairman WALSH. Was this advertising matter which you took—this material—did it show on its face what newspaper it came from?

Mr. LEE. I don't recall.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would just state now. You actually wrote the pamphlet or bulletin yourself, did you not, or dictated it?

Mr. LEE. I suppose so. I do not recollect all of the bulletins, although I think I compiled all of them, and I went over them carefully.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would state what appeared in the bulletin with reference to Frank J. Hayes, John R. Lawson, and Mother Jones with reference to their compensation and what the actual fact was that you ascertained afterwards.

Mr. LEE. The statement as given in the pamphlet covered the salary and expenses of these leaders of the union for what purported to be a period of nine weeks. I afterwards learned during the Denver hearings of this commission—and, as I say, it did not come to my knowledge before that—that the figures which purported to be for a period of nine weeks, were, as has been stated in the correction, for a period of one year.

Chairman WALSH. What would you say was the effect that that bulletin would have upon the reader?

Mr. LEE. I don't know; but I know the impression given me by the bulletin was a very exaggerated one of what I afterwards found to be the fact.

Chairman WALSH. What was your purpose in placing such information before the public anyway as to the amount of compensation they received from their own union?

Mr. LEE. That would involve a statement of Mr. Welborn's purpose, Mr. Chairman, which I have no opportunity of making.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ask him what was his idea in publishing these facts?

Mr. LEE. I did not. Mr. Welborn gave me this statement and suggested we put it in the bulletin.

Chairman WALSH. Didn't you think at the time that to put it in the bulletin would have a tendency to destroy the reputation and undermine the influence of such men and women in their own organization and in other labor organizations, and in the minds of the public generally—that they received such huge compensation.

Mr. LEE. It struck me that the figures were very large.

Chairman WALSH. Did you say anything to Mr. Welborn at the time.

Mr. LEE. I think I made the same remark to him.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ask Mr. Welborn whether or not the giving out of such a statement was not designed to injure the reputations of these people.

Mr. LEE. I do not think so; I think Mr. Welborn believed firmly that that statement was true.

Chairman WALSH. When was the accuracy of this particular statement first brought to your notice?

Mr. LEE. October 1.

Chairman WALSH. By whom?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. October 1. And when did you take your first step to correct it?

Mr. LEE. That day.

Chairman WALSH. And when was the publication made?

Mr. LEE. The publication of a bulletin covering the whole subject was made on January 2, I think.

Chairman WALSH. I want to know when you first sent out the notice that that was an error that those people received any such amount of money.

Mr. LEE. I never sent out such a notice. The operators sent out such a bulletin on January 2.

Chairman WALSH. Did you write it for them?

Mr. LEE. I did. Now, Mr. Chairman, let us understand this, because it is very important to get this exactly correct. Mr. Welborn called to my attention by telegram on October 1, as I have stated, that an error had been made. He did not state the nature of the error, and asked that if I did not think the pamphlet should be corrected. I telegraphed him that the pamphlets had been sent to him at Denver and suggested that he have a slip printed in Denver, correcting the error.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please submit those telegrams to the commission?

Mr. LEE. I should be very happy to do so.

Chairman WALSH. That date was about October 1?

Mr. LEE. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were you aware of the fact that about that time attention was called of Frank E. Gove, attorney for the Victor-American Fuel Co., by Mr. John E. Fitch, a newspaper man and one of the editors of the Survey of this city, to the effect that that was inaccurate and that those men received no such money?

Mr. LEE. I was not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you not have any machinery provided by which a misstatement of that kind could be corrected in less time than three months?

Mr. LEE. I thought, Mr. Chairman, that it would be done immediately in accordance with my telegram suggesting it. And, while I did have charge of certain other publicity, so far as the bulletins were concerned, I only had charge of the compilation of the material, the printing of it, and sending it to Denver. The operators issued all the statements from Denver. With that I had nothing whatever to do.

Chairman WALSH. Where was the mailing list that the first story as to these men went out from, right at that time?

Mr. LEE. As I told you, the envelopes were addressed and the mailing list kept in Philadelphia.

Mr. WALSH. Was that mailing list in Philadelphia at that time, October 1?

Mr. LEE. If you mean the original stencils from which the envelopes—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). The mailing list you sent out the first 40,000 of these bulletins containing this statement from. Was that in Philadelphia October 1?

Mr. LEE. I think—I want to answer your question accurately if I can get it exactly.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. LEE. The only form in which the mailing list was kept was in the form of stencils to use on an addressing machine. I presume you mean the envelopes in which it was designed to inclose these pamphlets.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you get the names from—the names and addresses of the people to whom the bulletins—that bulletin was first sent?

Mr. LEE. Well, that bulletin was sent to the first list I have named.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you get the names, and how did you keep them?

Mr. LEE. As I told you a few moments ago, Mr. Chairman, I had one of my clerks prepare the list from such data as he was able to get access to. These lists were then put on stencils for use on the addressing machine. Then the envelopes were addressed by the addressing machine.

Chairman WALSH. And if you had some more envelopes to address you could easily use the same stencils?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Where were the stencils?

Mr. LEE. In Philadelphia.

Chairman WALSH. Are they still in Philadelphia?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And they remained there until you sent out this correction on January 2?

Mr. LEE. Yes; they have been there all the time.

Chairman WALSH. You knew there was no bulletin sent out, at least to some of the persons to whom you sent out the original statement with regard to these men, during October, November, and December, did you not?

Mr. LEE. I assumed the correction would be made as I suggested in the form of an errata slip in the pamphlet.

Chairman WALSH. Did you see any of the pamphlets that were sent out from Denver after they were sent out?

Mr. LEE. I do not recall whether I saw them or not; I might have seen some of them.

Chairman WALSH. Were you not interested enough, you having written the original bulletin, to ascertain whether or not that statement was made in them as sent out?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, Mr. Welborn was the chairman of the committee in charge, and I was hardly employed to give Mr. Welborn instructions as to what he should do.

Chairman WALSH. When did you receive the telegram from Mr. Welborn that an error had been made?

Mr. LEE. The 1st of October.

Chairman WALSH. Where were the originals at that time—the original pamphlets?

Mr. LEE. They were en route to Denver.

Chairman WALSH. How would you know that they were en route to Denver and had not arrived there?

Mr. LEE. In that case I do not believe Mr. Welborn would have sent me the telegram suggesting that this correction be made in the pamphlet.

Chairman WALSH. You were satisfied they had not reached there?

Mr. LEE. I had sent them, but took it for granted he had not received them.

Chairman WALSH. So then he sent out the pamphlets with that knowledge that that was not the truth?

Mr. LEE. That would be an inference, Mr. Chairman, to which I could hardly testify.

Chairman WALSH. When was the strike called off?

Mr. LEE. I do not recall.

Chairman WALSH. Did you or did you not see many of the newspaper publications following this bulletin with the same statement in it?

Mr. LEE. I do not think I saw any. The material in these bulletins was published but little in the newspapers.

Chairman WALSH. Did you ever perform any work for any of the corporations of which Mr. Rockefeller was president or for any corporation in which he was interested or for any business or philanthropic enterprises prior to your agreement to go to Colorado?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Is the compensation which you have received from Mr. Rockefeller intended to cover your compensation for writing these bulletins in full?

Mr. LEE. I do not think I can add anything to what Mr. Rockefeller said on that point, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Well, just repeat it, then; it has gone out of my mind. It is all right with me if it is a repetition.

Mr. LEE. As I recall it, he stated he had paid me for my services, but that he had not yet taken the matter up with the Colorado operators. I may say that I do not expect to receive any additional compensation and that I consider the matter closed.

Chairman WALSH. When did you go to work? I will ask you, first, did you prepare the statement to the press issued by Mr. Jerome D. Greene, secretary of the Rockefeller Foundation, dated October 1, 1914, with the following heading: "The Rockefeller Foundation has inaugurated a far-reaching investigation of industrial relations, and has appointed as director Hon. W. L. Mackenzie King"?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you write the article dated October 31, 1914—maybe I can cover several of these. When did you write your first publicity for any of the Rockefeller enterprises, after you did this Colorado piece of work?

Mr. LEE. I hardly know how to answer that question, Mr. Chairman. During the fall, after Mr. Rockefeller returned from his vacation and I came back from Colorado, I heard Mr. Rockefeller say on a number of occasions that he thought a policy of somewhat broader publicity ought to be entered upon by his various enterprises, and he asked my advice and collaboration in the preparation of some material which was issued. I do not recall just which document was the first one concerning which I was called into conference.

Chairman WALSH. Did you write the document released for publication Sunday, December 27, with the heading, "The boys' corn-club movement"?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, the documents you have in your hand are the preliminary extracts of the first comprehensive report of the General Education Board. These documents are compilations of portions of the report. I suggested to the General Education Board that they make their report public in that form, in addition to the book form in which it was to be published, and I assisted Dr. Buttrick, the secretary, and the other officers in the preparation of the articles in this form.

Chairman WALSH. Did you do any of the writing yourself?

Mr. LEE. If you will examine them you will see that they are almost wholly quotations from the book.

Chairman WALSH. Did you do any of the writing in them yourself? In this one, entitled "Boys' corn-club movement"?

Mr. LEE. I may have written a paragraph to introduce the subject.

Chairman WALSH. Did you write the headline, "The boys' corn-club movement"?

Mr. LEE. Yes; I did.

Chairman WALSH. The article released for publication Thursday, December 17, entitled "Disposition of funds"—

Mr. LEE (interrupting). I can probably save your time if I tell you frankly that I wrote the headlines for all those articles, and I compiled the various bulletins. The publication of this preliminary matter was turned over to me and I was asked to put it in such shape as would be most available for the purpose.

Chairman WALSH. You know what I have in mind from seeing it in my hands?

Mr. LEE. Perfectly.

Chairman WALSH. What interest did you understand you were at work for while you were preparing those notices?

Mr. LEE. I understood I was assisting Mr. Rockefeller in one of his larger interests.

Chairman WALSH. Did you understand—did you think at the time you were working for some business corporation in which Mr. Rockefeller was a director, as a member of Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff, or for the Rockefeller Foundation, or for the General Education Board, I should say?

Mr. LEE. Of course the Rockefeller Foundation had nothing to do with it.

Chairman WALSH. Or the General Education Board?

Mr. LEE. So far as I can analyze my purpose, it was simply to assist the General Education Board to get the material in their own report effectively before the public.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that all of the publicity material and press notices issued by the—by any of the Rockefeller institutions since the time you went to Colorado has been compiled or prepared by yourself?

Mr. LEE. That is not a fact.

Chairman WALSH. If not, please specify the particular pieces of material that were not compiled by you.

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, I am not familiar with all of the material that has been made public by all of the Rockefeller interests. I only know those which I had a part in preparing.

Chairman WALSH. Recall, if you please, any that you know that were issued that you did not have this part in preparing or compiling.

Mr. LEE. You have just called my attention to one—the announcement of Mr. King's appointment.

Chairman WALSH. Any other than that?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Chairman, that would involve a familiarity with all of the material which has been issued for publication by all of the Rockefeller interests, and I am not familiar with it. I am quite prepared, Mr. Chairman, to tell you all those with which I had any connection at all.

Chairman WALSH. Very good; if you have any others in mind, please tell them.

Mr. LEE. I do that simply to save your time. I assisted in the preparation of several documents which have been included in the exhibits to the questionnaire, giving information as to the activities of the Rockefeller Foundation and several others. They are all included in the questionnaire.

Chairman WALSH. Now, did you have any further communication with Mr. Welborn, other than this telegram that you received, stating that an error had been made in the bulletin in regard to the matter?

Mr. LEE. I do not recall, Mr. Chairman; I have had numerous letters from Mr. Welborn.

Chairman WALSH. How do you know that that was the error he referred to? That is the inaccuracy of the statement as to the amount of money that Frank J. Hayes, John R. Lawson, and Mother Jones had received from the United Mine Workers of America.

Mr. LEE. Because in his telegram to me he stated that an error had been made in the bulletin with reference to that subject. He did not state, however, the nature of the error. I shall be very glad to show you the telegram.

Chairman WALSH. You are going to produce it?

Mr. LEE. Yes; with pleasure.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read the testimony of Mr. Welborn upon that topic before this commission in Denver?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. I will read a few paragraphs of it. This was given on December 5, 1914:

Chairman WALSH. Please refer to page 67"—

That is, of your bulletin—

"In the first paragraph I see there you have 'Frank J. Hayes, nine weeks' salary, $4,052.92; Frank J. Hayes, nine weeks' expenses, $1,667.20; total for salary and expenses, $5,720.12. Frank J. Hayes was thus paid over $90 a day; at the rate of over $32,000 a year. For just the same period of nine weeks John McLennan received for salary $2,683.65 and for expenses $1,469.55, or $66 a day. John R. Lawson received for nine weeks' salary $1,772.40. Mother Jones, whose sole duty was to agitate, received $2,668.62 salary for the same period; $42 a day.'"

Then this question was asked:

"Chairman WALSH. Did you give that statement to the publicity man that actually wrote the matter?"

"Mr. WELBORN. I did not specifically give it to him. He took that along with a lot of other information that I had that was taken from my office in connection with the difficulty at that time.

"Chairman WALSH. Is that one of the statements that you accept personal responsibility for the truth of, Mr. Welborn?"

"Mr. WELBORN. I accept the same responsibility that I would as to any published statement that had gone undenied to which, as in the case of this one, I referred before the congressional committee without a denial having been entered as to its correctness.

"Chairman WALSH. I heard Mr. McLennan testify that his salary during this time was $4 per day. If that turned out to be the truth, had you some means to correct the misstatements that occurred here?"

This was December 5.

"Mr. WELBORN. I doubt if there is any means of determining whether or not that is true. I would just as soon believe these figures as true as the others."

Did you know that Mr. Welborn so testified before this commission in Denver?

Mr. LEE. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Is it your understanding that in the future you will direct the publications—the publicity for the General Education Board, for the Rockefeller Foundation, for the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., for the Standard Oil Co., and for the Rockefeller interests generally?

Mr. LEE. It is not my understanding that I will do that, Mr. Chairman. On the contrary, it is my understanding that I will not do that.

Chairman WALSH. What publicity do you expect to attend to in the future, for what might be called the Rockefeller interests?

Mr. LEE. If I may be permitted to express Mr. Rockefeller's ideas, as he expressed them yesterday very much better than I can, he said he felt that greater publicity should be given to the activities in which he was interested.

Chairman WALSH. What are those?

Mr. LEE. That the public should be taken into his confidence and into the confidence of those whom he could influence, and I have no doubt that one of the duties which will fall to me to perform will be in advising with reference to effective methods of giving publicity to various material.

Chairman WALSH. And will that include all of the business activities which I have mentioned?

Mr. LEE. It will not.

Chairman WALSH. What will it include?

Mr. LEE. I do not know, Mr. Chairman. Mr. Rockefeller would, doubtless, when such matters arose in which his interests were concerned, probably ask my collaboration. I have only been there a very short time. I do not know into what it will develop.

Chairman WALSH. If you were called upon to suggest publicity or compile publicity for those corporations, would you go ahead and do so? Would you feel you were being paid for that?

Mr. LEE. I should feel I was being paid to do anything in the common interests of Mr. Rockefeller's office.

Chairman WALSH. And with regard to the publicity for any of those business or philanthropic activities which I have mentioned to you?

Mr. LEE. I should consider I was advancing his very best interests in contributing in any way in my power to secure publicity for the activities of any of those institutions.

Chairman WALSH. In the preparation of the various pieces of publicity for the Rockefeller Foundation or the General Education Board, from whom did you obtain the material used in the statements?

Mr. LEE. So far as the Rockefeller Foundation is concerned, I did not obtain these from anybody. I was called into consultation in the preparation of various statements which were given to the press.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know personally whether or not the statements were in every way correct?

Mr. LEE. I believe that any statement which Mr. Rockefeller's staff would prepare, or which would emanate from his office, would be absolutely correct.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a change in the status of your work after the 1st of January, from what it had been prior to that time?

Mr. LEE. A very great change, Mr. Chairman. Before the 1st of January I was simply called into consultation with reference to a few of Mr. Rockefeller's interests, and specifically with reference to a few matters specially relating to publicity. After January 1 I became a member of his father's staff, which involved a variety of activities.

Chairman WALSH. Following the obtaining of the material upon—one minute, please.

Now, outside of the facts, and alleged facts, that were contained in this Colorado bulletin, did you write the comments and the argument yourself?

Mr. LEE. I assume you mean the introduction to the pamphlet; the first part of it?

Chairman WALSH. Any comment?

Mr. LEE. The only thing that could be called a comment would be the introduction, and I assume you have that in mind. That, as I told you, was a compilation of material given to me by Mr. Welborn and Mr. Gove, and almost entirely in their language.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if you wrote this "Why the strike was forced on the Colorado miners. A transcendent consequence is the fact that the Colorado coal strike was not due to the dissatisfaction of the men with their working conditions."

Did you know whether it was or not?

Mr. LEE. I did not. That statement was given to me, as I have told you, by the operators' committee.

Chairman WALSH. "The union decided at its headquarters in Indianapolis that there should be a strike. Agitators were accordingly sent to Colorado to stir up trouble and to arouse the men to fancied grievances." Did you write that?

Mr. LEE. I should have to make the same answer.

Chairman WALSH. Did you write this argument, "Recognition of the union was the underlying motive of the strike planned." Did you say that?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Welborn, Mr. Chairman, has assumed complete responsibility for every statement in those bulletins. That responsibility I must allow him to retain. I assisted in the compilation of the material; the statements of fact, the opinions expressed, the interpretation of facts is all that of the members of the operators' committee.

Chairman WALSH. I would like to find out specifically whether a few are yours. Is this statement yours: "Recognition of the union was the underlying motive of the strike planned"?

Was that yours?

Mr. LEE. I would have to repeat the same answer.

Chairman WALSH. You wrote that, however?

Mr. LEE. I do not recall whether that is my language or a paraphrase of the language of one of the gentlemen referred to.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall whether or not this is your language: "Why should that be so important to anyone? Why should it be important to anyone to force itself on men of the community even when there were no wrongs to redress, no demands from the men for union assistance"? Did you write that?

Mr. LEE. I do not recall whether I did or not; I don't recognize the language.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question or two, please.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Mr. Lee, you used the—you made the statement—I think I have it exactly as you said it—that your mission was to present—now I am quoting—"the true attitude of the operators as they themselves understood it." That is the end of the quote.

Mr. LEE. That was the effort.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There is a very nice distinction there, that your mission was that of the average publicity agent, was it not, to give the truth as the man you were serving for saw it? [Laughter.]

Mr. LEE. That would represent a characterization on your part, Mr. Commissioner. I have tried to tell what happened. As to your characterization, I don't know that I can give the answer.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, I was simply attempting to interpret the language that you yourself used, as applied to the practical form of a publicity man's work. I am not making it a particle more personal to you than the average publicity agent.

Mr. LEE. The whole effort I made was to assist the operators in presenting their own case.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And not anybody else's case? [Laughter.] I may say that in a sense you were not looking after somebody else's case but after the operators' case?

Mr. LEE. It was my effort to assist the operators to present their own case.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You did not give any publicity to the fact that you went to Colorado to confer with them?

Mr. LEE. For the reasons I have suggested.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Publicity has its limitations? I mean its valuable limitations?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Garretson, I can not let that go unchallenged, because publicity, to be publicity, must be public. Now, the essential fact about these bulletins was that they were issued by the operators and in their own names, and on their responsibility. If I had interjected my name into it, it would have been irrelevant and would in no sense have had anything to do with the essential merits of the case.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it not a valuable element in a publicity campaign—the insertion of another personality?

Mr. LEE. I have never believed very much in the value of personality in publicity. I believe that the material that is given to the press must stand on its own merits and without reference to the personality behind it. I have always disbelieved thoroughly in the use of money or influence to secure in any way the publication of anything in the newspapers. I do not believe in using friends in that way. I believe that all material should be issued on the responsibility of the man who makes the statement, and with regard to that personality the newspapers should regard it as they desired.

Chairman WALSH. Beg pardon. At this point we will adjourn until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. We will have to recall Mr. Lee, anyway.

The commission will stand adjourned until to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock. (At this point an adjournment was had until Thursday, January 28, 1915, at the same place at 10 o'clock a. m.)

NEW YORK, January 28, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. If the house will be in order, we will resume now. Mr. Lee, please.

TESTIMONY OF MR. IVY L. LEE—Continued.

Commissioner GARRETSON. At closing time last night, Mr. Lee, the pending question was—I had asked the question, "Is it not a valuable element in a publicity campaign, the insertion of another personality?" To which you answered, "I have never believed very much in the value of personality in publicity. I believe that the material that is given to the press must stand on its own merits and without reference to the personality behind it. I have always disbelieved thoroughly in the use of money or influence to secure in any way the publication of anything in the newspapers. I do not believe in using friends in that way. I believe that all material should be issued on the responsibility of the man who makes the statements, and with regard to that personality the newspapers should regard it as they desire."

Then the chairman intervened and adjourned the meeting.

Now, on the question of whether or not personality enters into publicity, is it not a fact—we were dealing at the time that question came up with your own trip to Colorado and the advisability, as it appeared, of not inserting your own personality in there. Is it not a fact that the insertion—that the insertion or noninsertion of a certain individual is dependent in a very considerable degree on whether it—the sense of values of the publicity agent who is directing the campaign determines that—that personality would be favorable or unfavorable to the cause that he is retained for? Now, before you answer that I want to make clear what I mean. You are recognized as connected with the publicity of the greatest railway corporation—I am using the language of the railway itself, as it says it is the greatest railway corporation on earth—you have been the publicity agent of the associated railways in the entire Eastern Association territory in the presentation of the matter as affecting the increase of rates before the Interstate Commerce Commission. On this question of values, would it not naturally have been the conclusion of a publicity man that his personality might not be as desirable when connected beforehand with great corporate interests in a case of this kind?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Garretson, I think you and I have a somewhat different opinion as to the function of a publicity agent. My theory of a publicity agent is that he should not act as an intermediary. The old theory of a publicity agent is that his functions should be to take what his employers gave him to hand to the press, and then to use his influence or any other ways that suggested themselves to him, to get it published. That is totally foreign to my idea. My idea is that the principal himself should be his own publicity agent; that the function of a person like myself, for example, when acting in that capacity, should be to advise with the man who is to take the responsibility for the act itself as to what he should do and what he should say, and that he should do the same.

Now, for instance, in the case of the railroads, while it is true that I acted with them and for them, everything that was done, was done in their name and on their responsibility; and very few people, outside of such well-posted individuals as yourself, knew that I had anything to do with it. There was no effort to conceal the fact, but on the contrary there was no occasion to advertise it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Let us carry it away from your own connection. Then when a very prominent philosopher made a proposition in regard to the writing of judicious articles favoring the contention of the operators, was that brought to your attention?

Mr. LEE. It was. I would like to tell you the story of that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Very good. I would like to hear it.

Mr. LEE. You are speaking of Elbert Hubbard.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am speaking of Fra Elburtus Hubbard.

Mr. LEE. Yes; Mr. Hubbard; and I have not corresponded with him or had anything to say to him concerning this statement; but, the matter being raised, I want to make it clear, and at the same time to indicate Mr. Rockefeller's views. Mr. Hubbard wrote to Mr. Rockefeller some time last spring that his magazine, the Fra, expected to publish an article concerning the Colorado situation and he wanted Mr. Rockefeller's cooperation in the preparation of it. I think he suggested also that Mr. Rockefeller should assist in the distribution of it. Mr. Rockefeller conferred with me on the subject, and I told him that in my judgment the wise thing to do was to refer this correspondence to the Colorado operators themselves and to suggest to them that if Mr. Hubbard came to Colorado they should give him every facility to find out any facts over which they had command; that then he should be at liberty of course to write any article he liked; that if after the article was written and published the operators found it desirable to circulate any additional copies of it, they should be perfectly free to do so if their judgment might so suggest. Mr. Rockefeller so communicated those views to the Colorado operators.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Accompanied by the price per copy.

Mr. LEE. The price per copy was never mentioned.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You mean to you?

Mr. LEE. To me or to Mr. Rockefeller, as I recall.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The letter that is part of the records addressed to the coal operators, have you seen that?

Mr. LEE. I do not—

Commissioner GARRETSON. In which the price per thousand copies is quoted?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Hubbard's letter to the operators?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. LEE. That may be; I have not seen that.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You have not seen that. Are you aware of Mr. Welborn's statement on the stand in regard to the number of copies of the Fra which the Michigan mineral operators had bought on account of a judicious article contained therein as to the Michigan situation?

Mr. LEE. I do not know anything about that, Mr. Garretson.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I think Mr. Welborn testified that the Michigan operators had bought—a million copies, was it?

Chairman WALSH. My recollection is that Mr. Hubbard said in his letter that the operators had bought a million copies.

Commissioner GARRETSON. A million copies, and Mr. Welborn subscribed for one or two thousand. Do you know the number?

Mr. LEE. I really do not, Mr. Garretson.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now the question of value arises. As an average publicity man—a man of average publicity—would you consider the value of one undamaged philosopher greater—that is, his first expression on the subject—greater than a second publication along the same line?

Mr. LEE. I do not quite get the idea.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, if a great moral reformer had never expressed an opinion in favor of the operator, would not his opinion as expressed in the publication be worth far more in a money value as publicity than a second expression along the same line?

Mr. LEE. If I can exactly grasp the meaning of your question, my answer to it would be this: That the value of any independent expression to the public depends of course upon the standing of the man who made the expression. Mr. Hubbard, of course, was presenting his own views and his independent views, whereas, of course, Mr. Welborn was presenting a distinctly partial side of the story—his own view of it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But when an opinion becomes marketable—

Mr. LEE (interrupting). I do not think that it is fair to suggest Mr. Hubbard's opinion in this case was marketable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Did you read the letter?

Mr. LEE. I want it understood that I hold no brief for Mr. Hubbard, but I have seen no correspondence that suggested that his opinion on this subject was marketable.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I have not a copy of the letter here, but only excerpts from it; an excerpt from the letter is as follows:

"I am writing something on the subject—

This is a letter to Mr. Welborn—

"a letter after the general style of my article on 'The copper country,' in the Fra Magazine for May. I mail you a copy of the Fra to-day. I believe you will be interested in what I have to say about the situation in northern Michigan.

"Just now it seems very necessary that some one should carry on a campaign of education, showing this country, if possible, that we are drifting at present in the direction of I. W. W. socialism.

"Are you interested in distributing a certain number of copies of the Fra containing my article on the Colorado situation?

"Also, what do you think of the inclosed booklets? I have distributed these on my own account up to the extent of nearly a million, but I have not the funds to distribute a million more, as I would like to do.

"Any suggestions from you in the line of popular education will be greatly appreciated."

The rate is quoted in the other place, from Mr. Welborn's testimony, "The price for extra copies of the Fra is $200 a thousand," and it accompanied, according to the testimony of Mr. Welborn, that communication. That is upon what I base the use of the word "marketable."

Would you consider the value of that publication greater before the publication of the copper article than it was after it for your purposes?

Mr. LEE. Mr. Garretson, I really do not think I can say more than that the value to the public of the expression of an editor must depend upon the standing that editor has with the public.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Therefore personality would enter into the value of his statements?

Mr. LEE. Any independent expression, certainly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do you believe, Mr. Lee, that the publication—and this is purely impersonal—that the publication of misinformation is a prolific cause of unrest, when it is afterwards determined that it is misinformation?

Mr. LEE. I think it is in the highest degree undesirable that misinformation should be distributed at any time by anybody.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And it undoubtedly would be one of the many elements that contribute to the general distrust and unrest?

Mr. LEE. I think misinformation distributed by either side of a controversy, that may affect selfish interests, is apt to cause very great hard feeling on both sides.

Commissioner GARRETSON. It goes without saying that what is false ethics on one side, must of necessity be so on the other side?

Mr. LEE. Absolutely.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Going back to the relation that exists between the publicity agent and those who employ him; here the personal note comes in again—I am bearing in mind your own statement of the relation existing between them. Have you ever seen the time when you would have cared to guarantee the correctness of the information you were expected to give to the public, or that you have assumed the attitude of so doing?

Mr. LEE. I should never give to the public any information that depended upon my own say so, that was not, so far as I knew, accurate.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You never go farther in your guaranty than your belief that it is the honest opinion of the person that desires put it across?

Mr. LEE. So long as it is the honest opinion of a man who I believe is acting in good faith, I think it is perfectly proper that the public should have his view of the situation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is it a common device on the part of publicity agents to take an article, an inspired article, in a friendly or controlled publication, and then disseminate it widely as plate matter, simply independent expression?

Mr. LEE. It may be, but I do not believe in the policy and never adopted it myself.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock wants to ask some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. May we ask, Mr. Lee, whether your work immediately after your employment by Mr. Rockefeller was confined to the preparation of bulletins in connection with the Colorado strike troubles, or whether that was simply one of the various functions?

Mr. LEE. You mean last summer, and not since the 1st of January?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is correct.

Mr. LEE. Soon after Mr. Rockefeller and I got to be better acquainted, Mr. Weinstock, I think Mr. Rockefeller began to feel that it was desirable that much greater publicity be given to many other things in which he was interested, and if I may say, the idea which I had that publicity should be absolutely frank and responsible and given out in the most open manner for the freest use by all the papers, was one that appealed to Mr. Rockefeller. He asked my advice with reference to that, and in connection with many other topics.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, about how much of your time, Mr. Lee, was devoted to the Colorado situation, and how much of it to other work?

Mr. LEE. Of course, you understand that during this whole time I was performing very active work for the Pennsylvania Railroad Co.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So you were not giving your entire time to the Rockefeller interests?

Mr. LEE. Oh, no; all this work I did for Mr. Rockefeller was purely incidental to my main work, which was continued as actively as I knew how.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gathered from your testimony of yesterday that you acted solely as editor and you edited the matter furnished you by the coal operators?

Mr. LEE. That is correct.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And under your direction, clerks prepared the matter and your work was purely supervisory?

Mr. LEE. My work was, as you say, simply that of an editor, attempting to take material which the operators gave me and present it in a typographical style which would be apt to commend it to the reader.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How often were those bulletins issued? Was there any regularity in the interval?

Mr. LEE. No, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just every once in a while?

Mr. LEE. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whenever occasion arose to issue one?

Mr. LEE. Correct.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Can you explain to the commission, Mr. Lee, why so long an interval was permitted to take place, an interval of over three months, from October to January, as I recall it, before the serious blunder which had been made in the October bulletin relative to the earnings of the labor representatives was corrected?

Mr. LEE. As I suggested yesterday, Mr. Weinstock, the first knowledge that I had that there had been any error at all was in a telegram which I am to produce before this commission, from Mr. Welborn, stating that there had been an error. The nature of the error was not stated to me, and I assumed it was a typographical error and of no special consequence. I suggested that an errata slip be inclosed in the pamphlet in sending it out. I assumed that that had been done. I never gave the matter any further thought until the hearing before the commission in Denver, and then I saw in the newspapers the nature of the error which had been committed. I then telegraphed to Mr. Welborn that this error and any other errors that might have been ascertained ought to be corrected at once by another bulletin. And to reinforce that suggestion and in order to provide a basis on which to work, I prepared a draft of a possible bulletin and forwarded it by mail within a few days, suggesting a method of treatment of the subject to make it perfectly clear that it was the desire of the operators to correct whatever injustice may have been done by the previous error.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Whom do you hold responsible, then, Mr. Lee, for that delay, that unreasonable and unseasonable delay in making the correction?

Mr. LEE. Why, Mr. Weinstock, I would prefer not to express an opinion. I personally had not the right to hold any one responsible. I was in a subordinate capacity.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me modify that question by saying, Whom do you regard as responsible for that delay?

Mr. LEE. I certainly think that the operators' committee should have corrected that error as promptly as they ascertained it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of course, you can appreciate, with us, that for the operators to send out a statement, making it appear that a year's salary and a year's traveling expenses was only a month's payment, would give the readers the impression that these labor leaders were exploiting their fellow-workers.

Mr. LEE. It was an unfortunate statement which ought never to have been made, but having been made, ought to have been corrected the moment it was ascertained. There can not be any two opinions about that, it seems to me.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But you had no control over that?

Mr. LEE. I had no control over it; no responsibility for it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any return card on the envelope that those bulletins were sent out in?

Mr. LEE. I think so, Mr. Chairman. A return card bore the room number of the offices of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. in Denver.

Chairman WALSH. Did it have the name of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. upon the envelope?

Mr. LEE. I do not think so. The envelopes, however, contained a slip and the pamphlet copy a brief introductory page, signed by the operators' committee, so that anyone who received the document would have no doubt as to whence it emanated.

Chairman WALSH. The slip was separate from the bulletin itself?

Mr. LEE. The slip in the smaller bulletins was separate, yes; but it was inclosed in the same envelope.

Chairman WALSH. Now, you first issued these bulletins separately, as you stated, and then gathered them together?

Mr. LEE. That is right.

Chairman WALSH. I call your attention to this Bulletin No. 4, which you are probably familiar with, as to how a Congressman views the situation. Might it not have been the idea being conveyed to the mind of whoever did not see the slip that it was a Congressman that was sending them out?

Mr. LEE. I hardly think so, Mr. Chairman, for the slip was inclosed. Every effort was made to have it clearly understood as to who sent this out.

Chairman WALSH. You recall the form of this one, Mr. Lee?

Mr. LEE. I do.

Chairman WALSH. Now, I have been asked, Mr. Lee, to have you state concisely what your everyday duties are in this publicity matter that you are working on. Now, give briefly what it is you do every day about the publicity?

Mr. LEE. Since I joined Mr. Rockefeller's staff I have had very little to do with publicity. I have had my attention taken up with many other matters. I have been made a member of various boards of directors, and placed in various different relationships, which have taken a good deal of time.

Chairman WALSH. Have you called at any of the newspaper offices?

Mr. LEE. I think since the 1st of January I have been in only one newspaper office.

Chairman WALSH. Do you address communications to newspaper editors and writers?

Mr. LEE. I should not hesitate to do so, but I do not recall having done so lately.

Chairman WALSH. When you prepare matter, how do you get it to the newspapers?

Mr. LEE. I have as many copies prepared as I think will serve the purposes of the newspapers, and where I feel that the exigencies of time or the pressure of news demand it, I telegraph. If I think it is a matter of general interest, I am very apt to send a complete copy to a great many papers outside of those who would ordinarily receive it simply locally.

Chairman WALSH. Do you send it by mail? Do you hand it to the gentlemen in person, or do you have some one to take it to them?

Mr. LEE. Well, I should not hesitate to employ all those methods.

Chairman WALSH. What I am trying to get at is what you really do?

Mr. LEE. I have done all of those things, and probably would do them all again.

Chairman WALSH. Now, could you suggest something perhaps that you do now in addition to what I have suggested?

Mr. LEE. I am anxious to tell you anything—

Chairman WALSH (interrupting). No doubt about that.

Mr. LEE (continuing). Mr. Walsh—

Chairman WALSH. But that don't do it.

Mr. LEE. My relations with newspaper men are quite frank, and I simply—

Chairman WALSH. I understand that, but my question was: Could you suggest anything else that you do other than what I have stated about giving the publicity out, or have I covered it all in my question, so we conclude. Regardless now of your attitude or your methods, do not think of anything except the particular question, how you get the publicity to the newspapers.

Mr. LEE. I will summarize so that I can cover the situation.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; as briefly as you can, and then we will be through.

Mr. LEE. I take anything in which I think the press is apt to be interested, and see to it that all the copies are made that I think will serve the uses of the press, and then take occasion to furnish copies of it to such newspapers as I desire to receive it by messenger, in person, by mail, or by telegraph, if necessary, in whichever way seems to me to be most feasible.

Chairman WALSH. That is all, thank you. You may be excused.

TESTIMONY OF DR. JOHN HAYNES HOLMES.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Dr. HOLMES. John Haynes Holmes.

Chairman WALSH. And your calling.

Dr. HOLMES. Clergyman.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live?

Dr. HOLMES. I reside in Brooklyn, 28 Garden Place.

Chairman WALSH. And are you a pastor of a church in New York City?

Dr. HOLMES. The Church of the Messiah, in the Borough of Manhattan, Park Avenue and Thirty-fourth Street.

Chairman WALSH. Have you as a citizen or as a student of industrial problems had occasion to consider the organization and operation of large philanthropic foundations, Doctor?

Dr. HOLMES. As a citizen and as a student; yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please give the commission your opinions and conclusions in regard to the effect which such institutions have had or may have on American life and industry?

Dr. HOLMES. I have made a very brief outline, sir, of what I should care to say upon this subject, and, with your permission, I will speak with this outline before me.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Dr. HOLMES. So that my remarks may be as clear and definite as possible.

Chairman WALSH. I think the commission would like very much for you to state it in your own way.

Dr. HOLMES. Thank you. Like other persons, I, of course, recognize that the growth of the great foundations is one of the most influential developments of recent times, and present a problem which I think calls for not only consideration like that of industrial relations, but for the consideration of all persons who have at heart the best interests of our community.

May I say at the very start, sir, in anything I may say about the foundations I am making no personal reference of any kind? I am not impugning the motives of the founders of these great foundations. I would be glad to take it for granted, and think you would take it for granted that their motives are of the very best and highest; that these men possessed of large wealth are anxious that a portion of that wealth, perhaps a large portion, should be used for the benefit of the community, and that, in all sincerity, work out the foundation system as the best one to safeguard and perpetuate these things.

I would like also to say that I take it for granted that the men who are now directing these foundations—for example, the men who are representing the Rockefeller Foundation—are men of wisdom, men of insight, of vision, and are also animated by the very best motives. In my own thought and view upon this subject I have come to ideas somewhat along these lines. In the first place, my standpoint is the whole thought of democracy. I believe that all of our problems, yes, social and political, should be finally stated in terms of democracy, and the interests of the great democratic system which we are trying to work out in our field must be the interest which we have closest at heart. From this standpoint it seems to me that this foundation, the very character, must be regarded as essentially repugnant to the whole idea of a democratic society. I think, for example, in the first place, of the origin of these foundations. It is very easy for us to sit here or elsewhere and discuss these foundations which have so much money at their disposal, representing, some of them, all the way from $10,000,000 to $100,000,000, and think of that money as salted down somewhere and growing like the plant, producing blossoms which are cut off and used. But the thing which comes to me, I must confess, as I contemplate a fund like $100,000,000, is this: That that fund is produced, or the income of the fund is being produced every day by the labor of men, and what we have here are thousands and perhaps tens of thousands of men hitched up to the support of a great permanent institution in the direction of which they have no voice whatsoever, and from the benefactions of which perhaps they may receive no good, no profit whatsoever. In other words, in studying these foundations we must never forget the human relationship that is involved between the money as produced and used for any purpose, however beneficent, and the labor of men which goes into the production of that money.

In the second place, I think of the administration of such income, and I note that this administration is in the hands of a small board of men, which, if I may simply say, is self-perpetuating; that these men are chosen, in the first place, I suppose, by the founders themselves, and later on by those who are at that time directors, chosen thereafter from the point of view of those men who have organized the foundations and are interested in some particular phase of the work and in the perpetuation of some phase of that work.

In other words, we have here in the midst of a society supposed to be democratic that which is essentially an autocratic system of administration, of an institution which represents power, which is, of course, simply stupendous, and that relationship is, therefore, of the most serious character to mankind, the autocratic administration on the one hand and the democratic administration upon the other.

The third, and I offer this experience not in any spirit of sentiment but as a matter of very real conviction. I feel as a citizen and I find as a matter of inquiry with others with whom I talked, that there is a growing feeling, and it is a healthy feeling, that democracy prefers to do its own business along the lines of development represented by the field occupied by these benefactions.

In other words, I feel personally a kind of a sense of outrage when a large sum of money which has been gotten together by methods which may be wholly ethical and laudable and administered by a very small body of men comes into a community and studies that community from its own standpoint, as a doctor studies a case, and then applies a remedy from the funds at its disposal. Now, the whole essence of our democratic society is it can do its own business, that it does not depend upon the outside influences or interests of any kind.

May I use an illustration? A very recent illustration, and I use this illustration because I believe it one of the noblest instances of what the Rockefeller Foundation has been doing in recent years. I refer to the work which the foundation is now doing, sending food and other materials of relief to the Belgians. There can be no doubt whatsoever in any decent man's mind as to the perfect beneficence of that activity, the unending good that it is going to do. I confess to you, sir, however, in all frankness when I saw that the Rockefeller Foundation was going to do this thing, that I felt somewhat a sense, not of a grievance, but of the feeling of regret that it had not been left to the great sympathetic democracy of America to do this thing in its own way and its initiative and out of the resources of its own competency.

Let me particularize, that we had not as yet found a way for our political machinery, representing the people of the country, to do this thing as one institution which is now being done so efficiently and so generously by the Rockefeller Foundation. I feel the same thing, to use another illustration where democracy it seems to me, the very idea of it, is that it shall safeguard its own interests, determine its own goal of progress, heal its own ills, and shall foster its own ideals. In other words, I am very jealous of the activities of this autocratic society of ours and I greatly fear—but I can not point to any indication of it now—I greatly fear the paralysis of the possibilities of democracy when an institution of such power as this enters into the field, and thereafter takes away the opportunity which is the challenge to democracy to do these things.

Entirely aside, however, from these matters which now to my mind I feel are essentially repugnant to democracy I want to make a second point; that is, namely, that in them are the seed of peril to our democratic institutions, and let me say to you once again, I am making no reference to any of the founders of these present foundations or to those who are now sitting upon any board of administration in any one of them. But no man can guarantee the future. When I consider the industrial situation of this country to-day I sometimes tremble about the future. I therefore study with a good deal of care the possibility of the development of every source of power which may play a part in the development of the industrial drama here in America. Now, I mean that away from prejudice. The stronger a man is the stronger are his convictions, and the greater is his courage in standing by those convictions and putting through the things that he really wants to do, for himself, or for those associated with him or for society at large.

Now, it seems to me inevitable that as the industrial situation of this country develops the prejudices upon both sides should develop, the men who administer these funds, however high minded and idealistic and unselfish they may be, will be men, necessarily strong men, working for strong men. They will be men who will have courage to stand by those ideas, and the very virtues therefore which ennoble their manhood will be the very things which will lead them to have an interest in the administration of this fund, I can easily conceive. In other words, that the benefactions might be from the best motives in the world swung to one side of a great controversy and the two sides who are fighting the thing out will not therefore have the opportunity to fight it out on a fair field with no favor to any.

And then, more serious than that, if I may speak of just one more thought, that those trusts I regard in their possible development to democracy—I would return to my original proposition that they are essentially autocratic in their administration. What we are doing here, it seems to me, is setting up inside of our democracy a great system of autocracy, and that to my mind lays the foundation—if I may use a confused piece of imagery—lays the foundation for a more serious fight than we have got on at the present time.

In other words, I might agree that our present conflict should be solved, our present breaches should be bridged or healed; and now to introduce into the field two antagonistic systems which must, of course, in time come into conflict is rather, in my judgment, to complicate the problem than to simplify and reduce the danger. In other words, safer to do it now and not put it off until the time to come. These systems may be regarded as the infection rather than the healthy life of the people, and therefore if by their operation they threaten the whole life of society, should they not be cut out as a cancer may be cut out of the human body.

As institutions therefore leading to democracy, as the very point of democracy itself, institutions which contain the seed of great peril to all our society, I feel that such foundations as that are to be deplored and studied and the problems which they present carefully considered.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider it possible, Doctor, for such institutions to have an influence on educational matters?

Dr. HOLMES. I should say that they are already having an influence, are they not, in giving sums of money to certain chosen institutions.

Chairman WALSH. In what way do you consider that such influence can be exerted, stating the matter concretely, by the bestowal of this money? What might happen to the institutions and the persons being educated in them?

Dr. HOLMES. I was not thinking so much, Mr. Chairman, of the influence upon those who were being educated in the institutions, as the direct result, as that institutions which win the favor of these administrators for any reason would be strengthened and other institutions, from the comparative point of view, impoverished. For instance, I can not conceive of any foundation now in existence or likely to be in existence giving a large benefaction to the Rand School of Social Science in this community. There may be many reasons why such money should not be granted; but even though that school were everything that could be desired from the standpoint of efficiency, I can not in my mind conceive of benefactions being given that school. Therefore, in those institutions the influence is inevitable.

Chairman WALSH. Can you cite any concrete cases in your own knowledge in which such influence has been exerted or is now being exercised?

Dr. HOLMES. I would cite, perhaps, the institutions of the teachers' pension fund, which is the result of one of the great benefactions—Mr. Carnegie's. It seems to me that the history, so far as I know it, of that benefaction shows that many institutions for years and years of a denominational character have been trying their utmost to get rid of their denominational affiliations and connections, in order to receive the gifts of the foundation, which specifies, if I am correctly informed, that only institutions undenominational or nonsectarian can participate.

Let me say that I am most emphatically undenominational and nonsectarian. I have no interest in denominationalism. But here is an illustration of a very sharp line of demarcation which is having its influence upon many institutions, like the influence of a colored cloth upon a chameleon. These institutions are seeking—that is, many of them—to change their denominational character, so as to come within the scope of the teachers' pension benefits.

Chairman WALSH. Any others that you have in mind, Doctor?

Dr. HOLMES. Not for the moment, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you had occasion to consider whether any action by the State is necessary or desirable in relation to these institutions?

Dr. HOLMES. I have, but it is an exceedingly difficult thing to exactly state it. The refusal of the United States Government to meet the exact conditions required by the Rockefellers, if I am correctly informed, led to the retreat of the foundation to New York State. I can easily imagine that a refusal of New York State to comply with these conditions might have led to the retreat to other States. In other words, with so many States in our country, it is easily possible for a foundation to escape the desires of any particular political agencies. Therefore what to do, practically speaking, is exceedingly difficult to say. My own idea, however, if the foundation can be confined within the scope of a single political agency, is that the State should immediately insist upon most generous kind of representation and a very large voice in the changes of administrators, so that the representatives of the people, and therefore the people themselves, should perhaps be the ultimate controllers of the work of these benefactions until such time as we can transfer to the sources from which the money came, any value at the disposal of the—Chairman WALSH (interrupting). Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were so fortunate, or unfortunate, as to be the possessor of $100,000,000 that you wanted to use for the common good, what would you do?

Dr. HOLMES. I should consider, sir, that I was confronted by one of the most difficult problems that could confront any man. For the sake of my own individual integrity, I should try as best I could to get rid of that $100,000,000, and my own thought which comes at the moment here, I should want to place it upon the Government, the representatives of the people, to assume that great responsibility, as Mr. Roosevelt placed the $40,000 Nobel prize not in his own hands or in any private personal control, but in the hands of the Government. The fact that the Government did not know how, or the Government or its citizens did not respond to that generous and wise gift, does not impugn, it seems to me, the wisdom of what was done.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would, then, place the matter entirely out of your own hands and put the $100,000,000 into the hands of the employees of the Government?

Dr. HOLMES. I should get rid of it just as quickly as I could. I feel that no man has a right to such a sum of money.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you have any strings tied to that gift to all the people?

Dr. HOLMES. I should hope not. I should, not believing it to be ethically right to have such a sum of money, want to be rid of that responsibility.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would simply take this $100,000,000 and turn it over to Congress and say, "Do with it what you consider best"?

Dr. HOLMES. I should suppose I would think the matter over carefully—more carefully than I can at present—but I think that is the thought I should have, and my object would be to get into the hands of the people the money they have produced.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You mean just put it in the Common Treasury just to be used for any purpose it wanted, or would you specify?

Dr. HOLMES. I might think it a matter of wisdom to specify. I do not think I should attach any binding condition, as Mr. Roosevelt did, that this money should be used for any particular industrial benefits, or anything of that kind.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you would do it without qualification as to the use of the gift?

Dr. HOLMES. Qualifications of recommendation rather than, perhaps, insistence or dictation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, in the nature of suggestions?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; in the nature of suggestions, as a donor to a college might say, "I would like to have this used for books or for scholarships or for a library; but if it can be used better, use it as you see fit."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, if Congress should see fit to take your $100,000,000 and simply put it into the Common Treasury, and to use it for operating expenses, within a very brief time that $100,000,000 would disappear, and comparatively little permanent good might flow from it. Would you think that would be wise?

Dr. HOLMES. Why, it probably would disappear in serving the interests of the people. The fact that it went back into those interests would not in itself, it seems to me, be an ill. I can imagine the Government might well expend it for purposes that I was not at all concerned with—such as the Army and Navy, for example; but if I made the gift under those conditions, I should have to take the result.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But I take it if you had this vast sum of money, if you were burdened with it, that you would naturally want to use it for the most permanent good, so that the largest number of your fellows might be helped, not temporarily, but that it might be used as a means for continuing to aid those who were worthy of being aided.

Dr. HOLMES. What right, sir, have I to assume that I have any knowledge as to what is the highest permanent good for this country?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, we have a right to assume that you ought to have more than average knowledge as to what is the highest permanent good, because the country has given you the benefit of its better educational resources, and assumes, for example, that you are using that intellectual development in the common interest; and therefore you ought to know more than most of us, and that money should be expended so that it will result in the best good to the greatest number. You are an educator, you are an up-lifter, and therefore we have a right to expect more from you than from some of the rest of us.

Dr. HOLMES. I should feel that those advantages, if they exist, sir, should be used for the exertion of the strongest kind of personal influence as a member of the community; but not as to the dictation to the administration of such boundless, stupendous source of power as is contained in $100,000,000.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Were you present, Doctor, when Mr. Rockefeller testified?

Dr. HOLMES. I was not, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you had an opportunity to read—

Dr. HOLMES (interrupting). I have read his testimony only as it appeared in the press.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, you may recall—perhaps that phase of it was published—that the point that you make was made with Mr. Rockefeller, and the question was raised as to whether or not his foundation might not turn into a menace—might not be used for unholy purposes as well as holy purposes—and his answer to it—and I should like you to criticize that answer if the answer is not a sound answer. His answer was that the people had the matter wholly in their hands; that if the funds at the command of the foundation were improperly used it remained with the people of the State of New York, through their representatives, to annul the charter or to modify the charter; and that therefore the people really retained control and could, in the exercise of their power, prevent the fund from being improperly used.

Dr. HOLMES. I suppose, sir, that that is technically correct, and when I say "technically" I do not mean to say that Mr. Rockefeller was trying to save himself on a technicality. That, I suppose, is technically correct; but I think the history of our country and the political experiences of our country indicate that a battle against a power representing $100,000,000 is not an easy one, and that the attempt of our political machinery representing the people to get back that power which it has granted in the charter would be a very long and a very persistent and a very difficult fight, especially if the administrators were men who really believed in themselves and in the cause they represented and felt it was their duty to safeguard the trust committed to them. In other words, the difficulty would be exactly proportional to the fidelity and sincerity and the courage of the men administering the trust.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if we follow out your line of reasoning, Doctor, to the logical line of conclusion, it would lead us to a position where we would feel that any good-sized sum of money placed in the hands of trustees to be perpetuated and to be used for the common good is unwise; that there is only one channel through which that money should be used, and that is the channel of all the people. Does history in this country demonstrate the correctness of your theory? For example, while such beneficences as those that were set aside by men like Girard and Peter Cooper and men like Benjamin Franklin or men like Leland Stanford, of California, seem very small compared with the foundation fund set aside by Rockefeller, yet in their times they were relatively almost as large. Now, these beneficences have been in existence, some of them, for a hundred years or over? Can you point out where they have had bad effects? Can you point out where those have proved harmful or—

Dr. HOLMES (interrupting). At the moment I can think of only one specific instance, to which I shall refer in a moment. You will notice that all these beneficences which you have mentioned, if I may be permitted to make this observation, have been of an educational character. The educational field, until very recent years, has been quite remote from the controversial disturbances of political life, as they have on the religious side, but in more recent years the question of institutions of learning has become a burning one, and it is before us now for settlement. So while I should say that with this one exception, while no very serious dangers have been indicated in the past, yet with the formation of these foundations it is bringing these foundations in to the field of the general life, and especially the appearance of these great foundations which have this particular field, which is the situation just now. Now, as to the Girard Foundation, Mr. Girard was a man of religious prejudice, and he perpetuated and immortalized his prejudice in that institution. I think to-day we are realizing that the motive which led him to make that restriction has disappeared, if it ever really existed in his own time; and the fact that that institution is permanently debarred from the influence of organized religion, if I am correctly informed, is an indication of the harm that can be done by any benefaction.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think, then, that on the whole the Girard benefaction has been a disadvantage to society rather than an advantage?

Dr. HOLMES. No, sir; I am glad you asked me that in order that I may correct any false impression that I may have made. I should say on the whole that the balance was on the side of good when you consider all that it has done. But here is a restriction which indicates what one man may do and which may become more serious in the future as religion becomes the more socialized.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It may be that you and I as individuals may make mistakes, and that our judgment may not be the best; may that not also apply to collective groups, such as legislative bodies and parliaments, may they not make mistakes?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; but the price of their blunders is paid for by them who made them, if we interpret parliament as acting for the people. The price of the mistakes of the administrators of great foundations was not paid by them but by those to whom they give benefactions and the whole body of society which may be affected.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me see if I can sum up your answers and whether I have caught the spirit correctly of what you have said. I got it from your statements, Doctor, that in your opinion large beneficiaries on the whole are along the lines of a disadvantage to society; that is, they are likely to become a menace—they may not, but they are likely to?

Dr. HOLMES. Very likely to.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that therefore, if you had the power, you would discourage rather than encourage them, and speaking for yourself, if you had a large sum of money which you wanted to use for the common good, you would, in place of administering that money yourself and having the revenue from it put in the shape of a fund administered by a stock perpetuating body, you would place it in the hands of all of the people to be used in accordance with the best judgment of the representatives of all of the people.

Dr. HOLMES. The fund to which you refer, of course, is a stupendous fund?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes. Have I correctly caught the spirit of your opinion?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; so far as I understand your statements.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all I care to ask Dr. Holmes.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Commons would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. I think you made a distinction between the title which these large owners have to their property as between an ethical title and a legal title. I take it that you hold that they have a legal title but not an ethical title to their property?

Dr. HOLMES. I have never thought of questioning the legal rights or title of any of these men to the wealth they had accumulated under the laws of the land. I suppose that if laws have been violated in specific instances there might be some question, but as a general proposition I should say that it was rather foolish to question the legal title to a man's property which he has accumulated under the laws as they exist to-day and as they are well understood.

Commissioner COMMONS. What are your views as to the ethical title?

Dr. HOLMES. Ethics and matters of law never run along together; the legal is so much slower than the ethical. I believe the employment of large bodies of men for the making of fortunes by single individuals is unethical. I believe that a person is entitled to compensation for the labor he gives to society, but beyond that nothing.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is to say, you would say that the investment of capital is not a contribution to society?

Dr. HOLMES. No, sir—well, it may be an economic contribution. I would not deny there was, from a certain standpoint, a certain economic advantage in the investment of capital and in the payment of dividends; but I regard it as unethical, and I would refuse to invest any little money I might have in a large corporation.

Commissioner COMMONS. Your idea then is that the laboring force produces the wealth and not the capital?

Dr. HOLMES. Not specifically the laboring force, but it enters more largely into its production. Into the result goes labor, goes brain, and goes the capital which, of course, is the accumulation of vast labor; they must all make a contribution as I understand it. I do not pretend to be a skilled economist.

Commissioner COMMONS. I am trying to get the economic basis on which you base your opinion that this property should be turned over to the Government and should not be administered by the people who have accumulated it.

Dr. HOLMES. I should not say on my idea of ethics as an economist, but from my standpoint as a public teacher.

Commissioner COMMONS. How would you abolish that situation?

Dr. HOLMES. It is very difficult for me to indicate how this great change in society must be brought about, but I believe that it must come. My own ideas are like this: I believe there are two great movements under way to-day, which point the direction in which we shall have to go and are going, and the union between these two great movements is going to bring in the kind of economic organization I would welcome. In the first place is what we call socialism from the economic standpoint, state socialism, the public ownership of all those things that properly belong ethically to the public, by which I mean forest lands, mines, railroads, the telegraph, the telephone, public transportation, and public utilities of that kind, many of which, of course, are the source of our largest fortunes. I believe, however, that that alone can never solve our problems. Therefore I welcome that other movement, more conspicuous abroad than in our own country, which we understand as cooperation. It was more successful before the war, and it is the coming together of the people to do their buying, manufacturing, distributing, and in that way solving the problems of their own economic life. Some time those two things are coming together. I can not say how, but the union of cooperative endeavor with state ownership is going to be the basis of social activity which I would welcome, and which I think is coming.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, if the State, in taking over these properties, must issue bonds which will be subscribed to by private parties, the State, according to your ideas, would pay interest to those private parties on those bonds, would it not?

Dr. HOLMES. I confess that I feel utterly incompetent to say how these large properties should be taken over. I know nothing about bonds or stocks or things of that kind, for I never owned any. But I would say that society has never found it impossible to do anything that it has found necessary to be done. When a State goes to war it gets the money for that purpose; and I believe the way will be found, as soon as it becomes as important to save life as to destroy it, for the proper acquisition of all these things.

Commissioner COMMONS. Is it your proposition to equip the Government with the political machinery for doing this kind of work that you suggest, such as the aid of politicians and the other things these foundations are doing?

Dr. HOLMES. I see no difficulty. The history of our country shows that we have been able, in situations of this kind, to find the ways and means of extending its activities in the direction of solving these problems. Personally I feel that the recent developments in the political field, along the lines of commissions, the appointment of experts, the initiative and referendum, are bringing a larger responsibility on the part of the people, and all these things show that our democracy is awake on this question and is now feeling its way toward the building up of machinery and methods which will enable it to handle these things.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you think that at the present time our democratic institutions are adequate to do this work?

Dr. HOLMES. That is, the work that is being done by the foundations.

Commissioner COMMONS. Not only that, but the management of industry as you have outlined—to conduct both industry and foundations?

Dr. HOLMES. I believe the Government is not now competent. I mean by that, if I may define it particularly, that if all these things were placed on the Government to-morrow a catastrophe would follow—it would be unspeakable disaster. But I believe that society, as the individual, gains strength and learns method by the acquisition of responsibility, and that our democracy will fit itself as in the natural course of evolution these responsibilities are placed upon it.

Commissioner COMMONS. Upon the reaching of that stage where our democracy would be competent, I take it, you would have our democracy designate the directors and trustees of these foundations?

Dr. HOLMES. I suppose that would be the next step. The thing I am after is this, that the people shall be made responsible by some method for these benefactions. That responsibility will come, and the people will become intelligent enough to take over the entire directorship. I would like to see the benefactions in the hands of the people, but later they must disappear, as we want to get away from the unequal distribution of wealth.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you feel that our Governments, State and Federal, under the present system, would be competent to designate competent men to direct these foundations and also these industries?

Dr. HOLMES. It does designate competent men for the accomplishment of as great or greater tasks; for instance, if a peace conference is held at the conclusion of the present war in Europe our Government will appoint representatives to attend that conference and take part in its action, and that is a greater task than the one you mention.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you ever investigated instances where governments had appointed one or two directors out of a number, as in the case of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad and other cases?

Dr. HOLMES. In cases of that kind I should say I have no knowledge. I am only familiar with such commissions as the Anthracite Coal Commission and such bodies as this—large commissions which have attracted public attention and which therefore I have noted.

Commissioner COMMONS. You are not aware, then, of any evidence that would go to show that when the Government goes into cooperation with these private enterprises and appoints directors that immediately the private enterprises get control of the Government in order to designate the politicians who shall be named on the boards of directors? Has that been brought to your attention?

Dr. HOLMES. I have heard rumors of that sort, one from your own State. I am acquainted with one of the regents, I believe you call them, of your university, and I have heard stories of undertakings of that kind, nothing but rumors. I do not know of any such fact. That does not frighten me a bit. Those things correct themselves.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you not think there would be more danger in the Government participating partially in these private foundations than there would be in it taking them over altogether?

Dr. HOLMES. I was thinking only of the difficulty of doing that thing all at once. I do not think it is feasible to take over these foundations to-day; I do not think the state of the public opinion would warrant that. I should welcome that as a better way of doing things than the things I have proposed, but I have learned by experience that the step-by-step method is the only proper way.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you thought that step-by-step method could involve great political corruption?

Dr. HOLMES. I wish I could make my mind clear on that matter of political corruption. That does not disturb me any because the people have it in their own power to correct occurrences of that kind. Indeed, I would go so far as to say that I would rather see democracy die of its own corruption than be favored by the autocratic benefaction or service of any one particular individual. A new democracy would rise to take advantage of the lesson learned in the fall of the old one.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you considered the proposition of what a national university ought to do to offset what you call the sinister influence of these private foundations?

Dr. HOLMES. I have never considered that except along the line of thought in my own mind, that it seems to me ridiculous for the United States Government to go into the establishing of large universities when we have now more universities, large and small, than 90,000,000 people know what to do with. I believe in the public university, especially as they are exemplified in the States of the Middle West, but I can not see where there is any need of the United States at the present moment going into the university business.

Commissioner COMMONS. Is it your feeling, Doctor, that the State should take over these private universities?

Dr. HOLMES. It seems to me that is going to come eventually.

Commissioner COMMONS. And have them all operated by the State as the foundation should be?

Dr. HOLMES. I think so, that is a logical corollary, the great universities like Harvard, Yale, and the Chicago University, and so forth.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you considered whether or not the establishment of these private universities has not been the great stimulus which has urged the States on to set up their own universities? For example, in the State of Illinois, the State never took any steps toward State university of any great consequence until the Chicago University was established by Mr. Rockefeller. Is competition between State and private institutions a good or bad thing?

Dr. HOLMES. Competition is undoubtedly advantageous. Purely from an ethical and democratic point of view, I should say that I will welcome the time, but shall never see it, when education shall be only in the hands of the public.

Commissioner COMMONS. You do not see any particular spur that might come to our democracy to offset these private foundations in counteraction by these public institutions?

Dr. HOLMES. I see the spur in the present condition of the public mind, the present state of the public intelligence; the example of a private institution, well managed is, of course, a stimulus to a public institution. The taking over of the private institutions will not come until the public mind is educated to that point, and then it will take that step. My idea is that no corruption of men or legislatures shall be forced upon the public in the ownership or control of these things when the public is fully educated to a knowledge of them.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you apply your position equally to those lines of activity which might be called scientific, such as medical research, the astronomical, and also as to those which are industrial and political? Is there a distinction in your mind between the foundation going into these industrial questions or political questions, and as to going into the field of medical research?

Dr. HOLMES. The contrast between the work done in this Colorado situation and that of the Rockefeller medical institution?

Commissioner COMMONS. Yes.

Dr. HOLMES. There is a very real distinction there because the Rockefeller Medical Institution does not touch these controverted questions as does, for example, the other in the matter of the Colorado miners. To investigate the germ of infantile paralysis is one thing, and to investigate the rights and mode of living of the Colorado miners is quite another thing. There is a distinction there. Nevertheless, the distinction is not so sound that I would ever feel it necessary to keep scientific research in the hands of private individuals, although I believe it will always be there so long as human beings remain curious as a result of their natures. Take for example the successful investigation into the causes of yellow fever; that shows what can be done by the Government when it sets itself out to do it.

Commissioner COMMONS. You would not apply your reasoning then to the Rockefeller Institute for Medical Research in the same way that you would to the Rockefeller Foundation going into the industrial situation?

Dr. HOLMES. Logically, I would not apply it the same way. The thing that you are investigating does not impress itself on us in the same way these other things do.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have you followed the work of the Carnegie institution in its investigation of industrial questions?

Dr. HOLMES. Not to any extent, sir; no.

Commissioner COMMONS. You do not know whether the tendency of these foundations is to avoid, rather than take up, these industrial and political questions?

Dr. HOLMES. I could not answer that question. I have no knowledge which would warrant an answer.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you consider—you perhaps have considered Mr. Rockefeller's statement that he thought that the present control the legislatures have over charters is sufficient to guarantee—or perhaps you saw that in his testimony?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes. I answered that question of Mr. Weinstock's. Perhaps you were not in the room at the time.

Commissioner COMMONS. I was here, but did not get your idea. The question is whether there should not be some change in the power of the legislature at the present time to regulate these foundations or modify the election of directors, or is it sufficient, as seemed to be the tenor of his argument, to leave it to those future generations to take care of those things when they wished, the understanding being that the reserve power of the State over charters and contracts is adequate protection when a menace becomes serious; or do you think it is so serious at the present time that it should be taken up by the legislatures at the present time?

Dr. HOLMES. I believe the menace is already with us. I should welcome a report on the part of this commission pointing out that menace and recommending the amendment of the charter, directing that all action should be put into the hands of the people, and ultimate responsibility for the direction of these great benefactions. Mr. Rockefeller is undoubtedly technically correct. I have no knowledge of the charters, but I assume he is technically correct.

Commissioner COMMONS. The State would have to fall back on its reserve power if it attempted to amend any of these charters at the present time, and your idea is that it should amend these charters at once?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; the longer a foundation like this lasts, the harder it is to make a change. After it has gone on a certain length of time you can not change it, you have to break it.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you consider that might discourage the further establishment of foundations, if parties having these large fortunes find that they are to be regulated in some drastic way and they would not make further endowments?

Dr. HOLMES. I suppose that would be the result, and I should welcome such a result. Any new foundation is an added menace along the lines which I have tried to indicate.

Commissioner COMMONS. So you would not consider that a disadvantage, the matter of establishing more drastic regulation in the way of public control?

Dr. HOLMES. Not at all; I should say it was a great advantage, as indicating to our wealthy men and families that society was learning that these things ultimately are to be put in the hands of the people.

Commissioner COMMONS. A great many people having large fortunes spend their money in other ways, such as giving entertainments, in traveling, on yachts; would you correct that also?

Dr. HOLMES. Why, I can not see that at the present time we have any particular need of going into sumptuary legislation. If people want to spend the money that comes to them in legal channels that way, that is their business.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would you consider it better for the State to let them spend their money in those ways—simply for their own enjoyment, or let them have liberty to carry out their own ideas for spending it for the public welfare?

Dr. HOLMES. My idea is that the action of the State should always be determined by the public necessity and interest so far as it is directly affected by the acts of individuals. To my mind if a person should endeavor to spend a large sum of money, not only for his own pleasure, but to set up a house or institution of corruption, the State could immediately interfere. It has learned to interfere, as it is now interfering, in the liquor and brewery business in many States, but the matter of individual expenditure along the line of individual follies or vices and that sort of thing, I confess for the moment I can not see how interference is going to be done even though such interference might be welcome from an ethical point of view.

Commissioner COMMONS. Suppose that Mr. Rockefeller had spent this $100,000,000 for his own pleasure, and his son should go ahead in the same way, would you say that you would not interfere in that, but that you would interfere if he proposed to spend it in what he considered a public movement?

Dr. HOLMES. That is one of the strange anomalies of the situation and analogous to the preliminary statement I made, that the menace of these benefactions is in proportion to the integrity, vitality, and courage of the men who administer them.

Commissioner COMMONS. Does that answer my question, do you think?

Dr. HOLMES. I did not try to evade it. I have tried to state clearly my opinion that this is not the time for sumptuary legislation. I understand that is what your question covers. If Mr. Rockefeller spent his money in that way and not in the other, he would be a man of lower character. And I do not mean that he is a man of low character.

Commissioner COMMONS. I understand that your proposition signifies that you would enact legislation that would entirely discourage the spending of it in the way he proposes to spend this money, and the alternative would be for him to spend it in the other way, for his own pleasure?

Dr. HOLMES. Your questions have brought us to a very important point, from the standpoint of ethics, and that is that a man who has a large fund of money and faced with the problem of spending it he can not do it ethically. The ethical problem of spending a large fortune is one of the strongest indictments against the accumulation of it.

Commissioner COMMONS. Then we get to your idea that this property does not really belong to him, and that he should turn it back to the State?

Dr. HOLMES. That is for him to say, whether he should turn it over to the State, from an ethical point of view. I think that the acquiring of large fortunes, which are gained by the efforts of others, is wrong, and the person holding that fortune is faced by ethical problems which he can not solve.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. I understand you to say that you do not invest your savings in securities such as stocks and bonds; how would you advise a man to invest his savings?

Dr. HOLMES. I never have been faced with the problem of investing savings, and I do not know what to say. I will state frankly what I do. As a matter of fact, I live on my salary, and I use a portion of that salary for such life insurance as I feel is sufficient to properly safeguard the future of the woman I married and the children I may bring into the world. In addition to that I keep a small sum in the bank for the education of my children and as a protection against disease and other hazards of modern life. The interest that comes to me as an income from that money which I have in the bank, and which I keep at a definite figure and never go above, I spend apart from my own personal interests. I have tried to adjust myself to things as they are.

Commissioner BALLARD. Then you recognize the propriety of people looking forward to the future and making provision for those dependent upon them? And of course you know that insurance companies, in order to provide funds so that they can pay their policies have to invest their money in these very stocks and bonds that you state individually you would not care to invest in?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes, sir; and that is one of the incidents of the present situation, and one that I am utterly unable to meet myself. I find that it is necessary to make provision for my wife and children in order to protect them, and I know of no other way to do it than by taking out a policy in a private life insurance company.

Commissioner BALLARD. I gather from something you said in the beginning that you were inclined to the opinion that in these industries they should be more or less cooperative and that all of the individuals in them should work for their own good. I think there have been a good many so-called societies which have gone to rather sparsely settled parts of the country and endeavored to work out their lives independent of others. Would you not recommend small industries of that sort?

Dr. HOLMES. They always offer an interesting experiment, but we all know that the great majority of them have been practical failures. Cooperative movements, like the cooperative movements of Belgium and England and other countries which are coextensive with the whole national fabric, are what I have in mind.

Commissioner BALLARD. You of course recall that the law creating this commission requires that we should make a recommendation to Congress giving some of the solutions of the problem of unrest or industrial unrest. Can you in short suggest to us what we should report in that line?

Dr. HOLMES. My feeling on the subject of industrial unrest, sir, if I may speak for a few moments on this question, is that on the surface and in the most superficial way that unrest comes from a desire on the part of the great masses of the working people for better conditions of living and better labor conditions as the result of education. People educated to a certain extent come to demand certain things, and rightly so. Developing out of that, I believe, as one of the causes there is recognition of the inequitable distribution of wealth of which a great foundation of $100,000,000 is an imposing example. People are coming to feel that these enormous inequalities represent nothing that is ethical.

Then underneath all that I think as the deepest root of all is the fact that we are beginning to recognize that there is no proper relationship between our industrial and our political systems. In other words, we have in this country to-day, as we did before the war, a house divided against itself, and that there is in some part a political democracy, and inside of that or alongside of it an industrial autocracy. Those two things can not live together in the same family. And I believe that right there is the real one of all of our causes of unrest. In other words, if some humane and proper conditions of life and labor were established, and if some way were found to distribute the wealth more equitably I believe that the unrest would still be here, and that as expressive of this feeling people must have a voice of responsibility in the democracy of industry, the same as they do in government and politics. Now, I don't know whether you want me to go on and state just how I would meet that unrest.

Commissioner BALLARD. Yes; I think so.

Chairman WALSH. Oh, yes, indeed.

Dr. HOLMES. Let me take the last matter first—that unrest is the expression of a desire for true industrial democracy. Underneath that, as I view it, is the problem of reconstructing our society upon a democratic basis. In other words, it is a problem of transition from autocracy to democracy in industry. Now, experience has usually shown us that transition is made by revolution, violence, and conflict upon the part of groups of people. I pray and trust, and I know you and others pray that that method may not be the method resorted to in this case. In other words, are not we, wise enough and sane enough and sympathetic enough, especially have not we learned the lesson of democracy enough to make this transition along the lines of sane development rather than along the lines of violent outbreak.

One of the greatest disappointments of the present situation in America to-day is that our laboring people, especially our trades-unions, have shown no ability to establish the cooperative merchandising in industry or cooperative mercantile establishments in connection with industry after the example of those which have been so successful in Belgium and England. One of the strangest things in the world to me is the fact that trades-unions or labor unions have not undertaken to work along that line as has been done and been approved in other countries. A long step in advance would be made if our laboring people should show constructive initiative in that direction rather than resort to violence and outbreak and strikes and everything of that kind.

As another, and as I regard it the second, cause of unrest, the inequitable distribution of wealth, I believe that very radical measures along the line of Government action must be taken sooner or later. In other words, I can not see that that thing is ever going to cure itself. The public ownership of railroads and natural resources and the readjustment along scientific lines of the tariff and taxation along the lines of the Lloyd George principles in England, taxation of land values, and taxation of incomes and inheritances, which is just beginning to adjust itself to our people, and above all the result of grappling with problems of dividends, all these things must contribute to the solution of this problem, and we must determine along what lines action is to be taken if we are ever to get hold of this problem of the inequitable distribution of wealth as it now is. And the appeal, as I say, is all to Government action.

As regards the bringing about of better conditions of life and labor, I believe here that the trades-union movement, of course, has done a great deal of good. I recognize also what enlightened employers like Mr. Ford, who appeared before this commission, have accomplished. In neither of these cases, however, do I see any solution of the problem of better conditions of life and labor. The trades-union movement has used the wasteful means of strike. While I sympathize with the strike in 99 cases out of 100, it is so wasteful and accomplishes really so little that is tangible. Then the trades-union movement itself is essentially autocratic. It is approaching now the point, to my mind, where trade-unionism is itself to be considered as undemocratic rather than the friend of labor as far as the ultimate solution is concerned.

As regard these employers like Mr. Ford, whose generosity, wisdom, and vision we all of us recognize gladly, here again I see no solution of the better conditions of life and labor. In the first place, there are very few men with business like that of Mr. Ford and the comparatively few who have attempted to work along his lines.

Miss Tarbell, who appeared before this commission, indicated that the golden rule was now being practiced more in business than ever before, but I believe it is not an exaggeration to say that the golden rule is somewhat of an exception. Mr. Ford has won his international fame largely because he is not a type, but is an exception.

Then, in the second place, this resort to the enlightened employer offers no permanent solution here, by reason of the fact that many, many men, some of whom I know, as you undoubtedly do, might be likewise disposed, but they are not in industries that pay them over a thousand per cent profit on the work done. I have myself visited many of these places in England and in this country, some of them, and in each case I have found conditions—business conditions—which have brought in profits which have enabled this thing to be done. And I will venture to say that when you talk with these men in your own parish and within your own circle of friendship and say to them, "Why don't you do this?" he holds up his hands in holy horror and talks about profits of 6 per cent and 7 per cent and 8 per cent and 9 per cent.

In other words, I think in this case, as in that of the inequitable distribution of wealth, that the people of the United States have in their hands the machinery to solve this thing of industrial democracy as they have solved other problems. And if they fail to use that machinery, as they failed before the war to use the machinery that they had to settle the slavery question—and we know to-day that that machinery could have been used, for I feel that that conflict, which we speak of as an irrepressible conflict, was, as Mr. Seward said, irrepressible because of the passions of men, and not because there was not at the disposal of the Government men of capability to settle it. Now we have this machinery. Are we going to solve this problem free from prejudice and the passion resulting on both sides and which expresses itself in the outbreaks of the respective parties, or are we going to let the Government settle it on the basis of legislation? So as to the proper conditions of labor, as to the number of days, and the six days' work a week, and the eight-hour day, and the minimum wage, and the abolition of child labor, all these things are things that can be immediately solved and disposed of as we know they have been in certain communities where laws have been passed for the solution of these difficulties. I hope and pray for the establishment everywhere, by devices of this kind, of proper conditions of life and labor. The pressure of that sort of thing, the starving, the freezing, the unemployment—when these have been removed, then we shall be able to get hold of this thing of inequitable distribution of wealth, which is so potential though in the background.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all, thank you, Doctor.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Lennon has just a question or two.

Commissioner LENNON. I want to ask you a question that will give me some personal information that I feel as though I desire. I want to know how your life has been cast as giving you the knowledge that you express as to industry?

Dr. HOLMES. Of course, you understand, sir, that is talking about personal matters and biographical matters that I do not voluntarily intrude upon your attention; but if you ask the question, I have nothing to conceal. I was brought up in a family that never had any very great amount of money. If I may say that when I went through college I had to work my way part of the way, and through scholarships, and I never have known what it is to have sums of money at my disposal. I graduated from the public high school in Massachusetts and went to Harvard University, went to the college three years, and took three years in the divinity school, graduating in 1904. In 1904 I was called to a church in the suburbs of Boston, and remained there until 1907, when I came to this city, and I have been the pastor of the Church of the Messiah since that time.

My father had been in various lines of occupation, as clerk and in the furniture business, and one thing and another of that kind. I came out of college, if that is any enlightenment to you, I came out of college a Spencerian, sociologically as well as biologically. I became fascinated by Spencer and his economic philosophy while I was in college, and I studied him extensively and came out a convinced individualist to the extent that in my early years as a minister my opposition to trades-unions was bitter, and I denounced socialism in the true and tried method of the man who knows nothing about it. [A laugh in the audience drew from the chairman an injunction to order.] You will understand, sir, that I was not trying to raise a laugh—

Chairman WALSH. Indeed, I know that. I have to do this very frequently.

Dr. HOLMES. I meant that very sincerely. I knew nothing about it.

Chairman WALSH. You do not need to regret anything. I have had to do this with many witnesses. You may proceed.

Dr. HOLMES. In the first one or two years of my ministry I spent all of my time in preaching and my views were somewhat academic, as, I suppose, any college student. My first invasion into the social field was through the Associated Charities of Boston. I sat on the neighborhood board in which my church was located for a period of three years, and in that time gained more or less experience as to the conditions of poverty and the problem of living by the wage earner. Then when I came to New York I got launched into this great community and began to learn things very rapidly; and I suppose from perhaps a period of six years ago I have given myself as a clergyman principally to the study not of theology or Christian history or biblical criticisms—I don't suppose I have read a book on biblical criticism in five years save perhaps to glance at one then as it came from the press. I have given myself principally to the study of economics and of industrial conditions. I believe, sir, that the problem of the church to-day is the problem of industry. I believe that applied religion finds its application to-day in that field and that no minister can serve his own parish, least of all serve his community and country at large, unless such ways are open to him in the public discretion and the study of and meeting of all sorts and conditions of people and trying to serve, and that he acquaints himself with conditions as they are and in his thought and of course in his modest way tries to analyze causes and to find cures.

Commissioner LENNON. Thank you, Doctor. Do you believe that the principles as indicated in the parable of the Good Samaritan are necessary for application by a true Christian?

Dr. HOLMES. The principles told us in the story of the Good Samaritan are, of course, a fundamental part of Christianity. Charity from person to person in the ordinary individual relationship will never disappear from this world, no matter how perfect a state of justice may be established. But this I believe, and I say it with all reverence, that had Jesus of Nazareth, when he told that story of the Good Samaritan, been living in these days, he would have told it in very different terms. In other words, there is another problem involved than the healing of the wounds of the man he found on the roadside.

Commissioner LENNON. I think so, too. In speaking of the necessity for democracy, has your study convinced you that as you placed greater responsibility on mankind in the exercise of democracy that they will grow to make good in the administration of it?

Dr. HOLMES. It is difficult for any man, I suppose, to have experience wide enough to speak out of experience on that; but so far as I can speak, with the limitations of my own experience, I would say yes, that that is the only way to develop power; that is, to impose responsibility. We find that in the life of a child every once in awhile parents' training goes to pieces because the burden of responsibility is too great. That happens also in society. But the method is not vitiated by reason of that fact.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you recall any instance where the retention of teachers or professors in colleges largely endowed by donations of individuals or by foundations whether that has had to do with the retention of these professors? Do you recall any of those instances where it seemingly on the surface had that operation?

Dr. HOLMES. I have heard the same stories, of course, that you have; but upon my word I have never been able—I have no personal knowledge that would warrant my expressing myself. Of course, the Ross episode and the Chancellor Brown episode and things of that kind are familiar to me, but I know nothing at all about them.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Doctor, you made the statement earlier in your testimony that the ethical was always in advance of the legal aspect of a case. Isn't there a further subdivision somewhat necessary there in the statement of that opinion, to the effect that the ethical is always in advance in its concept, but the legal is always in advance in its practicality?

Dr. HOLMES. I should say yes. The difficulty is that we have our ethical ideals, but when we try to put them up in practice we run plumb up against the law.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The legal man has already got there.

Dr. HOLMES. Yes, sir. In other words, ethics would at times advocate a violation of law, and I would not recommend that process.

Commissioner GARRETSON. From your observation and as your opinion, would you be of the belief that the State is exactly like an individual in this, that the nonuse of a series of muscles, failing properly to exercise their function, or failing to exercise their proper function, they become atrophied by nonuse?

Dr. HOLMES. That is a very difficult question, Mr. Garretson. I do not feel like answering it except by generalities.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The question is only general.

Dr. HOLMES. That question, it seems to me, depends upon the familiar analogy between the state of an organism and the individual as an organism. I believe that in many points the analogy made so familiar to us by Herbert Spencer has broken down, but I do not really feel competent to point out one instance against another where it has fulfilled it, as it has in many cases, and where it has broken down.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The further application of it would be simply this, that if private agencies were enabled through noninterference of the people to take up the burden of education, the burden of information, the burden of spiritual direction, would that eventually result in the paralysis of the State in those directions, unless they reasserted the right?

Dr. HOLMES. The tendency, it seems to me, would be markedly in that direction. I hesitate to answer that, however, because I can not think of any specific instance to warrant the opinion.

Commissioner GARRETSON. There is no specific instance of those functions being exercised that I can point to; but if the tendency is in that direction, what I desired was your opinion as to what would probably be the natural result thereof.

Dr. HOLMES. So far as I can understand, what you are aiming at by that question, it is the thing to which Prof. Commons referred in his reference to the conflict between the private agency and the public agency.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Exactly.

Dr. HOLMES. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Only applied in a little different way.

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; it seems to me—well, may I put it this way: My idea about social problems is that the people shall come to do all those things that they can do for themselves. For instance, the matter now pressing upon this city of unemployment, we are just beginning in that feeble way to take up the matter of the city unemployment bureau. Here, and only a few days ago, we had a meeting at my church on the matter of unemployment, and a gentleman came up there representing an organization—private employment agencies—to protest against the organization by the city of a municipal agency which would try to bring the job and the man together without expense to the man.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Is not the greatest existing evidence of the effect, as evidence not by decadence, but by the growth of the Interstate Commerce Commission as at present constituted, considered from the standpoint of the history of its inception where every constitutional ground was set up that the Government could not do it, still it has grown to where it exercises a potential control directly along the line that it was denied the Government had the power to exercise?

Dr. HOLMES. You mean that the Government, any Government institution will inevitably develop an enlarged function?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Regarding the statement that was made here on the stand as to the control of foundations and as to those references to the reserve power—that was not the phrase used, but that is what it comes to, the reserve power of the State to control—and the statement that it was believed to be efficient in the case of those foundations that are now existing, have you seen any instance where that reserve power which must apply equally to all or none has ever exercised effective control over a vast combination of capital in corporate form?

Dr. HOLMES. I do not think of any at the particular moment.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Prof. Commons calls my attention to the fact of national control of railways, corporations, as a possible evidence of that. Has that control ever dealt with anything but the question of simply power?

Dr. HOLMES. Has that to do with reserve power like the granting of a charter? I do not exactly get the idea.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The parallel is not perhaps exact, but aside from that then you know of none?

Dr. HOLMES. If I may speak of that analogy, in one sense it seems to me to compare with the reserve power of the State. With reference to the Rockefeller Foundation, it seems to me stretching things a good deal when you come to dictate rights of that kind. I think the legislature of New York would hesitate to dictate anything of that kind in reference to the Rockefeller Foundation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Could or could not this tendency readily arise? We heard some testimony here in regard to the influence that is exercised educationally by already existing institutions, and the suspicions evidenced in the minds of some as evidence in a resolution passed by the National Educational Association in regard to the domination already exercised in this direction by existing foundations. Follow that to its logical sequence. Allow the educational institutions to be dominated from the kindergarten to the high school. Follow it up with endowment of colleges both theological and secular, reinforced by pension to the spirits dominating those institutions. What would reserve power be worth after 20 years and its influence?

Dr. HOLMES. I think, sir, it would be worth practically nothing. That is the reason I called it a technicality.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You expressed the hope, Doctor, that this commission would recommend that the charter granted by the State of New York to the Rockefeller Foundation be altered or modified or changed. Did I understand you correctly?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; I think I said that, but through the asking of the question it raises in my mind whether it should refer to the United States Government. We are in New York City.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, what modifications and changes in that charter would you advise or suggest?

Dr. HOLMES. I believe the modifications and the changes should be in the direction that I have proposed, perhaps sketchily indicated here; that is, I would welcome by some method—I do not know as I can specify it—that the people, or the representatives of the people, shall themselves have a very large and perhaps predominating voice in the administration of the foundation. That is the only way to escape this conflict, it seems to me, between the public interests and the ideas and ideals of a small group of men exercising stupendous power.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, you would have the State of New York, through its representatives—for example, say, through the governor—appoint a certain percentage of the trustees of that fund?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes; that particularizes it pretty definitely, as it would in the case of the State university have the same kind of control.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You also made the statement, I think, Doctor, that in your opinion the great accumulation of wealth, while it might be legal, is unethical. Did I understand you correctly?

Dr. HOLMES. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, where would you draw the line and at what point would you say that the volume of wealth is unethical?

Dr. HOLMES. I do not know as I ever have in my mind been able to draw the line as to just where a certain amount of money is ethical and a certain other amount unethical. But I look at what we call fortunes, either these fortunes have come on the whole from resources, from places, by methods which do not bear any very close relationship to the individual or the group of individuals enjoying the fortune.

Now and again a man makes a great invention. Now and again he strikes the happy combination of business like Mr. Ford and he takes full advantage of it and reaps enormous profits. Those are exceptions. But the problem of the fortune and the problem of the inequitable distribution of wealth and the money that comes in the form of dividends and investments and one thing and another, from definite areas of land, the mineral resources and special privileges and things of that kind—in my private life I feel I should always get worried if I found that an amount of money was coming into me—pardon me for putting it in personal form—if I found an amount of money was coming in to me which did not to my mind bear a fair relation to the kind of work I am doing.

Now one man may think a minister in any city is not worth much more than five or six hundred dollars on an average—the average wage that they get. I may say from my own point of view I believe that a minister is an important member of the community and has the opportunity of offering very valuable service and is entitled to compensation. But if that compensation got up into thousands of dollars a year, because he was a member of a rich church, or rather a minister of a rich church, or because he had been fortunate in making investments or because he inherited property, I personally should feel worried and look for a way of getting rid of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where, Doctor, would you fix the limit, where you would you draw the line as to what should be permitted and what should not be?

Dr. HOLMES. If I may again make a personal reference, the way I look at the matter, if I got an amount—which I do not get—that was equal to $10,000 a year, I can not imagine that I could possibly be worth that much.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Don't you think $500 a year—the $500-a-year preacher would look upon you as exploiting if you got $10,000?

Dr. HOLMES. I imagine that he would. I rather think he would think there would be an inequity there, that any minister should serve a church 12 months in a year and seven days a week for five hundred or six hundred a year is an outrage. The change must be made there and not at the other end.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. On the other hand, might not the $500-a-year minister, who may be able to live within the modest income, look upon it as an outrage, another who would get the $10,000?

Dr. HOLMES. That is a matter of personal opinion which inevitably comes in. That is where such great foundations which we are talking of are vitiated by the personal idea that comes into the administration. We can't go behind this question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you also made the statement, Doctor, that you think that the wealth made by the labor and brains of other people ought to belong to all the people?

Dr. HOLMES. Brains of other people?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; I think I took down your expression literally. You spoke about wealth being made by the labor and the brains of other people.

Dr. HOLMES. I think I was referring to the private individual or family that received a large income from the labor or brains of other people; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And you regarded that wealth as unethical?

Dr. HOLMES. It seems to me so, if it offers no fair return for what the person is doing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you say, Doctor, that all great wealth is unethical or only certain kinds of great wealth is unethical? If you differentiate it, what would be the line of differentiation?

Dr. HOLMES. Why, the line of differentiation, of course, is the relationship between the person receiving the money and the service which he offers to the community. I can not conceive of any of our great fortunes bearing any relation to that particular kind of service. Grant, if the personal reference is not out of order—Mr. Rockefeller, granting that he is a very wise and good and generous man, as we all like to think that he is, is it conceivable that the fortune which he is to enter upon some day, if he has not already done so, or any portion of that fortune, can be justly regarded as properly his, even though it belonged to his father? I am not questioning it does not belong to him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What amount of great wealth would you regard as ethical?

Dr. HOLMES. I do not know of any great wealth I would regard as ethical; but I say the service given to the community is limited.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Let me cite a case and let me ask you whether you would regard the wealth as ethical or unethical. Let us take, for example, Mr. Edison, who by virtue of his inventive genius has revolutionized industrial conditions. Mr. Edison brings forth ideas that add tremendously to the wealth of the Nation, that open out new and better avenues of employment to untold thousands, that injure no one but help everyone, and by virtue of his doing that he accumulates great wealth. Is that wealth on his part ethical or unethical?

Dr. HOLMES. I believe that the case of a man like Mr. Edison offers a very fair—although I think it would be possible to argue that it comes within the generalization—offers a very fair exception. There is, of course, no way of knowing or estimating the contribution that a man like Edison has made to the community. The thing that tends to persuade me to dismiss that sort of thing from my mind as representing anything that is at all perilous is the fact that he may be such a man who cares nothing about money.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He keeps it, just the same.

Mr. HOLMES. I do not happen to know about Edison's private affairs; but I am not aware that he is a man—is he?—I was not aware that he is that kind of a man.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I am speaking, in taking Mr. Edison as a man of reputed wealth. He may not care about it, but he has it just the same, I take it.

Dr. HOLMES. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, furthermore, in answer to questions of Prof. Commons, you emphasized the fact that you regard these great foundations as a menace. If they are a menace, they are an evil; they are not a good. On the other hand, I take it that you will admit that if a man with Mr. Rockefeller's wealth were to spend it in reckless and riotous living, which would not only be injurious to himself but, by example, injurious to society generally, you would regard that also as an evil, would you not?

Dr. HOLMES. I certainly would regard it as an evil.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Which of the two would you regard as the lesser, the recklessness of the life of the one or the great foundations for the general uplift as the other?

Dr. HOLMES. That is a question, it seems to me, quite impossible to estimate, certainly to any great degree. We must agree to this, that from the standpoint of the individual no man can—to treat the thing from an ethical standpoint, Mr. Rockefeller could not but regard himself as custodian of this wealth. He believes he is entitled to his wealth. There is nothing to prevent him from spending it for the good of others rather than upon his own selfish whims and fancies. But that hard and fast comparison and that dilemma breaks down, it seems to me, the very moment we come to view this thing from the standpoint of the ethics of the individual and find the man burdened with that stupendous sum of money and with the whole of the society of which he is a single member. Now, from that standpoint that stupendous burden, both from the standpoint of its origin and of its expenditure, is a potential evil. But there is another way out, it seems to me. Shall Mr. Rockefeller sit down and say, "Shall I start a foundation or shall I be a prodigal and spend my money in riotous living?" Not at all. There is a third way. He may even use his wealth for working out with the United States Government a way of taking it over and handling it; or he might consecrate it to social work which will lead directly to the elimination of great fortunes; or he may do the perhaps what you would call the silly thing; or he may turn it over to the Government, as Mr. Roosevelt passed over the $40,000 Nobel prize. There are other recommendations.

Chairman WALSH. Might I ask you to get from our files the Peters bill, which was the proposed act of Congress chartering the Rockefeller Foundation, the present charter of the Rockefeller Foundation, and secure any other data that you may desire and give us written recommendations as to what restrictions might be placed upon these foundations, following the questions asked by Commissioner Weinstock?

Dr. HOLMES. I should be very glad to do so.

Chairman WALSH. If we might ask that without considering that an imposition?

Dr. HOLMES. Not at all. I should consider it an opportunity.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you. You may be excused permanently.

At this point we will take a recess until 2 o'clock this afternoon, at which time I understand we are to meet in the aldermanic chamber across the hall.

(At 12.30 of this Thursday, January 28, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock in the afternoon of the same day.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will please be in order. We will proceed now.
Mr. Cutting.

TESTIMONY OF MR. R. FULTON CUTTING.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name, please?

Mr. CUTTING. Robert Fulton Cutting.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you live, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. New York, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business or profession?

Mr. CUTTING. I am altogether out of active business. I am trustee in some of the corporations.

Chairman WALSH. What was your business when you were active?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I was really—I only have been a trustee in a variety of corporations.

Chairman WALSH. Were you an attorney at law to begin with?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Mr. WALSH. Just name the corporations, please, in which you were an active trustee; or were you an active trustee when you were in business?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I was in the St. Louis & Terre Haute Railroad Co., as a member of the executive committee; the Florida Central, as a member of the executive committee; the American Beet Sugar Co.—those were the main concerns; the Paterson Ranch Co., of California; and the Florida Land Co.

Chairman WALSH. You have been for many years associated with charitable and civic enterprises in New York City and elsewhere?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Please name the principal organizations with which you are at present a trustee, and state your position in each organization.

Mr. CUTTING. I am president of the New York Trades School; I am trustee in the Cooper Institute; trustee of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor—chairman of the finance committee; president of the Bureau of Municipal Research. Those are the principal ones. I think there are, perhaps, half a dozen others that I do not now recall.

Chairman WALSH. Will you as briefly as possible, consistent with giving a fair—

Mr. CUTTING (interrupting). I am chairman, I might say, of the City & Suburban Homes Co., model tenement houses.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would go back, if you please, and state the particular activities of each one of those in order.

Mr. CUTTING. The Cooper Institute, which you all know about—

Chairman WALSH. We will assume none of us know about that, for the record here at least. I guess some of us do know about some of them.

Mr. CUTTING. It is technical and artistic—

Chairman WALSH. You mentioned one before the Cooper Institute, as I carried it in my mind. What was the first one; the New York Trade School? Please put them in order, if you can.

Mr. CUTTING. That is for the instruction of—the elementary instruction in the trades—in all of the trades.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe how the funds are secured for the operation of that school, and its general plan?

Mr. CUTTING. It is endowed to the extent of about $550,000. And then it charges a small sum for instruction, and that, with the aid of the endowment, covers the whole expense. It is simply for the instruction in trades, at the bench as well as with the books; mostly at the bench.

Chairman WALSH. What is the source of the endowment?

Mr. CUTTING. The source of the endowment is income derived from a gift of $100,000 from the founder of the school, Col. Axmuty, a gift of $500,000 from J. P. Morgan.

Chairman WALSH. Where is that school located?

Mr. CUTTING. At the corner of First Avenue and Sixty-seventh Street.

Chairman WALSH. What trades are taught?

Mr. CUTTING. Bricklaying, plumbing, carpentering, metal cornice work, electrical journeymen, painting (house and sign), typesetting, steam fitting; I guess that is all.

Chairman WALSH. The school has accommodations for how many pupils?

Mr. CUTTING. The school has accommodations for about 900. We have had as many as 900 there.

Chairman WALSH. How many have you there now?

Mr. CUTTING. Our enrollment this year, I think, is about 450.

Chairman WALSH. Have you literature which covers the entire subject of the activities of the school?

Mr. CUTTING. We have reports every year and programs as to what the nature of the work is.

Chairman WALSH. What are the requirements leading up to attendance on this school?

Mr. CUTTING. The only one is that the young man shall be of good health and 18 years of age. We have taken them 17 years of age, if the young men happened to be able-bodied and healthy.

Chairman WALSH. How many trustees are there?

Mr. CUTTING. Five.

Chairman WALSH. How are they selected?

Mr. CUTTING. They are selected by themselves; that is, they are practically for life.

Chairman WALSH. In case of a vacancy, how are they filled?

Mr. CUTTING. The other trustees select them.

Chairman WALSH. Was that provided for in any gift to the institution, or how?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; by the trustees that turned over the institution originally. When a vacancy occurs it is filled by a meeting of the other members of the board.

Chairman WALSH. How long has the school been in operation?

Mr. CUTTING. I think for 27 years—either 26 or 27 years.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the attitude of labor organizations toward the school?

Mr. CUTTING. It has been always antagonistic; that is to say, the young men who graduate from the training school are never given labor cards, although competent.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know the reason for that, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. The reason for that, more than anything else, is ignorance, because I have sat down several times with committees from the unions, and around the table we have on every occasion arrived at a consensus of opinion as to the fact that it was a good thing for us to cooperate.

Chairman WALSH. So I take it the feeling is more or less widespread among labor organizations—that is, they feel hostile to the school?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you any way to gauge the attitude of workers who are not connected with organizations, as to their feeling toward the activities of the school?

Mr. CUTTING. I know of no way to gauge that except by the experience of the young men who come—the numbers that come to the trade school.

Chairman WALSH. The school is liberally patronized? The parents of the young men seem to be anxious to get them in?

Mr. CUTTING. We have now 450 there.

Chairman WALSH. Why is it lower now than it has been, if there is any particular reason which you have observed?

Mr. CUTTING. It is always lower when industry is dull. That has been noticed in years gone by, but there is much more competition now, because the city of New York has opened vocational schools. There is a new trade school at Yonkers, and in the last few years Mr. Carnegie's great schools at Pittsburgh have been opened.

Chairman WALSH. Is the Yonkers school a private school?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. What is the attitude of labor organizations toward the public trade school?

Mr. CUTTING. It is, I understand, favorable.

Chairman WALSH. What is the attitude of the public generally toward the trade school of which you are a trustee?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, so far as I am able to understand, it is altogether favorable.

Chairman WALSH. What means have you, if any, for securing positions for the young men that come out of those schools, or is there any effort made along that line?

Mr. CUTTING. No effort is made along that line at all. The unions have always thought that we supplied strike breakers, but we never have done that in any instance.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything taught in the school except the trades themselves?

Mr. CUTTING. Nothing.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any sort of instruction?

Mr. CUTTING. Nothing.

Chairman WALSH. And so far as you have observed, has there ever been any attempt on the part of the employees of the school to direct the thought of the young men naturally along the lines of organization or against it?

Mr. CUTTING. I think nearly all of our instructors in the trade school are union men.

Chairman WALSH. You have never observed any disposition to take either side of this question?

Mr. CUTTING. No. There is no opposition; in fact, the young men are encouraged to join the unions as soon as they can; it is the only way for them to get employment.

Chairman WALSH. What is the attitude of the employers of the community toward the school?

Mr. CUTTING. It is favorable. We have trade committees from the master workmen of a number of trades that come regularly there to inspect and give their advice from time to time upon the methods of instruction.

Chairman WALSH. Are the employers likewise friendly toward the public trade schools?

Mr. CUTTING. Really, I do not know; but I fancy so. It is for their interest to have a larger supply of trained labor.

Chairman WALSH. In your meetings with the leaders of labor organizations, which you say you have had from time to time, or from any other source that you may be able to draw upon, could you give the commission the claims made by workers, if any, as to why they opposed this school?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, the claims made by the workers is the rather natural one that they do not want to increase the number of those who are engaged in the trade. You know, perhaps, that the unions do quite a number of things to-day to restrict the number of those engaged in the trades. It is not an unnatural standpoint.

Chairman WALSH. Do they give that reason? Have they given that reason to you?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, as I say, when you sit about the table and take the matter up and talk it over seriously that rapidly disappears.

Chairman WALSH. Is there or is there not any objection voiced by the workers as to the fact that it is not a democratic proposition, but rather a matter of benefaction?

Mr. CUTTING. I never have heard that from any individual at all.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the Cooper Institute—just briefly, Mr. Cutting, describe its activities.

Mr. CUTTING. It is a great school in technical science, in artistic work—where all sorts of technical scientific work and chemistry and the physics are taught, and in the arts, art drawing, modeling, and covering the whole ground of artistic development of men and women. It is entirely free and no charge made.

Chairman WALSH. Describe it, please, as to management, the number of scholars, and the whole matter of it, historically and practically, for the record, in your own way.

Mr. CUTTING. It was originally founded by Mr. Peter Cooper, who himself was originally a tradesman, and was in deep sympathy with those who were trying to get the sort of instruction he obtained only by very diligent and hard labor; and he founded this institute. Its corporate body is five members, who are elected for life. He was the original, the first one, and was succeeded by his son, Edward Cooper, and then by his son-in-law, Abram S. Hewitt. It conducts these various classes. I would say that within the last three years the city of New York has turned over to it the site of the old arsenal on Third Avenue, almost directly opposite the Cooper Union, where they have erected a two-story building which they hope to make six, and we have increased the number of those we are able to accommodate. I think the attendance now is 3,700 individuals, and the applications run up to about 8,000.

Chairman WALSH. About how many persons have taken advantage of its work, if you can approximate it?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, I could not approximate that; I can, of course, find that all out for you, but I can not tell from memory.

Chairman WALSH. You have publications, have you, that give all those details?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I am not sure whether the reports contain that particular detail or not, but we can easily obtain it for you. We can take the graduating classes. It would be difficult, however, to give the full number, because we have a large number that come in and stay but a year. The whole course is five years, and it is evening tuition. Some come and stay but a year or two and then get positions, so that by taking the graduating classes it would be rather difficult, and then some drop out very rapidly.

Chairman WALSH. We would like to get the approximate number that have taken advantage of it. I can get the approximate figures, I should think, from figures that could be obtained.

Mr. CUTTING. It can.

Chairman WALSH. For the moment I am going to take up the trade school and ask you to state a little more in detail as to the finances—the first one you mentioned. Please state the amount of the original endowment, what the income is, and how it is expended, and if it is not fully expended what becomes of it, and such details as that, briefly.

Mr. CUTTING. The income derived from it—I say it was originally $100,000, and then $500,000 added by Mr. Morgan's gift. The income on that has been—I think has been about twenty-five or twenty-six thousand dollars a year, until the last year, when it suffered a rather serious curtailment for the reason that in the gift there was a considerable amount of New Haven stock that is not paying a dividend. As it is running to-day it is not paying the whole expenses of its operation, but the deficit has been made up by the trustees.

Chairman WALSH. By the trustees individually?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. By their own contributions?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir; and I should say also by the widow of Mr. Axmuty, the founder of the school.

Chairman WALSH. Of what does the property of the school consist?

Mr. CUTTING. It consists of the buildings that cover the whole front between Sixty-seventh and Sixty-eighth Streets on First Avenue, and which run back, I think, about 175 feet; they cover the whole space. They are mostly one-story buildings in order to give light from the roof, but the rear building, which is 75 by 200 feet, is two stories high.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of securities is the principal of the fund invested in?

Mr. CUTTING. They are mostly in funds and some mortgages.

Chairman WALSH. In what sort of industries, or are they in industrial bonds or stock?

Mr. CUTTING. I think not; I think they are mostly all railroad bonds.

Chairman WALSH. Some municipal bonds?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think we have any municipal bonds now. They are mostly railroad bonds and mortgages on real estate.

Chairman WALSH. Mortgages on real estate in New York City?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; mortgages on real estate in New York City.

Chairman WALSH. I wish now you would please describe in the same way the funds of the Cooper Institute.

Mr. CUTTING. The Cooper Institute has an endowment fund to-day of about $3,000,000.

Chairman WALSH. What was it at its inception? Describe what the first figure was and if there was more than one; please state that and whether or not it has been added to or the capital diminished in any way.

Mr. CUTTING. I am afraid I could not give that with any degree of accuracy. I do not know how much Mr. Cooper originally endowed the institution with. He gave a large gift at the time he erected the buildings, but at that time the interest on the gift was not sufficient to carry on the operations of the school. However, since that time a great deal of money has been given—first by his son, Edward Cooper, and by his son-in-law, Abram S. Hewitt, and the Cooper Hewitt family and Mr. Carnegie.

Chairman WALSH. What are the total expenses of the school per annum?

Mr. CUTTING. I would rather give you that from the report, because I do not have it in mind now. It is all expended.

Chairman WALSH. How large a staff has it?

Mr. CUTTING. We have a pretty large staff, but I could not give you the numbers.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it so we could get into the record an idea of the size of the school?

Mr. CUTTING. We have a staff of about 30 professors, I should think, but I would rather not have that put on the record, because I can give you all these facts with absolute accuracy.

Chairman WALSH. Very well, you will be called upon by a representative of the commission for that.

Mr. CUTTING. I will give you all of that.

Chairman WALSH. Mr. Commons sends me a request from the back part of the room to the effect that you speak a little louder. We are all very anxious to hear what you have to say. What was the next one you mentioned?

Mr. CUTTING. I shall have to refer to the record.

Chairman WALSH. The reporter who took that part of your testimony is now absent from the room.

Mr. CUTTING. Very likely it is the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor.

Chairman WALSH. Just describe that, please.

Mr. CUTTING. That is a large agency for improving the condition of the poor, as described—as its name indicates—and it acts in a variety of ways. Of course, it has a large relief body, which works in visiting the homes of the poor and the nursing in the homes of the poor and provides for their needs. It also has a very large department known as the "social-welfare bureau," which conducts a great variety of enterprises, such as a school-lunch committee engaged in furnishing lunches to children in the public schools, and the public bath and laundry. It has a cooperative health department in a number of ways.

Chairman WALSH. What other governmental agencies does it cooperate with?

Mr. CUTTING. It cooperates with the health department and it has cooperated with other departments of the city, but I do not recall now which ones.

Chairman WALSH. What form does its cooperation take with the municipal body?

Mr. CUTTING. For instance, in the providing of lunches in the public schools there was originally a small committee known as the "school-lunch committee," an independent committee which secured the providing from the department of education of cheap food for the children of the schools. That was taken over by the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, and it is now operating in 18 schools in New York City, and will operate in a short time in 36.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of a staff has the association in that work; that is, the number and by whom they are paid? If a portion is paid by the association and a portion from the school fund, please state just how it is.

Mr. CUTTING. All the salaries are paid by the association. The school fund has not provided anything at all. It has provided a small sum, in some instances, in the way of furnishing equipment. The salaries are all paid by the association.

Chairman WALSH. Are the employees all appointed by the association?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; the employees are all appointed by the association.

Chairman WALSH. What sort of cooperation is there with the health department?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, there has been quite a variety of methods of cooperation. At one time the association organized a milk committee, which cooperated with the milk department in an effort to provide a proper kind of milk for New York, and that milk committee is operating now. It also cooperated with the health department last summer in an experiment made to test the carrying of disease by flies in tenement houses.

Chairman WALSH. What other activities has the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. It carries on, for instance, what is called the home hospital, which is an enterprise to show that those who are suffering from tuberculosis can be treated more successfully and cheaply in their own homes than they can in sanitariums. In doing that, it conducts a large work in what are known as the Vanderbilt Tenements, at the foot of Seventy-eighth Street and the East River. Those tenements are so constructed that the occupants can get a great deal of air. The association has altogether about 100 families in those buildings to-day. It has done a very important thing in demonstrating that families could be kept together and that the wage earners could go on with their work while at the same time they were living under conditions of health which enabled them to be absolutely cured of tuberculosis.

Chairman WALSH. Are there any employees of the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor that receive a part of their salaries from the association and a part from any unit of the government—municipal, county, or State?

Mr. CUTTING. None that I know.

Chairman WALSH. Are there any employees of the association whose whole duty is with the municipality or with any other department of the government?

Mr. CUTTING. None at all.

Chairman WALSH. Now, what are the social activities of the association? I do not recall your expression exactly. Did you say it had a department of social survey?

Mr. CUTTING. Social welfare.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe that.

Mr. CUTTING. For instance, as an institution, it conducted a public bath and laundry; it conducted this experiment that went on with the board of health about the carrying of disease by flies. It conducts this public school—this lunch committee. It also conducts a large food-supply store from which it supplies relief and food to those who come to the association for relief.

Chairman WALSH. How many employees has the association?

Mr. CUTTING. It has over a hundred, but the exact number I do not remember now.

Chairman WALSH. From whence comes the fund?

Mr. CUTTING. The fund comes almost entirely from the public in contributions.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would name—first, state whether or not there are any permanent endowments.

Mr. CUTTING. If I remember rightly the permanent endowment—oh, yes, we have a considerable amount of permanent endowment that is specified not to be used that amounts to something more than $500,000. That is to carry on such enterprises as the one that I have not mentioned, the Caroline Rest, which is a home to which we send convalescent women with small children.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe the source of their income, of the association.

Mr. CUTTING. The source of the income outside of these specific funds here is entirely from contributions and legacies.

Chairman WALSH. What is the total cost of operation?

Mr. CUTTING. I should say it had in what we call a reserve fund, which was an accumulation that had not been touched up to that time of about $75,000 at the commencement of October; the commencement of the fiscal year, rather at the end of this fiscal year, it had about $70,000 reserve for emergencies, what it calls its reserve fund, which happened to be the surplus from certain legacies which had not been used.

Chairman WALSH. Has the association studied the unemployment question?

Mr. CUTTING. It has, of course, given a great deal of attention to that; yes.

Chairman WALSH. And does that come under the social welfare department?

Mr. CUTTING. No; that comes under the general relief department. We have an employment bureau connected with the department which endeavors to get situations wherever it can.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have any employment offices?

Mr. CUTTING. We have one who is in charge of this employment bureau, and then, of course, the visitors of the association go about from home to home and make calls and sometimes those whom the applications are referred to also endeavor to find situations.

Chairman WALSH. You maintain places where work may be obtained temporarily by those out of work?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What are they?

Mr. CUTTING. We have a large department that gives sewing to women, but nothing else; nothing for men. It gives out a large amount of sewing, a large amount of material which is sewed into garments which are finally afterwards disposed of by us to other applicants that are needy, or sold.

Chairman WALSH. You may pass to the next organization, if you will. I may come back for some questions from time to time later on.

Mr. CUTTING. I can not recall particularly what the next one was you referred to. Will you give it to me?

Chairman WALSH. The bureau of municipal research. Please describe its activities.

Mr. CUTTING. It is an organization founded on a principle to supply expert service to municipal officials, cooperation with the officials of cities; to improve the forms and the operations of government.

Chairman WALSH. From whence does it obtain its funds?

Mr. CUTTING. From the public.

Chairman WALSH. And is there any endowment?

Mr. CUTTING. None at all.

Chairman WALSH. Would you please state the names of the largest contributor?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. To both of these. Please go back to the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor. First, name the largest contributors and the amount contributed.

Mr. CUTTING. That is rather difficult. Take the association for the poor first.

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not know that I can say in past years who the largest contributor is. But in this present year that they are operating upon now, since the 1st of October, the largest contributor is Mr. Rockefeller.

Chairman WALSH. And does the money which comes from Mr. Rockefeller come from him or does it come through any of the philanthropic corporations that they have instituted, the foundations?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I am not quite sure whether it comes from Mr. Rockefeller direct or the foundations—the foundation I think; perhaps the foundation. I am not the treasurer and I am not now president, so that I only heard that that amount of money came from that source; but I am not quite sure. My impression is that it comes from the foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Approximately, what was Mr. Rockefeller's contribution to that activity?

Mr. CUTTING. He gave us this autumn, when the pressure for relief was so great indeed, $25,000. He also has contributed to what is called our widows' pension fund the sum of $20,000 for this year to enable us to enlarge the work of pensioning widows, which we have been carrying on successfully for several years. But we had a large number of widows and we did not have enough money to pension them, as we called it, and in order to carry out that policy further he promised $20,000 for this year.

Chairman WALSH. Now please name any other contributors of large amounts.

Mr. CUTTING. I think Mr. Cleveland Dodge gave us $10,000.

Chairman WALSH. Any others?

Mr. CUTTING. A number of others; yes.

Chairman WALSH. I mean any that you have in mind; large contributors of large amounts?

Mr. CUTTING. I am rather a large contributor myself.

Chairman WALSH. Please set aside your modesty for the time being and state yourself, Mr. Cutting, with the others?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I think for this year under the peculiar demands of the association that we figured up, I have given $15,000.

Chairman WALSH. What did you say the total was, the total expenditure?

Mr. CUTTING. I did not mention the total expenditure budget.

Chairman WALSH. I had intended to ask that. What is the total budget of the association?

Mr. CUTTING. I think it is $250,000—over that.

Chairman WALSH. Well, kindly state.

Mr. CUTTING. I am not very confident of the exact figures now, because they have changed so of late years. We have been increasing so rapidly as the work developed that I have not kept it very clearly in my mind. We always operate upon a budget.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would go ahead and state the number of other large contributors.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I do not want to leave out any. I do not recall any more that I think of. We have received a number of contributions of a thousand dollars.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall any other contributions greater than, say, $10,000?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Any of $5,000 or greater?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I think there was one of five, but I am not sure enough to answer.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please furnish us with that?

Mr. CUTTING. I will furnish you with a list—full information.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would describe the widows' pension fund.

Mr. CUTTING. The widows' pension fund is simply the adequate care, as we take it, of widows with small children. The reason why it is called the pension fund is to differentiate it to some degree from the treatment of all the widows in charge of the association. We have between four and five hundred widows with small children; but as many of those as we have been able to take care of we simply inform them that they are to receive a regular pension of so much a week, so that we will relieve them of the anxiety of knowing what is to become of them if we stop the supply to them of food and clothing at any time. And we have about 100 widows now upon the list who are supplied in that way, which we call the widows' pension.

Chairman WALSH. About how many such widows have you now?

Mr. CUTTING. We have between four and five hundred; we take care of them all.

Chairman WALSH. And how is the amount determined? Is there a definite amount set apart for each widow, based upon the number of children that she has?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, yes; a very careful study is made, not only upon the widow and her condition, her ability to work, because some of them are able to work and earn something, and the number of children and upon the condition of their health, also—a very careful study is made of their food supply, so that they are instructed how the money shall be spent, in such and such kind of food; and they are required to keep a regular budget of their own and as to how they expend the money.

Chairman WALSH. Who passes upon the individuals that receive the benefits?

Mr. CUTTING. That is done by the officers of the association, the paid executives.

Chairman WALSH. Who are they?

Mr. CUTTING. They are Mr. B. D. Bullet, the general director; Mr. Matthews has the charge of what is called the family department. Those two are the ones who really study the pension question; Mr. Matthews more than anybody else.

Chairman WALSH. And does that gentleman pass on the amount that should be paid to the widows?

Mr. CUTTING. They report—

Chairman WALSH. The widows report?

Mr. CUTTING. They report always to the executive committee, at least they take an individual case which they study with great care, and after they have obtained all the information that is to be obtained they report that case, with their information, to the executive committee, which then decides whether or not this widow shall go upon the pension list.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have a great number of applications for such pensions, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, we have, as I say, four to five hundred widows, all of whom are receiving the pension.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would try and inform the commission if—first, as to the percentage of those who apply to receive the pension.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I do not know that any really apply to be put upon the pension list. I have not heard any ask to be put upon the pension list. That is a matter for our decision entirely. We study a case carefully and finally report to the executive committee and they then determine what should be done in the case.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would proceed now to the bureau of municipal research and give the contributors to that, and in detail the activities of the bureau of municipal research, together with its staff and equipment.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes. Well, now, the activities are those of cooperating with nearly all the departments of the city government, the finance department, the health department, the lease department, civil service commission, and I dare say there are several others.

Chairman WALSH. Does it operate outside of the city of New York?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; to some degree.

Chairman WALSH. Would you kindly state the cities in the Union, or the departments of any cities in the Nation, in which work is being done by the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. In which work has been done?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, I could not undertake to do that without going to the records, because there are a large number of cities.

Chairman WALSH. You can furnish us that?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I can furnish everything like that.

Chairman WALSH. Has its work extended to all the parts of the United States?

Mr. CUTTING. To all parts of the United States; yes.

Chairman WALSH. How large a staff have you?

Mr. CUTTING. The staff now, I think, is between 30 and 40.

Chairman WALSH. How is the staff organized? Who is director?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; there is a director, and then the others are all of his subordinates.

Chairman WALSH. How many trustees?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I might add also it conducts a training school at the head of which there is a separate director, the head of the training school.

Chairman WALSH. How many directors are there?

Mr. CUTTING. One.

Chairman WALSH. How many trustees are there of the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. I think there are 11.

Chairman WALSH. And how are they selected?

Mr. CUTTING. They are selected by ballot.

Chairman WALSH. How are the first ones selected?

Mr. CUTTING. Under the act of incorporation.

Chairman WALSH. And it had 11?

Mr. CUTTING. At that time I think not; no, I do not think it had 11. I think we had about that number.

Chairman WALSH. Is it a fact that under the incorporation laws of the State of New York, relating to philanthropic and educational corporations, that the number of the incorporators can be increased—

Mr. CUTTING. One minute—I am not a lawyer.

Chairman WALSH. Just a minute until we straighten this out. May a corporation created by general or special law of this State by vote of the majority of its members present at an annual meeting, or any special meeting called for that purpose, for that specific purpose and so specified in the notice of the said meeting, change the number of directors of the corporation?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not know, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have, in the practical operations of any organizations with which you have been connected, there been changes made in the number of directors and trustees?

Mr. CUTTING. Not that I remember.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please give first the amount of income of the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. You mean for the past year, or when?

Chairman WALSH. We will say for the past two or three years, enough to give us a general idea of its extent.

Mr. CUTTING. I can only give you a general idea. I am not accurately informed on the subject, but its income would average, I should say, for the past two or three years, about $70,000 a year; that is to say, for its local work.

Chairman WALSH. Please give the names of the contributors.

Mr. CUTTING. There are a large number of them.

Chairman WALSH. Well, the largest ones?

Mr. CUTTING. The largest ones for what particular year, because, of course, they change very much in the course of time.

Chairman WALSH. Say the last fiscal year?

Mr. CUTTING. The fiscal year ended on the 1st of October I take it?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, the largest contributor for that year—well, I am not sure whether I can say with absolute accuracy whether I can give it or not. I should have to look at the books to say.

Chairman WALSH. The names of the large contributors, then, without the amounts. That will be a little too much of a tax upon your memory I should say.

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, no; I think that the Rockefeller Foundation contributed more last year than I did. Mrs. Harriman is a large contributor—Mrs. E. H. Harriman.

Chairman WALSH. And any others that you can recall, large contributors, without undertaking to specify the amounts?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, there are a large number of contributors—up to last year the bureau was operated upon a subscription founded upon a five-year basis, which was reduced by 20 per cent a year, and among those who subscribed were J. P. Morgan & Co., Kuhn Loeb & Co., Thomas Speyer, Vanderbilt, Perkins, Guggenheim, and quite a number of others, Mr. Hopkins and Mr. Morawetz.

Chairman WALSH. Do any of its employees work part of the time with the municipality or with any municipality?

Mr. CUTTING. To some slight degree, yes; as for instance, they are now and have been—Philadelphia makes calls on us and the director goes over to Philadelphia and they pay him for the time occupied.

Chairman WALSH. How about the city of New York?

Mr. CUTTING. We receive nothing from the city of New York itself.

Chairman WALSH. When you do work in any other city?

Mr. CUTTING. The citizens of that city pay for it.

Chairman WALSH. You send the experts out, those that you have in your department, and the city pays for the work, or private individuals in the city?

Mr. CUTTING. It is not paid for by the city. It is paid for by private individuals living in that city.

Chairman WALSH. In any instances has the municipality called upon your people for work?

Mr. CUTTING. I think that is probably so. But I do not recall any such, if they have.

Chairman WALSH. Do they make reports from time to time?

Mr. CUTTING. You mean the cities?

Chairman WALSH. Does the organization itself, the bureau of municipal research, make public reports from time to time, as to the conduct of the business of the municipalities which they have investigated?

Mr. CUTTING. Those reports are always published.

Chairman WALSH. And they do make reports from time to time?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And these reports are critical, are they?

Mr. CUTTING. Always constructive.

Chairman WALSH. Critical and constructive?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do the reports deal with the subject of taxation by municipalities?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not believe we have touched that in any instance yet.

Chairman WALSH. Is it within the scope of the activities of the organization to do that?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I think probably it is within the scope, but the real object of the association, of the bureau, is to correct faults in administration, and it applies to that and administration and not to the resources from which the funds are drawn, but to the expenditure of funds.

Chairman WALSH. Has it in any case undertaken to indicate methods of taxation?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think the bureau has ever yet; not at all.

Chairman WALSH. Where can its objects be found?

Mr. CUTTING. What did you say?

Chairman WALSH. Where can its general objects be found?

Mr. CUTTING. In its publications.

Chairman WALSH. For instance, what publications?

Mr. CUTTING. I will send you a number of them, a whole lot of them, which will state the purposes.

Chairman WALSH. I want to get the name of one in which could be found its scope in the briefest presentation. What would that be? Would it be the annual report, or what?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think it was in any annual report. It was in the early publications, I think, which would show that. There were two publications, one of which was called "Six Years of Municipal Administration," or something of that kind.

Chairman WALSH. Is it an incorporated institution?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Under the general laws of New York?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In what way have there been through these organizations studies of labor problems, labor legislation, and questions such as workmen's compensation act and widows' pension, that is, from the Government, and the like?

Mr. CUTTING. We have not studied them at all.

Chairman WALSH. What position have you taken, have these organizations taken, at any time? Now, I am referring to all of them, because I am grouping them.

Mr. CUTTING. What did you say?

Chairman WALSH. What positions have these organizations taken with respect to compensation acts, workmen's insurance, widows' pensions, and the like?

Mr. CUTTING. They have not taken any attitude.

Chairman WALSH. What have the officers of the organization done?

Mr. CUTTING. The Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor, which, as I say, as far as pension fund, has made a statement that it would not oppose legislation which is now proposed in our State legislature. It has not gone far enough to indicate what it will do until it knows what form legislation itself is going to take. But it will not oppose the State itself taking the initiative in widows' pensions.

Chairman WALSH. Has it at any time opposed the State taking the initiative in widows' pensions?

Mr. CUTTING. My impression is that it did last year.

Chairman WALSH. Please state the ground of it.

Mr. CUTTING. The ground of it was that we at that time were only just commencing the widows' pension ourselves. It was a new thing with us, and we were engaged in testing it out. It was our hope that we should be able in time perhaps to secure a large enough fund from the public ourselves to be able to undertake the widows' pensions alone, without recourse to the State. We thought that we could do it better than the State could, which I still think we can do more satisfactorily than it could be done by the State. But we have arrived at the conclusion that the problem is too large for us entirely, and that we shall be unable to do it.

Chairman WALSH. When did you arrive at that conclusion, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I should say a few months ago.

Chairman WALSH. Did your opposition to the institution of a widows' pension system by the State manifest itself while the legislature was in session?

Mr. CUTTING. My impression is that we sent a representative to Albany last winter.

Chairman WALSH. Did you issue any publicity on the matter?

Mr. CUTTING. No, I do not think we did.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a widows' pension bill introduced in the New York Legislature last winter?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I am not very clear about that matter. There was a commission at that time operating, as you remember, that was collecting information upon that particular subject but I am not clear whether there was a bill introduced or whether we did oppose it or not. But that commission finished its labors and now has introduced a bill. I may be entirely wrong in stating that we ever opposed it at all. I was thinking that it had been—that there had been a bill introduced and there may have been.

Chairman WALSH. What did you say about your present attitude in regard to the matter, Mr. Cutting, with regard to the proposed legislation?

Mr. CUTTING. We are inclined to favor it if we can get a satisfactory bill, but I can not, of course, speak for the association. I am not its president now; but we have passed a resolution that we would not oppose it.

Chairman WALSH. What was the occasion of passing a resolution upon that particular bill?

Mr. CUTTING. We did not pass it upon any particular bill at all, but upon principle only.

Chairman WALSH. I mean upon a bill covering the particular subject matter of widows' pensions?

Mr. CUTTING. We did not act upon any particular bill at all. There are two bills up there. Only on the principle involved; only on the principle involved, that is all.

Chairman WALSH. That is what I was trying to get at.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; only the principle.

Chairman WALSH. How did it happen that you passed a resolution on that subject?

Mr. CUTTING. For the reason there was considerable pressure upon us to take an attitude, by those who were promoting the measure, and we felt that they were entitled to have our opinion.

Chairman WALSH. Did I understand you to say that you personally still believed that the work could be better and more scientifically done by the association than by the State?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, suppose you say more sympathetically done.

Chairman WALSH. More sympathetically done?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I do think so.

Chairman WALSH. You do not think the State could do it as well, and that the officials charged with the administration of the law would not have the sympathy that those persons connected with your organization might have?

Mr. CUTTING. We have been at it for over 70 years—since 1843.

Chairman WALSH. Was there any other ground than the fear of lack of sympathetic consideration in administration by the State?

Mr. CUTTING. Any other ground?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; any other ground for your belief?

Mr. CUTTING. No; only that we had a great deal of anxiety as to what would happen if the State took over the widows, all the widows in the State, as to whether or not there would not be a good deal of favoritism and if we were confident that we could secure the funds to carry on the widows ourselves, in New York City, we would fight the widows pension bill to the end, by the State.

Chairman WALSH. I did not get that.

Mr. CUTTING. We felt ourselves competent financially to take care of all the widows and small children who—that if we were competent financially to take care of all of them, we would fight an enactment by the State of a widows' pension bill. That is my personal opinion. I do not speak for the board, of course.

Chairman WALSH. Now, have you taken any position on workmen's compensation acts?

Mr. CUTTING. None at all.

Chairman WALSH. Do you find an appreciable amount of the dissatisfaction that you are called upon to deal with coming from industrial accidents and occupational diseases?

Mr. CUTTING. A good deal; not so much from occupational diseases as from accidents.

Chairman WALSH. Have you made a study of the conditions that might have a tendency to produce such a result?

Mr. CUTTING. You mean in factories?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Generally, have you made any study of that condition?

Mr. CUTTING. No; we have not made a study of the condition; that is, of course, one of the functions of the State.

Chairman WALSH. Have you inquired into the method with which the State deals with such questions?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I do not think that we have given much attention to that.

Chairman WALSH. If the widows' pension act passes, do you think the private agencies should be asked to make investigations?

Mr. CUTTING. Asked to make investigations?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; into the needs of the widows, or into the advisability of granting the pension?

Mr. CUTTING. You mean to have the State pay for the service, you mean as a voluntary act?

Chairman WALSH. Well, either way you may state it.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I do not think I believe very much in subsidies to private charities. It would have to be done as a voluntary act, and if the Association for Improving the Condition of the Poor undertook at the request of the State to visit all the widows who applied, it would swamp us, of course.

Chairman WALSH. The suggestion has been made by one of our staff that perhaps it is proposed by the charities societies that if such a bill should pass, a widows' pension bill should pass, that the private agencies should make the investigation. Is there such a position?

Mr. CUTTING. We have taken no position of that kind. The Association for the Improvement of the Poor—

Chairman WALSH. Have you in your capacity as trustee for these organizations made any study of the underlying grounds or of the underlying reasons for the condition of the persons whom you deal with?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, yes.

Chairman WALSH. To what extent has that been made?

Mr. CUTTING. It is made, of course, with every individual case, and then tabulated under various headings.

Chairman WALSH. Does it cover the question of compensation for labor as to the wages that are paid to them and the conditions under which they work?

Mr. CUTTING. No; it has not touched the question of wages.

Chairman WALSH. Has it touched the question of conditions of employment, say sanitary conditions and conditions of hygiene?

Mr. CUTTING. No; it has not touched either, because that was the function of the State. We do not interfere unless we have to. But we have tabulated under the various heads all the various causes, unemployment, and illness, accident, intemperance, everything that comes in except the fact of insufficient wages. I do not think we have a heading of insufficient wages. I am not quite sure whether we have that or not.

Chairman WALSH. Might that be a proper or time basis from which to approach both the questions of necessity and the cause for it?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I think it might.

Chairman WALSH. Has it ever been suggested to you as a trustee that that be done?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Has any suggestion ever been made upon any board of trustees of which you are a member that that should not be done?

Mr. CUTTING. That that should not be done?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. In connection with the question of insufficiency of wages?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. Never that I can remember.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think it would be feasible for directors to require statements regarding labor conditions and relations which would summarize briefly the facts as to safety provisions, sanitation, range of wages, presence of company stores property or saloons on company property, etc.?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, we have never made any study of that kind at all. All the rates of wages, of course, are all tabulated in the individual statement in every case, the rate of wages always ascertained.

Chairman WALSH. But suppose you receive quite a number of applications, say, from one industry, and there are kept upon cards, I assume, a card index or something of that kind?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And a very great number of cards would show insufficient wages was the cause; would your investigation take the breadth of ascertaining the conditions in that industry?

Mr. CUTTING. It could always, but I do not think that we had any volume of information bearing upon any trade that would lead us to indicate that the wages in that trade were insufficient.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that a private foundation, incorporated for benevolent purposes, should require current evidence regarding labor conditions in the corporations or securities which they hold?

Mr. CUTTING. If they had to do that I hardly see how they could conduct their business. I mean I think the trustees would have to turn them over to some employee.

Chairman WALSH. You think that the volume of information required would be too great to make it feasible?

Mr. CUTTING. That is my impression. I am not a member of any one of the great foundations.

Chairman WALSH. Well, outside of the amount of work involved, or the extent to which work would have to be done in that field, do you think it would be desirable to do so?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, it seems to me that the first thing to do for the trustees is to make the right kind of a man their executive officer, and then trust them.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with the work of the various principal foundations, such as those established by Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Carnegie, and Mrs. Sage?

Mr. CUTTING. I have only but a very limited information about any one of them.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that any safeguards are needed in the acts which incorporate foundations?

Mr. CUTTING. I should have liked to have seen the Rockefeller Foundation incorporated as they proposed it should have been incorporated by Congress. It seems to me a very wise provision that you remember provided for a number of the officials of the United States Government to be on the board. That struck me as being a very wise provision.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider the charter of the Rockefeller Foundation as granted by the State too broad?

Mr. CUTTING. I have never read it.

Chairman WALSH. In its powers?

Mr. CUTTING. I have never read it at all.

Chairman WALSH. I will read you a section, Mr. Cutting, first naming the incorporators: "Together with such persons as they may associate with themselves, and their successors, are hereby constituted a body corporate by the name of the Rockefeller Foundation, for the purpose of receiving and maintaining a fund or funds and applying the income and principal thereof to promote the well-being of mankind throughout the world. It shall be within the purposes of such corporation to use as means to that end research, publication, the establishment and maintenance of charitable, benevolent, religious, missionary, and public educational activities, agencies, and institutions, and the aid of any such activities, agencies, and institutions already established, and any other means and agencies which from time to time shall seem expedient to its members or trustees."

Would you say that was or was not too broad?

Mr. CUTTING. I should say it was not too broad.

Chairman WALSH. Or that any limitation should be imposed upon it?

Mr. CUTTING. I can not think of any just now. If there were some suggestions made to me I might think of some, but I can not think of any now.

Chairman WALSH. The proposed bill which passed the House of Representatives and which received a favorable report by the Senate committee but did not pass, contained the following provisions:

"Congress specifically reserves the right to impose such limitations upon the objects of the corporation as it may deem the public interest demands."

Mr. CUTTING. Is that in the act of incorporation?

Chairman WALSH. That was the amendment made by the Peters bill. Do you believe that is a wise provision?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. For the lawmaking body to make?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. "The total amount of property held at any time, whether absolutely or in trust, is limited to $100,000,000."

Do you believe that was a wise and proper provision for a lawmaking body to insert?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think there is anything in that either.

Chairman WALSH. "The income of the property is not to be accumulated or added to the principal, but is to be currently applied to the objects of the corporation."

Do you believe that to have been a wise provision?

Mr. CUTTING. I think that within some limitations, yes. I would not have demanded that every penny be spent at the end of the year, but if toward the end of the year they had not found the proper means of using it, so far as it was carried over, I would make that period two or three years, I should say that they should dispose of all surplus income.

Chairman WALSH. "The corporation is empowered to distribute the principal of any property 50 years after its receipt; it is required to make such distribution after 100 years, if Congress shall so direct."

Do you believe that was a wise or proper limitation?

Mr. CUTTING. That is a section I do not see any virtue in.

Chairman WALSH. "The elections of new members of the corporation is subject to disapproval within 60 days by the four Federal officers and five university presidents specified in the bill."

Do you recall what the specification was in the bill?

Mr. CUTTING. I have forgotten.

Chairman WALSH. AS to the officers. It was the President of the United States, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, the President of the Senate, the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and the presidents of Harvard, Yale, Columbia, Johns Hopkins, and the Chicago University.

Mr. CUTTING. I think that is a wise provision.

Chairman WALSH. That the following amendment also was incorporated in the grant, the inserting of the words, "by eleemosynary and philanthropic means."

Do you believe it was wise to put that limitation upon it?

Mr. CUTTING. I think that is pretty good; yes. I do not remember that.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe that it was necessary to limit it, so that it might not go into a business activity or real estate activity?

Mr. CUTTING. I should say that that was a wise provision.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe it is a necessary provision?

Mr. CUTTING. I would not think so, but I think it is wise.

Chairman WALSH. "That the minimum number of members of the corporation should be increased from five to nine, and that in that event of the number of members falling below nine the corporation is forbidden to make any gifts until the vacancies are filled."

Do you believe that that was a wise provision?

Mr. CUTTING. That seems to be wise, too; yes.

Chairman WALSH. What suggestion would you make regarding publicity of the work done by foundations, if any?

Mr. CUTTING. I think it ought to be. I think they ought to be required to publish annual reports.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that foundations should publish the number and character of applications not favorably acted upon, not giving the names, but the number and character of the applications?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not see any particular virtue in that.

Chairman WALSH. So that the public might know whether or not it was discriminating against any class, for instance, or against persons in a particular industry in which the trustees were also directors or such matters as that? I merely suggest that as one of the reasons that might be given.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not see any objection to it at all.

Chairman WALSH. Do you not think it would be well to do that?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I think it is rather trifling. I do not think myself there is any virtue, but I see no objection to it if there was the number given.

Chairman WALSH. Do you feel that the records of foundations should be open to public examination similar to such restrictions as govern public examination of official records in New York City?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, that is a question that I would want to think of a little bit. I do not know really whether or not there may be in dealing in the work of the foundation a good deal of a delicate nature—I mean in dealing with individuals, or with institutions—that would not want this sort of help they get acknowledged, but I do not know that that would be necessary.

Chairman WALSH. Under what circumstances do you consider that foundations—under what circumstances, if any, do you consider that very large foundations might become a menace to government or to industry or to the general cause of education?

Mr. CUTTING. I could readily conceive that, of course, there might—I do—if that got into the hands of narrow-minded men; I can conceive that anything that they might do—

Chairman WALSH. If a very large foundation got into the hands of narrow-minded men, or, of course, men of anything less than very lofty purposes?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that these large foundations should be subject to current inspection on the part of State or national bodies?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not see why they should.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see any objection to such a course of conduct on the part of the Government?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I do not think there is any objection to it at all.

Chairman WALSH. If so, to what bodies would you give the right of inspecting the foundations' records, and in New York such as the Rockefeller Foundation, the General Education Board, the Carnegie Foundation for Advancement of Teaching, and the Carnegie Corporation?

Mr. CUTTING. I really do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Have you ever thought of that?

Mr. CUTTING. Never; no.

Chairman WALSH. Which of the organizations of which you are a trustee has received funds from the following sources: Carnegie Foundation?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think any institution with which I am connected.

Chairman WALSH. The Russell Sage Foundation?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think of any institution.

Chairman WALSH. The General Education Board?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think of any.

Chairman WALSH. The Rockefeller Foundation?

Mr. CUTTING. The Rockefeller Foundation, as I have already stated, the Association for the Improvement of the Condition of the Poor and the bureau of municipal research.

Chairman WALSH. How much money has the Rockefeller Foundation given to the bureau of municipal research altogether?

Mr. CUTTING. I should have to figure it up. I can give you all those details exactly.

Chairman WALSH. You could not approximate it offhand?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, there would have been gifts from time to time, so that I might refer to some memorandum I have I brought along with me, and perhaps that will help me to do so. Well, I should say, as far as I can make out with my additions here, a little less than $100,000, which would not include $30,000 that is provided for the investigation of the police department by the current committee of the lawmaking body, which money was dispensed through the bureau of municipal research.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have in mind any instances in which public employees or officials have been discharged or removed from office growing out of the criticism made by the reports of that organization of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What department?

Mr. CUTTING. The Borough of Manhattan, Mr. Ahearn, discharged for that reason very largely, and to the publication of a report from his department.

Chairman WALSH. Any others?

Mr. CUTTING. Commissioner, or rather the president of the Borough of The Bronx—Haffen—was removed, and that was through the agency of the commissioner of accounts with whom the bureau cooperated.

Chairman WALSH. Any employees or officers of any municipal corporation outside of the city of New York?

Mr. CUTTING. I really could not recall and tell you now.

Chairman WALSH. The statement was made last summer that the Rockefeller Foundation had in addition given money to be spent by officers of the bureau as trustees although not given directly to the board of trustees of the bureau.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not recall that.

Chairman WALSH. If you have any knowledge of any such condition.

Mr. CUTTING. I did not remember anything of that kind at all to be expended as trustees or—

Chairman WALSH. That did not go into the bureau as a whole?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not know of any such instance.

Chairman WALSH. Did the General Education Board, the Rockefeller Education Board, ever make a study of the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. Ever make a study of it?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. They have been familiar with it from its inception.

Chairman WALSH. And did they ever make a specific study of it?

Mr. CUTTING. Of the whole bureau?

Chairman WALSH. Of the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think they ever did. They made a study of its educational activities.

Chairman WALSH. Of the board of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. That bureau asked the General Education Board to make a study, did it?

Mr. CUTTING. I think that one of the directors of the bureau did.

Chairman WALSH. What director?

Mr. CUTTING. Dr. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. Did you, as an officer of the bureau, see a copy of the General Education Board's report?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Did you read it?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Do you consider its conclusions sound?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Why not?

Mr. CUTTING. I thought it was too superficial.

Chairman WALSH. You thought it was superficial?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Does the bureau—did the bureau make answer to the General Education Board?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And you, as chairman, prepared the bureau's answer, did you not?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Would you kindly summarize for the commission the answer sent by the bureau to the General Education Board's report?

Mr. CUTTING. It consisted almost entirely of opinions of the value of the work of the bureau as they were submitted by the representative men in various cities in which the bureau had worked.

Chairman WALSH. Did you send copies of bureau's answer to the press?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Was the bureau's answer presented to the board of directors of the bureau?

Mr. CUTTING. It was.

Chairman WALSH. And read aloud to them so that they were familiar with its contents?

Mr. CUTTING. It was.

Chairman WALSH. Was the bureau's answer given to any newspaper whatsoever?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. The General Education Board's reply was given to the newspapers, was it not?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Why was not the report published, and were there any steps taken so far as you know to prevent its publication?

Mr. CUTTING. It was intended by the General Education Board as a private—for private circulation among its own members only, and it was regarded by them as a private document.

Chairman WALSH. Has the General Education Board replied to the bureau's answer?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Is it true that the General Education Board's report was submitted to the bureau of municipal research in March, and the reply submitted to the General Education Board early in April, and that the gift to the bureau from the Rockefeller Foundation came toward the end of June or the beginning of July, 1914?

Mr. CUTTING. I dare say that those are approximately the dates. I can not recall that exactly.

Chairman WALSH. That statement is correct so far as you know?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I think it is. I do not know the date any amount was received from the foundation, and I can not recall it.

Chairman WALSH. Do you understand that John D. Rockefeller, jr., is a member of the General Education Board, of its executive committee; a member of the Rockefeller Foundation and its executive committee?

Mr. CUTTING. I believe so, but I am not familiar with the organization.

Chairman WALSH. Do you understand also that Mr. Starr J. Murphy is a member of the General Education Board and the Rockefeller Foundation and of the respective executive committees?

Mr. CUTTING. I really do not know. I do not know anything about the organization of those bodies at all, but I dare say he is.

Chairman WALSH. Do you remember that while the board of trustees of the bureau of municipal research were reading aloud the General Education Board's report on the bureau, an invitation was received from Mr. Rockefeller by telephone, and that this invitation asked two of the trustees of the bureau of municipal research to meet Mr. Rockefeller at lunch two or three days later?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not recall that. It may have been at any time, but I do not recall the time when the invitation came at all.

Chairman WALSH. Do you recall there was such an invitation?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. To which trustee of the bureau did this invitation come?

Mr. CUTTING. It came to me, and it came to Mr. Victor Morawetz.

Chairman WALSH. The Rockefeller Foundation has written to this commission that at this time Mr. Morawetz was a member of a special committee appointed by the foundation. Did you know of this in April when you received the message through Mr. Morawetz from Mr. Rockefeller?

Mr. CUTTING. He was a member of the committee of the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Let me read it over again, because it is a question submitted, and I am reading a written question. I did not get it up myself. It was gotten up by a member of our staff.

"The Rockefeller Foundation has written to this commission that at this time Mr. Morawetz was a member of a special committee appointed by the foundation. Did you know this in April when you received the message through Mr. Morawetz from Mr. Rockefeller?"

Mr. CUTTING. I did not know at any time that Mr. Morawetz had any connection with the Rockefeller Foundation.

Chairman WALSH. Can you tell whether the other trustees of the bureau of municipal research knew this fact at the time?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not know anything about it.

Chairman WALSH. Did you accept the invitation and meet Mr. Rockefeller two days later at luncheon?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Who else was in the party?

Mr. CUTTING. I think Mr. Starr J. Murphy.

Chairman WALSH. So the party consisted of Rockefeller, Murphy, Morawetz, and yourself?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Was the purpose of the meeting to discuss the General Education Board's report to the bureau?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. What was the purpose?

Mr. CUTTING. I would like to read a memorandum in regard to that.

Chairman WALSH. Very good.

Mr. CUTTING. If you do not mind. It was thought it might be inquired about, and I put my recollection down on paper: "In the spring of 1914 Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., invited Mr. Victor Morawetz and myself to lunch with him and Mr. Flexner of the General Education Board." That is a mistake. He was not at the meeting. Mr. Flexner was not at the first lunch that we had.

Chairman WALSH. He was not?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. Flexner was not there. It was Mr. Starr J. Murphy. When we met, Mr. Rockefeller inquired with reference to the financial status of the New York Bureau of Municipal Research. He was informed that the five-year pledges which had maintained the bureau's work expired with 1914. He then expressed his warm interest in the bureau's local work and said that he would like to contribute for its continuance in 1915, but he said that he did not approve of the practice of the bureau of undertaking work outside of the State of New York for compensation, nor the action of the directors of the bureau in undertaking to deal with the strictly pedagogical problems involved in the management of the public schools. He stated that as he felt that these activities of the bureau were prejudicial to its usefulness as a local institution he was not disposed to contribute to the fund of the bureau so long as these activities were continued.

The views expressed by Mr. Rockefeller were those already entertained by Mr. Morawetz and me and by several other members of the board of trustees. For several years members of the board had been much disturbed on account of controversies which had arisen in consequence of the activity of Dr. Allen, one of its directors, in connection with the management of the schools in New York City. Certain members of the board had indeed resigned because of their disapproval of the participation of Dr. Allen in pedagogical controversies, the bureau's original purpose being to confine itself to administrative matters and to seek from specialists the expert knowledge required by the city in dealing with technical questions. Whether right or wrong, upon the issues involved Dr. Allen's methods for promoting the adoption of his views were objectionable to the trustees and had completely alienated from the bureau some of its warmest friends and supporters.

I had several times reasoned with Dr. Allen and attempted to show him the inexpediency of the policy he was pursuing, and finally I had to request him to make no more public utterances in the pedagogical conflict which was going on.

The board of trustees of the bureau had also been discussing during the preceding year the advisability of separating the work of the bureau outside of New York from the New York work and of organizing an independent corporation to carry out the work outside of New York. Several plans for the accomplishment of this purpose had actually been formulated and laid before the trustees for their consideration.

Therefore when Mr. Rockefeller expressed the views which he did he found them entirely in harmony with those of Mr. Morawetz and myself.

At the next meeting of the board of trustees a report was made of the proposal of Mr. Rockefeller, and as it was found that members of the board were in entire agreement with Mr. Rockefeller in the views expressed by him his substantial offer of cooperation for 1915 was welcomed.

Chairman WALSH. One minute right at that point. What was the offer of cooperation?

Mr. CUTTING. He said he was glad to propose $20,000 for the year 1915.

"However, the board felt that as a matter of principle it would be unwise for it to accept gifts subject to any condition which might restrict their freedom of action or future activities of the bureau."

Chairman WALSH. Was the contribution made?

Mr. CUTTING. It was made later on in the year; yes. It was made for 1914. It was made in 1914 after it was found that the bureau's activities might be supplemented in New York if it had funds for that year, so it was made in 1914.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know what the purpose of the meeting was—that lunch—before you attended?

Mr. CUTTING. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Did you know that the purpose of the meeting was to discuss the General Education Board's report to the bureau and the bureau's answers?

Mr. CUTTING. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. Was the meeting upon your initiative or Mr. Rockefeller's?

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. Rockefeller's.

Chairman WALSH. Had Mr. Rockefeller read the bureau's answer?

Mr. CUTTING. He had received the answer that morning, but whether he had read it or not I can not say.

Chairman WALSH. Did you gather that he had personally read the General Education Board's report?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I have gathered it from what he said, although we did not discuss it. We did not discuss the report at any length at all.

Chairman WALSH. What proportion of the luncheon time was given to the discussion of the General Education Board's report and the bureau's answer?

Mr. CUTTING. Very little.

Chairman WALSH. Sir?

Mr. CUTTING. Very little.

Chairman WALSH. Was the most of the time, then, given to discussing the bureau's finances?

Mr. CUTTING. The bureau's finances and its activities.

Chairman WALSH. Did Mr. Rockefeller at this time make suggestions as to the work the bureau should do and the way it should be done?

Mr. CUTTING. No; except those that I have enumerated in this manuscript.

Chairman WALSH. Were suggestions made by Mr. Rockefeller that were later embodied in a formal notice to the trustees of the bureau of municipal research in order that the trustees might know of them in advance of a board meeting?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Chairman WALSH. Were the suggestions that were made by Mr. Rockefeller at that meeting put in writing?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; they were put in writing; yes.

Chairman WALSH. Have you those written suggestions in your files, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly submit a copy of them to the commission?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. How much was Mr. Rockefeller giving to the bureau of municipal research at that time?

Mr. CUTTING. In 1904 he was giving $1,000.

Chairman WALSH. Please summarize Mr. Rockefeller's proposal regarding the scope, form of organization, and method of the bureau of municipal research.

Mr. CUTTING. He never made any special expression of opinion upon the subject.

Chairman WALSH. I will ask you if his proposal contained the following suggestions: (1) Discontinue school work in New York City.

Mr. CUTTING. Not in that language; I am quite sure not.

Chairman WALSH. Well, in any language?

Mr. CUTTING. I am quite sure he never asked at any time to have the bureau discontinue the school work. He did object to the technical pedagogical interference of the bureau—I won't say interference, but its activities; activities which, as I have stated, were very objectionable to the trustees.

Chairman WALSH. Just indicate what you mean by the technical pedagogical work.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I mean the curriculum of the schools, the method of instruction.

Chairman WALSH. He objected to that?

Mr. CUTTING. He objected to that; yes.

Chairman WALSH. At this luncheon?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; at his luncheon.

Chairman WALSH. Was that written down?

Mr. CUTTING. I have a copy of the data.

Chairman WALSH. And that will be contained, whatever it was, in that?

Mr. CUTTING. That is the only memorandum there is.

Mr. WALSH. I will ask you if another of Mr. Rockefeller's proposals was to discontinue the bureau's current publicities through postal cards, weekly bulletins, and so forth?

Mr. CUTTING. He made no condition of that kind at all.

Chairman WALSH. Did he object during that conversation to the bureau issuing current publications, postal cards, and weekly bulletins?

Mr. CUTTING. No; he did not object. He did object to the form of a good many things, the form of which had been objectionable to the trustees.

Chairman WALSH. Is that suggestion as to the form of the publicity—bulletins and postal cards—contained in the letter that you are to submit to us?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think that there is any reference made to it at all, if I remember correctly.

Chairman WALSH. Did he object to separate training schools from the bureau?

Mr. CUTTING. Did he object to a separate training school—object to it?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. That would imply that it was operating a training school; therefore, no.

Chairman WALSH. Was there one projected?

Mr. CUTTING. No. There is a school that was part of the bureau's work, a training school.

Chairman WALSH. I believe you have already stated that he objected to any out-of-town work being done by the bureau?

Mr. CUTTING. He thought it was unwise; yes; inexpedient.

Chairman WALSH. And prior to that time you had been doing outside work in the municipalities of the United States?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. Covering in its general scope the whole country?

Mr. CUTTING. The trustees had determined to discontinue it as a part of the bureau's work and to organize it as a separate organization.

Chairman WALSH. Did you at this time consider the proposals—the objections—of Mr. Rockefeller as objections on the proposed gift of $20,000?

Mr. CUTTING. They were such, of course.

Chairman WALSH. They were such?

Mr. CUTTING. Inasmuch as I have already stated the objections of Mr. Rockefeller were those held by the trustees, there was no objection implied to it at all.

Chairman WALSH. And they were objections; they were the views of the board. If they had not been the views of the trustees you would not have gotten the money?

Mr. CUTTING. Would not have gotten the money.

Chairman WALSH. And the trustees discussed them as conditions, did they not?

Mr. CUTTING. I can not recall really how the discussion ran, but it was the one meeting we had.

Chairman WALSH. Then you passed a vote that you would not accept the money upon conditions?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. When did you pass that vote with reference to the time that this luncheon was had in which the finances of the institution were discussed with Mr. Rockefeller and this promise of $20,000 made?

Mr. CUTTING. It was made some time after that, of course.

Chairman WALSH. How shortly after that?

Mr. CUTTING. I can give you the record, but I really do not know.

Chairman WALSH. Could you approximate it within a week or a month, or how long after?

Mr. CUTTING. I should say within a month or so.

Chairman WALSH. And the vote was unanimous, you say?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And has the board continued its work in connection with the New York public schools?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think it is doing anything in the public schools now; I do not know; I am not quite sure.

Chairman WALSH. As a matter of fact it thereafter discontinued its work in connection with the New York public schools?

Mr. CUTTING. It did. I do not think that at that time it was doing any work in connection with public schools at all. The only work being done in connection with public schools was being done on his own initiative by one of the directors.

Chairman WALSH. Did he cease doing that work afterwards?

Mr. CUTTING. He went at that time to the West.

Chairman WALSH. He went out West?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. So there was no more work of that kind done?

Mr. CUTTING. I am quite sure at that time the bureau itself as an institution was not taking any part whatsoever.

Chairman WALSH. Who was the trustee who was doing the work, and who afterwards went out West?

Mr. CUTTING. Dr. Allen.

Chairman WALSH. Has the bureau itself continued its publicity through postal cards and weekly bulletins?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes. It is not doing it that way, but it is now issuing a monthly—more in the shape of a magazine—a larger publication.

Chairman WALSH. Did the magazine contain the same subject matter—same general subject matter—as the postal cards and bulletins that were sent out prior to the luncheon of which you have testified?

Mr. CUTTING. It differentiates from that very decidedly.

Chairman WALSH. Very different from what you were doing at that time?

Mr. CUTTING. Very different, indeed. That was exceedingly objectionable to the bureau trustees.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock wishes to ask you some questions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I understood from your testimony, Mr. Cutting, that organized labor was opposing industrial training?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, did it change its attitude and favor it?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; as far as doing it by public authority, and not private. It still retains its opposition, I think, to privately maintained enterprises.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, its present attitude does, as you understand it, oppose private industrial training, but does not oppose the public industrial training.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes. I think on the occasion of the convention of the federation of labor in Denver about three years ago, it took the position that it was not opposed to it when conducted by public institutions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know, and can you tell us if you know, why they differentiate as between private and public industrial training efforts?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, one reason, I suppose, was that they saw industrial training was coming, and they knew they should not oppose it. I know of no other reason. I am not in their counsel.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But why should they differentiate between private industrial training and public industrial training?

Mr. CUTTING. It may be on account of the prejudice involved and thinking perhaps that it was intended to supply strike breakers. That may have been one of the reasons.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, is there any good reason that you know of, Mr. Cutting, why industrial training should not be carried on by the State in the place of private beneficence?

Mr. CUTTING. None at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the State would undertake to do it, would your society oppose it in any way?

Mr. CUTTING. Not at all; in no way.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would be willing to retire from the field if the State would perform that function?

Mr. CUTTING. That is the fact.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are only waiting for State action?

Mr. CUTTING. That is all. There was an objection, I think, in connection with the question of the method of apprenticeship.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Are those connected with your societies making any effort to get the State to introduce vocational training?

Mr. CUTTING. No; we have not done anything in that respect at all. It is coming slowly under the board of education now.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you have taken no action either for or against it?

Mr. CUTTING. I heartily approve of it myself.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of course you, in common with the rest of us, I take it, Mr. Cutting, realize that one thing that adds to value is scarcity?

Mr. CUTTING. Undoubtedly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If, for example, gold was as abundant as iron is and iron as scarce as gold now is, their values would be reversed; and that one reason why mere muscle, pure and simple, is of less value than skilled labor is because muscle is more abundant than skilled labor. Now, suppose the situation should be reversed, Mr. Cutting. Suppose by virtue of vocational training throughout the public schools that there should be an oversupply of skilled labor and an undersupply of unskilled labor, would not the wage rate be likely to change?

Mr. CUTTING. It would seem likely that would be the case, but yet that has not been the experience with Germany, which has gone further than any other country, and where apparently the wage rate has not been reduced at all; but that is a country of industrial training.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is that not because in Germany production has increased even more rapidly than the number of graduates of their technical schools? That if they had gone on turning out as many trained hands as they have turned out in the last 20 years, and production had remained where it was 20 years ago, there would be a surplus of skilled labor?

Mr. CUTTING. Undoubtedly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But that has not happened in Germany, because production has even kept ahead of the number of skilled workers?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, from what you know of industrial conditions in this country, Mr. Cutting, do you think that there is any danger—any proximate danger—of even having an oversupply of skilled labor?

Mr. CUTTING. I think it is a long distance ahead yet. I know that every spring vast numbers of artisans come over here from the other side.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Trained workers?

Mr. CUTTING. Trained workers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Skilled workers?

Mr. CUTTING. Skilled workers, and they spend the whole summer over here, and spend enough money to come over and go back, and take just so much money out of the pockets of the untrained Americans who ought to be trained to do that work.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Your opinion, then, I take it, is that so long as we are obliged to import skilled workers from abroad to supply the demand, there is no danger of oversupply of skilled workers being suffered in this country?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; and I meant to have with me to-day the number of those who came over last spring. I always get it from the office, but I have not got it here.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I have never had the opportunity of analyzing the immigration to this country, but I was under the impression that comparatively few skilled workers came from abroad, and that those who came were largely persons—

Mr. CUTTING (interrupting). We get a good many of those.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do get a good many of those?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Of skilled workers?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From the cities of Europe?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; in all trades.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And that in itself is an evidence that we have an undersupply of skilled workers?

Mr. CUTTING. It would seem so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So you have no fears of our overdoing it?

Mr. CUTTING. Not for a long time yet. These men have what is called international union cards which permits them to work anywhere, and the young American who wishes to learn a trade is shut out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You say if he wants to learn a trade he is shut out?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. By whom?

Mr. CUTTING. By the unions.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. By the unions, on account of their apprenticeship limitations?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, that point was raised, Mr. Cutting, while we had a representative of organized labor on the stand, I don't recall just where, whether in Washington or in Chicago, and the answer made was this: That as a rule the employers are taken into consultation when the question is being determined as to how many apprentices should be allowed; and that in many instances employers did not avail themselves of the limit placed by organized labor on apprentices; that they employed even less than the trades-union laws permitted; and that therefore the claim that American boys would be admitted into American trade is, like Mark Twain's death, grossly exaggerated. Now, do you know anything to the contrary?

Mr. CUTTING. I only know that, for instance, we get 500 or 600 young men in our New York Trade School who come from all sections of the United States, and who when they have had four months of seven hours a day have acquired a good deal more skill at their trade than the ordinary journeyman. True they have not yet got the flexibility of wrist and the strength of forearm that they will get through working a year, but with four months vocational training and a year's practice they are more competent than the average journeyman. Yet when those young men complete the course and come out and want to get into the union they can not get a helper's card.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Is there any allowance made on the part of the union for technical training? Is not the apprenticeship lessened by the trades-union on that account?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, the apprenticeship training is from four to five years, and during the first year a young man is not allowed to even touch a tool.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, here are two lads who come to a trade-union, one graduated from a technical school and the other not; are both required to serve the same period of apprenticeship, or does the trades-union give an allowance for the technical training?

Mr. CUTTING. It makes absolutely no allowance at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. It does not?

Mr. CUTTING. None at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. So they put no value on the technical training?

Mr. CUTTING. None at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you ever been able to ascertain the reason for trades-unions taking that attitude toward the graduates of technical schools?

Mr. CUTTING. Only to limit the number of those who went into the trades. That is what the law on apprenticeship is for, that for two years the young man is kept merely in the position of an unskilled laborer, and is not allowed to use the tools in the ordinary trade.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, if that is so, Mr. Cutting, what incentive is there for a lad to enter your technical schools?

Mr. CUTTING. There is not much. I mean there is not much with reference to the large cities; but there are a large number of these young men who take this training that come from other sections of the country where the unions are not as strong as in New York, and they go back to their homes or back into the country where the unions are not so strong, and then they come back to New York City with a union card.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then they really have to invade trade-unionism?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; they all try to join the unions as soon as they can.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you think trade-unionism is justified in taking this attitude?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think it is, but at the same time I do appreciate the standpoint of the unions. Many of the men in them are along in years and have families, have children dependent upon them, and they argue they have to take care of themselves and say, "Why should we encourage young men to take the bread out of our mouths?" At the same time I do not think that society at large ought to encourage it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, then, you think that the trade-unionist is very much like the rest of us in being absolutely opposed to monopolies except our own?

Mr. CUTTING. Exactly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you overcome that situation?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, in the first place, I think, of course, it is one of the by-products of the closed shop. I do not believe in the closed shop a bit.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not believe in the closed shop?

Mr. CUTTING. No.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What are your objections to the closed shop?

Mr. CUTTING. Will you allow me to read a few words I have here?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. CUTTING. "I thoroughly believe in trades-unionism. So long as we lack real cooperation between employer and employed it is necessary for the protection of the wage earner. I do not, however, believe in the closed-shop policy, and for their own sakes I hope the unions will soon come to discern its dangers. I am persuaded that this same policy under different names has appeared in nearly every phase of society in every age, and that its temporary success invariably demoralizes those who adopt it. It is discoverable in commerce, in industry, in politics, and in religion. In the last two it has been particularly mischievous. In politics we call it 'the machine,' and it all tends to create dependence upon the party lash rather than on party merit.

"In religion it is sometimes called 'orthodoxy,' and it has too often led religious organizations to treat their 'open-shop' members as unions treat nonunion workmen. In industry its success can only lead to the deterioration in the value to society of the tradesman as a producer and a citizen. With the closed shop in successful operation he does not need merit to assure his employment, for he can limit the supply of skilled labor. In this city several unions have adopted the expedient of high initiation fees to keep down their numbers, and, as you probably know, the term of apprenticeship is arbitrarily fixed at from four to five years in order to increase the difficulty in entering a trade. At the same time the number of apprentices is rigidly restricted. In the electrical journeyman's trade employers are only permitted 1 apprentice to every 10 journeymen. In the plumbing trade the number of helpers in the shop can not exceed the number of journeymen. After two years he has to pass an examination before a joint committee of employers and journeymen. If he passes he becomes an 'improver,' and is at liberty to get any wages he can secure from his employer, but without help from the union. After two years more he becomes a journeyman. During 1914 only 16 helpers became improvers. In the sheet-metal workers' trade only one apprentice is allowed for every four men. In the marble-cutters' trade one apprentice is allowed in every shop and one additional to every five extra cutters, carvers, and setters employed until the number of apprentices reaches 10, which is the limit. In this trade the apprentice's pay is $4.60 a week the first year and rises until it gets to $2 a day for the fourth year. The carpenters only allow 1 apprentice for every 10 journeymen; the same conditions apply in the industry of metal-covered doors and windows and elevator manufacture.

"It is perfectly possible for a young man to perfect himself as a journeyman by a trade-school training of four months, seven hours a day, and a year's experience as a helper. He is, however, denied a union helper's card in this city, no matter how great his proficiency.

"Whether the tradesmen who take the civil-service examination in this city are representative or not I do not know, but their measure of capacity is not very creditable to American tradesmanship. We have every year a large immigration of foreign tradesmen who readily secure employment and find it profitable to travel across the ocean and back in the autumn with earnings that ought to go into the pockets of home industrials. Certain it is that the closed-shop policy and the limited membership in the union result in deterring our young men from learning trades. Many of them unquestionably drop out during their apprenticeship, discouraged with the difficulties and the unnecessary delay in acquiring a trade. For the first two years of the apprenticeship in some trades they are not even allowed to handle tools.

"As long as these by-products of the closed shop continue in this city our expectations of the value to industrialism of trade instruction will not be realized. Indeed, I do not believe that our recently opened vocational public schools have attained to the popularity that we anticipated. I think that a statistical inquiry should also be promptly started by the board of education to discover, as far as possible, how many of the youths who would take trade instructions actually reach the ranks of journeymen.

"That many tradesmen are now out of employment does not, in my opinion, indicate a continuous oversupply of labor. I am persuaded that building enterprise is suffering from a rate of wages in some trades that has defeated its own ends. I am sure I am glad to have wage earners enjoy as large an income as possible, but I believe that the bricklayers' wage of $5.60 per day has gone far to make building so unprofitable as to partially paralyze the industry, and I think he will make more money annually from the increased activity in the trade if he were receiving $4.50 a day instead of $5.60.

"At the present moment I believe we can start a building boom if bricklayers, carpenters, plumbers, ironworkers, stonecutters, and steam fitters would agree to cut their wages 15 per cent for the next 12 months.

"In expressing my views about the closed shop, I am not inappreciate about the viewpoint of the wage earner. To him the immediate personal advantage is the great desideratum, and this the closed shop seems to promise, but that this policy should be encouraged by employers seems to me to be most shortsighted and positively demoralizing."

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You spoke of certain unions that fixed the high initiation fees in order to discourage membership and in order to create a monopoly. Can you state any specific instances, for the information of the commission, of unions which have established those initiation fees?

Mr. CUTTING. I think they all have an initiation fee of at least $50, and some as high as $100.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Fifty dollars is the minimum?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In practically all trades?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I think so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In the building trades?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes, sir. It is true that sometimes they let the bars down to the extent that a young man can pay $10 down and $10 a month. My impression is that a large number of our young men, who are about as fine a class of Americans as is to be found in the country, 95 per cent of them being American born, jump out because they find they can not get employment in their trades on account of the unions, and thus lose the benefits of the education they have acquired; and I think our public schools are going to suffer from that same thing; and it seems to me that some inquiry should be instituted right away to see how many graduates of our vocational schools become journeymen.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The inference of your statement is that trade-unionism is not—stands not only for the closed shop but for the closed union?

Mr. CUTTING. That is a by-product of the closed shop. It could not happen with the open shop.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Would you object to the closed shop if there was an open union? If all decent, respectable men were admitted into the union on a small initiation fee, with small weekly dues, would you then object to the closed shop?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think that the closed shop could exist without the other; I think it is the foundation of all the other. We have a union known as a preferential union among the cloak makers that was the open shop, and it is the most successful union in the city. It has no initiation fee.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I do not understand that the preferential union has the open shop. What I understand by preferential union was as explained by Mr. Brandeis.

Mr. CUTTING. I should perhaps not have spoken of open shop, but there was absolutely no initiation fee. Anyone can join the union, and so far as preference is concerned it can not demand that its members alone shall be supplied. If they can not supply them, they may go outside.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What I understand it to be in the cloak trade is that the employer agrees to give the unionist preference and will employ non-unionists only when a unionist is not available?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But if the unionists are available, it becomes practically a closed shop?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; only the employer has the right at any time to discharge anybody who has no merit, and they employ people with merit.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you understand that under the closed-shop plan the employer has a right—the privilege to discharge an incompetent man?

Mr. CUTTING. In the steam fitters' trade he does not have anything to say about the employment of his helpers—the union employer—and he has to pay them $3 a day.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Regardless of merit?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I suppose for bad behavior he is thrown out.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If the workman is inefficient, he can not discharge him?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not say that he can not discharge him, but he has to take the man, whether efficient or inefficient, certified by the union; he has no voice in that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all, Mr. Cutting.

Chairman WALSH. Prof. Commons would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. Apparently the impression one would get from your answer is that this donation of Mr. Rockefeller's to the Rockefeller Foundation was the influence which changed very fundamentally the policy of the bureau of municipal research with reference to three or four points.

Mr. CUTTING. That is a mistake. I do not think I said that, Prof. Commons.

Commissioner COMMONS. What I want to get at is this: Has any public statement been made to the effect that his influence or the influence of the Rockefeller Foundation was used for that purpose?

Mr. CUTTING. Has any statement of that kind been made?

Commissioner COMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I rather think it was made by Mr. Allen yesterday, if I remember rightly.

Commissioner COMMONS. At what time was such a statement made?

Mr. CUTTING. I think at a time when his term of office had ended with the bureau.

Commissioner COMMONS. When was that?

Mr. CUTTING. That was after the expiration of his fiscal year; I think about the first meeting in October.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you remember what the charge was he made?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I have forgotten, but I think it appeared in a letter he made public. He offered his resignation at that time.

Commissioner COMMONS. Was any reply made by you or the board of the bureau of municipal research?

Mr. CUTTING. At that time?

Commissioner COMMONS. Yes.

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think any.

Commissioner COMMONS. You have stated here that you had determined upon a policy practically the same as that which Mr. Rockefeller approved of at some time prior.

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Had you ever, as a board, approved the policy which Mr. Allen was conducting, which you then changed?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I do not think at any time at all. The fact is, that I had reasoned with him at several times, and finally forbade him to appear in the public print as representing the bureau in any controversy.

Commissioner COMMONS. What controversy was that?

Mr. CUTTING. In a pedagogical controversy going on at that time between those that represented an investigation made of the board of education and Profs. Conness and Moore.

Commissioner COMMONS. What time did the board begin its activity through Dr. Allen in investigating the public schools?

Mr. CUTTING. The bureau never at any time took any part in that controversy, except in so far, of course, as it was involved by the fact that this controversy was carried on by Dr. Allen.

Commissioner COMMONS. Did your board make any appropriation of any budget to enable him to make that investigation?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not recall that it did. I think whatever expense there was—and I do not think there was any expense in matters of that kind—came under the general heading of the bureau's activities. I can only say it was exceedingly distasteful to the trustees of the board, and on more than one occasion Dr. Allen had endeavored to get me to take part in the controversy and I had declined.

Commissioner COMMONS. Was it the unanimous opinion of the board during this time that that should not be kept up?

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. And why had not action been taken earlier, Mr. Cutting?

Mr. CUTTING. Out of consideration for Dr. Allen. All the trustees had a very high opinion of him at that time and all liked him. He was more involved in that than anything else; that is, his particular gift was pedagogy and he devoted himself more to that than anything in the bureau at all.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now, the bureau, from the standpoint of the trustees, made a distinction between pedagogical questions and administrative questions?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you consider that the administrative functions of the public schools come under your legitimate field?

Mr. CUTTING. Entirely so.

Commissioner COMMONS. But not their pedagogical affairs?

Mr. CUTTING. We are going to take that up at an early date—the administrative side.

Commissioner COMMONS. For what reason did you feel that he should not enter into the pedagogical questions?

Mr. CUTTING. On account of its technicalities. No one of the trustees was at all familiar with the pedagogical side of the subject, and it was thought too complicated and abstruse for us to give the time required to understand it. We did not want to do it, and could not do it.

Commissioner COMMONS. In the administrative questions did you give time to that or leave it to the directors?

Mr. CUTTING. To the directors, who reported from time to time to the board.

Commissioner COMMONS. But you approved of them?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. What caused you to be more informed on that class of questions?

Mr. CUTTING. They were easier for us to understand as trustees.

Commissioner COMMONS. Why?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, you are an educator, and these are simple problems to you—the pedagogical; but to those who are not educators, they are really very abstruse. I know nothing about it myself.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is, you consider that the trustees feel that they are business men, and feel that they should not go into the pedagogical field?

Mr. CUTTING. That is it exactly. For instance, we have had a large and important work going on for some time past with reference to the relative cost of the public service by the Edison Co. and the city, and we have employed experts, not being ourselves sufficiently expert to go into that question.

Commissioner COMMONS. Could you furnish us with files of this publicity material as to which you objected? Also of the kind of reports or investigations which were being made of the school system, which you objected to, for our exhibits?

Mr. CUTTING. I do not think they were published in reports of any kind at all. The trustees took no part in that at all.

Commissioner COMMONS. I mean the publicity matter that was being published by Mr. Allen, which you said—

Mr. CUTTING (interrupting). I would have to get that from clippings from newspapers and letters over Dr. Allen's signature.

Commissioner COMMONS. And postal cards?

Mr. CUTTING. Cards and newspaper articles.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would not your office have files of all publicity material that has been sent out?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Could we have exhibits selected from them?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; you can send anyone and he will be allowed to go all through the files and pick out what he likes.

Commissioner COMMONS. What I am trying to get at is the particular question of publicity that you and Mr. Rockefeller agreed was not advisable.

Mr. CUTTING. I can give you—you can go over all the files we have in our office—anyone you send down can get all the facts you want. We objected to it on account of its phraseology and style which seemed cheap and unworthy of the bureau of municipal research.

Commissioner COMMONS. It was simply on account of its cheapness?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Were there any other objections to it?

Mr. CUTTING. Those were the main objections. At one time we did object to a good deal that appeared in those things and passed a resolution that those bulletins should contain nothing except clippings from newspapers, because there was a good deal that came to us at that time that was objectionable, and we had to shut down on it in that way.

Commissioner COMMONS. Regarding the publications you objected to, were the bulletins gotten out by the bureau under Mr. Allen's direction, that involved the bureau in this pedagogical controversy?

Mr. CUTTING. There were so many that came out, because they came out weekly; but I do not recall all of those. I do not remember really what appeared on that subject.

Commissioner COMMONS. I suppose your answer about furnishing them, is the same as the other?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; I can look over them, but I would rather that you would go over what we have and select what you want.

Commissioner COMMONS. That would—we would then be sending a man to determine as to what was your thought, and that we do not know.

Mr. CUTTING. What would you like to have exactly?

Commissioner COMMONS. I would like to know the kind of publicity and the kind of investigation which your board thought was not a proper thing to be sent out.

Mr. CUTTING. I will try to find out and send it to you.

Commissioner COMMONS. Which will be your own selection?

Mr. CUTTING. I will try and find some and send it to you. I might say that that kind of publicity has already cost us one of the most valuable members of our board, who, after a number of protests, finally resigned.

Commissioner COMMONS. Was Mr. Allen's resignation based on your discontinuance of this policy?

Mr. CUTTING. His resignation was based on the fact that he had been informed that he would not be reelected a director at the expiration of his term.

Commissioner COMMONS. On what grounds?

Mr. CUTTING. That we did not want his services any longer.

Commissioner COMMONS. For what reason?

Mr. CUTTING. We found his methods objectionable.

Commissioner COMMONS. Which methods?

Mr. CUTTING. Nearly all of them; his relation to public officials, his manner of approaching almost everybody interested in the work. He had made so many enemies for us in our work that if he had not discontinued his connection with the bureau we should have gone to the wall soon.

Commissioner COMMONS. In what sense would you have gone to the wall?

Mr. CUTTING. He had created and succeeded in creating such a body of opposition to us of people who objected to the methods of the bureau because of the methods of Dr. Allen that we were not only losing friends, but making enemies very rapidly in New York.

Commissioner COMMONS. Then, what, in your own way of putting it, would be the part that Mr. Rockefeller and the foundations which he represented—what part or influence did they have in this general situation of discontinuing this work and of discontinuing Mr. Allen's services?

Mr. CUTTING. He never made any protest against Dr. Allen at all as a director of the bureau.

Commissioner COMMONS. He never what?

Mr. CUTTING. He never made any protests about the connection of Dr. Allen with the bureau.

Commissioner COMMONS. There was action by the bureau itself?

Mr. CUTTING. By the bureau itself entirely. He never made any suggestion at that time whatsoever.

Commissioner COMMONS. How about your policy, then, with reference to these public investigations, investigations of these schools and other things? What was the influence that Mr. Rockefeller had as against what the board had determined as their own policy?

Mr. CUTTING. I don't think I quite follow you, Professor. I don't quite understand your question.

Commissioner COMMONS. The question is, this action of the board was taken after Mr. Rockefeller had promised this $20,000.

Mr. CUTTING. Oh, yes, sir.

Commissioner COMMONS. Now to what extent—you say you had made up your mind before that time to take the same action. To what extent did his influence as against the board's action determine the policy—the final policy? I just want to see how you would state it in your own way. The issue is very square and very plain there and it is a very important consideration if tremendous fortunes of this kind are to dominate men like you and those associated with you in these lines of public work.

Mr. CUTTING. Precisely.

Commissioner COMMONS. And I wish you would state definitely in your own way how you think that situation affected you in those lines of work?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, I can say this, that it affected me so far as this: That we did not quite see how we were going to continue on such a scale of work as we had been in the past, in 1915. We had been considering a number of policies, and Mr. Rockefeller's suggestion that he would give us $20,000 a year—at least, $20,000 in 1915—was a very gracious proposition to us, no doubt. And as we found that his view about the continuance of the bureau were those already entertained by us, we were glad to accept it immediately. What his proposition did probably was to bring to a head the somewhat nebulous condition of the bureau at that time. I am afraid the trustees are a little too busy men. It was rather hard for us at times to get a meeting; and this brought to a head the issue that we had been considering for some time.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner GARRETSON. The situation, as I have got it—it is difficult to hear over there—is this, Mr. Cutting: The Rockefeller fund, through whatever channels it may have been, offered you $20,000 with certain conditions attached thereto. The trustees of your institution immediately, by unanimous vote, refused to accept the money with the conditions. Is that correct?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then you immediately proceeded to correct every one of those conditions, so that the money could be given virtually without any conditions, and it was given and you immediately accepted it. Is that it?

Mr. CUTTING. No; I don't think that is a correct statement of the case, because that implies, of course, that we changed our minds, which was not the case. We did not change our minds. Our minds had already been made up on these identical subjects.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, is that a statement of the results that were attained regardless of whether you changed your mind or not?

Mr. CUTTING. Well, even then—no, it is incorrect. Our policy was changed in this respect only: The one man in the bureau who had been conducting this policy to which we objected in reference to pedagogy the public schools at that time went West. No one else in the bureau had been conducting it, and no one else of the trustees wanted to conduct it, and when he left and went West it ceased.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, where did you stand on the basis of your first resolution that you would not accept the money with conditions attached, and your second action accepting it when you had beforehand complied with those conditions?

Mr. CUTTING. We stood just exactly as I have said. That proposition had made a little more concrete in our minds what had before been a little bit nebulous, and we had determined to carry out a policy to which we were all agreed. No conditions when the money came to use were attached to it at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Would not a parallel condition be that if a church was a member of a certain denomination and on account of the fact that it belonged to that denomination it could not get certain money, and would refuse the money that was offered it if it changed its denomination, and it spurned the offer, and then changed its denomination and took the money.

Mr. CUTTING. Not if that religious organization had before determined that it was going to join the other.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Wherefore, if you had already determined, what was the necessity for the declaration of refusing?

Mr. CUTTING. Because we knew that it would be put up to us exactly in that way, and we did not choose to condition ourselves from any future gifts that might come to us.

Commissioner GARRETSON. And you proceeded to free yourselves from that necessity?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. I have a question or two further along that line, so that I may perhaps get a little better understanding. Now, one of the objectionable things to Mr. Rockefeller was this examination of municipalities and of local bodies of government outside of the State of New York; is that correct?

Mr. CUTTING. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. And in a sort of nebulous manner the trustees were objecting to that also. That is correct, is it?

Mr. CUTTING. We have before us two distinct plans, yes, for the organization of that particular work on a separate basis which the trustees at that time were considering.

Chairman WALSH. Now, the gift of $20,000, among other things, brought that immediately to a head?

Mr. CUTTING. As a matter of fact, the bureau has not discontinued that work. So that the conditions of that gift have not been complied with. It is to-day carrying on work outside of the city of New York.

Chairman WALSH. Is it going to discontinue it?

Mr. CUTTING. We are going to let it go slowly, by degrees, I think, for the reason that we have not got the capital to maintain it. It requires a considerable amount of capital, of course, because our men have to be paid, and we have to wait for the municipalities to pay us, and we have got involved somewhat too deeply.

Chairman WALSH. On the day of this luncheon an investigation was being made by the municipal bureau experts in Colorado, including an investigation into the juvenile court presided over by Judge Ben B. Lindsey?

Mr. CUTTING. My impression is, so far as I recollect that, that that was being conducted by the bureau of municipal research founded in Denver by citizens of Denver, and we were supplying them with a certain number of men.

Chairman WALSH. Well, that was the way you supplied men always, wasn't it, to other organizations outside of the State of New York?

Mr. CUTTING. No, because it rarely happened that we go where our organization has been effected. They will get together a few citizens, say, and provide three or four thousand dollars or so; but my impression was at that time and is to-day that there was a local bureau of municipal research and that it had a number of our men working for it.

Chairman WALSH. And your experts of the board of municipal research then were in the State of Colorado on the date of this luncheon?

Mr. CUTTING. Very likely; I do not recall. We were carrying on the work at that time on rather a large scale all over the country.

Chairman WALSH. Did or did not the investigation at Denver include an investigation of Ben B. Lindsey, judge of the juvenile court of Denver?

Mr. CUTTING. I don't know at all.

Chairman WALSH. Have you the result of that investigation in your office?

Mr. CUTTING. It may be; I have never seen it.

Chairman WALSH. In whose particular charge would that report be?

Mr. CUTTING. That would be the director of the bureau now.

Chairman WALSH. Who is that?

Mr. CUTTING. Dr. Cleveland.

Chairman WALSH. Will you kindly submit that report if you can to-morrow?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. Thank you.

(See Cutting exhibit.)

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has a question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The statement has just been made to me, Mr. Cutting, by a labor representative, who shows me his card as a member of the painters' and decorators' association, that the statement that the minimum fee for initiation is $50. He tells me that in his union it is $5.

Mr. CUTTING. I think he is entirely right. I have a great deal of sympathy with the painters. I think their wages are entirely too low, whether on account of the fault of their organization, because it is not as strong as it ought to be, I can not say. They get only $3.50 a day, and they ought to get $4 or $4.50. They can not keep up their union anyhow; and with reference to the painters, I have no doubt that is right.

Chairman WALSH. You will be excused, Mr. Cutting, and kindly submit—

Mr. CUTTING. I would appreciate it if I can get a reference to all the various things you want me to furnish you.

Chairman WALSH. Yes; our organization contemplates turning over to you and calling your particular attention to the particular things we have been asking you about.

Mr. CUTTING. There is something you wanted of me to-morrow.

Chairman WALSH. Well, I asked you particularly for to-morrow for the report on Colorado by the experts that were making that examination at the time that this discussion and acceptance took place.

Mr. CUTTING. Yes; if we have that in the office you shall have that to-morrow.

Chairman WALSH. If you find it in the office, will you kindly ask Mr. Cleveland to drop over here so we may ask him a question or two about it?

Mr. CUTTING. Certainly.

Chairman WALSH. You will be excused temporarily, and thank you for your patience.

We now stand adjourned until to-morrow at 10 o'clock, to meet in this room.

(Thereupon, at 4.30 o'clock p. m. of this Thursday, January 28, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock a. m. of Friday, January 29, 1915, to meet in the aldermanic chamber.)

NEW YORK, January 29, 1915—10 a. m.

Present: Chairman Walsh, Commissioners O'Connell, Lennon, Harriman, Ballard, Weinstock, Garretson, and Commons.

Chairman WALSH. The commission will please come to order. The house will be in order, please, and we will now proceed.

Dr. Eliot.

TESTIMONY OF DR. CHARLES W. ELIOT.

Chairman WALSH. Please state your name.

Dr. ELIOT. Charles W. Eliot.

Chairman WALSH. And your business or profession, please.

Dr. ELIOT. Education.

Chairman WALSH. Where do you reside, Doctor?

Dr. ELIOT. Cambridge, Mass.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a member of the General Education Board, established by Mr. Rockefeller, the Rockefeller Foundation and the sanitary commission conducted by the Rockefeller Foundation?

Dr. ELIOT. I am of all three.

Chairman WALSH. Are you connected with any other boards, Doctor?

Dr. ELIOT. Any other boards?

Chairman WALSH. In which Mr. Rockefeller's benefactions take part?

Dr. ELIOT. No other boards. I am connected with various other boards, of course, but not in connection with the Rockefeller interests.

Chairman WALSH. I understand. Are you a member of the bureau of social hygiene?

Dr. ELIOT. Of the American Social Hygiene Association; yes; I am.

Chairman WALSH. You were for several years a member of the Carnegie Foundation for Advancement of Teaching, I believe.

Dr. ELIOT. I was.

Chairman WALSH. Were you during 1908 a member of both the General Education Board and the Carnegie Foundation?

Dr. ELIOT. I think I was. I am not perfectly sure, but—yes; I must have been for about a year a member of both.

Chairman WALSH. Are you now a member of the Carnegie Peace Foundation?

Dr. ELIOT. I am.

Chairman WALSH. Please name any other foundations established by Mr. Carnegie of which you are now a member.

Dr. ELIOT. No other.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe it is to the public interest to have interlocking directorates among the private foundations of large active foundations, Doctor?

Dr. ELIOT. Interlocking directorates?

Chairman WALSH. Meaning by that a large number of the same persons serving on the different boards of the large foundations.

Dr. ELIOT. I suppose it contributes to efficiency in a good many of these endowments for the same men of experience serving more than one board.

Chairman WALSH. Are there any circumstances under which you would consider it inadvisable to have interlocking directorates of that sort?

Dr. ELIOT. I have no experience of any such—I have no observation of any such conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Do you have in mind any circumstances under which, having the same directors upon the different boards, ill might come about, bad results might come, either from the point of the persons not being able to give the proper personal attention to the duties of all of the boards or from impressing the viewpoints in one upon the other?

Dr. ELIOT. The only observations I have made on that point are that in some of the endowments with which I have been connected the offices have been undermanned, partly in consequence, I think, of the efforts to employ the same men in more than one capacity, the result being that the men so employed are overworked, can not transact efficiently the business of the different endowments.

Chairman WALSH. With the large number of the country's business and professional men and educators to draw from, Doctor, do you think that there is any substantial reason for having the same men serving upon different boards, leaving aside for the present those that might be considered extra efficient or with a peculiar knowledge?

Dr. ELIOT. It has seemed to me in those boards with which I have been connected that the most efficient men were the men of widest experience—largest experience—and that there was great value in keeping such men in constant service, and as wide a service as is physically practicable. It has not been my observation that there is any abundance of such men in the American community.

Chairman WALSH. It has been shown here, Doctor, that Mr. Rockefeller, jr., Mr. Murphy, Mr. Greene, and Mr. Gates, until a short time ago, are on each of the three foundations established by Mr. Rockefeller, and on the sanitary commission, as well as on Mr. Rockefeller's personal staff. These men also constitute largely the majority of the executive committee of the foundation, its financial committee, its nominating committee, and the executive committee of the General Education Board. Do you consider that is desirable interlocking in this particular instance?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not, because those men you have mentioned have not the physical strength to bear such complicated and constant labor. That just illustrates what I mean by saying that I have seen often endowments rendered less effective because they were undermanned; that is, did not employ men enough for their work, and that is just the case now with the Rockefeller endowments.

Chairman WALSH. How much attention do you, as trustee, Doctor, find it necessary and possible to give to the work of the Rockefeller Foundation and the work of the General Education Board?

Dr. ELIOT. That is a little difficult to define, the amount of attention one gives, but I find it possible to attend all of the meetings of these boards, and to read all their reports, and to inform myself generally with regard to their functions. I have given a very substantial portion of my time since 1908 to the Rockefeller boards, a substantial portion.

Chairman WALSH. Could you, in a general way, Doctor, state about what part of your time is given to the duties that you have performed; that is, meeting with the boards, advising with them through correspondence or otherwise, or any other matter that might suggest itself to you?

Dr. ELIOT. The General Education Board I have been a member of since 1908, and they have at least three, and sometimes four, meetings a year, and they are long and strenuous meetings. The members of the board are always provided beforehand with reports upon the work to be done at the coming meeting, and throughout the year they receive a series of reports of the work going on. It takes a good deal of time to read all these reports. I have been in the habit of giving whatever time is needed. For instance, yesterday I was in a meeting of the General Education Board from half past 10 until 5, and it was a fully occupied meeting, and its doings related to subjects which I have always been very much interested in. I take a keen interest in the proceedings of the board consequently. They relate to education, public health, and sanitation.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know of any instances where educators have been unduly influenced, whether consciously or unconsciously, in their educational views or methods by their desire to secure funds of the General Education Board or the Carnegie Foundation?

Dr. ELIOT. Influence in a bad direction?

Chairman WALSH. In any direction; and, if so, how, Doctor?

Dr. ELIOT. I have known many instances in which presidents of colleges and technical schools were influenced by the policy of the General Education Board, but I never knew of any bad influence; it has always been for good.

Chairman WALSH. Well, indicate, if you will, Doctor, along what lines they were influenced, either as broad and general, if it suggests itself, or specifically if you can think of instances.

Dr. ELIOT. I have known gentlemen seeking gifts from the General Education Board to be very much informed as to the method in which they could procure great gifts for education, not only from the General Education Board, but others. I have known their efforts to be greatly stimulated toward getting money from others as well as from the Rockefeller board. I can, perhaps, illustrate that by saying what happened to myself before I was a member of the General Education Board. Indeed, I think it was before the General Education Board was created by Mr. Rockefeller, sr. We were engaged in the medical school of Harvard University in erecting new buildings of great utility and beauty, and we were also very much concerned in how we should be able to live in those buildings after we had got them, because we had not the means of carrying on those buildings in the proper manner. I hoped that Mr. Rockefeller, sr.—it was before the institution of the General Education Board—would give us a considerable sum of money. With a committee of the medical faculty I applied for a gift, without specifying the amount, and supported this application with a statement of what the buildings were going to cost, how much money we had got toward them, how much money I supposed it would be necessary for us to have to maintain and live in those buildings, and what we got toward that charge. In the first place, Mr. Starr Murphy was sent by Mr. Rockefeller, sr., to the Harvard Medical School, and he examined the whole institution in all its details, its resources, its funds, its management. He also inquired into the general management of their property and funds by the president and fellows of Harvard College—that is, the charter body, chartered in 1650, which holds all the property of our university and manages it. After an examination of three weeks he went away and left me with the statement that he was going to prepare a report to Mr. Rockefeller, sr.

A few weeks later I was invited to come to the Rockefeller office in this city for an interview with Mr. Starr Murphy and Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr. Mr. Rockefeller, sr., did not appear. Mr. Rockefeller, jr., was the spokesman at this meeting, and he told me that our calculations of what would be necessary to have in hand as a fund to support those buildings and live in them effectively—that my calculations were not correct; that it would take more than I supposed, but that if Harvard University and its friends would raise $875,000 more than they had raised—they had already raised a considerable sum—that his father would give the Harvard Medical School $1,000,000, either to use on buildings or to hold as an endowment. Now that at the moment was somewhat discouraging; but it was a very valuable instruction to me and to Profs. Bowditch and Warren, who accompanied me. I accepted the condition on the spot, and Mr. Rockefeller's purpose as indicated by his son was carried out after we had raised $875,000 more. We then proceeded to finish those buildings and live in them, and the statement made to me by Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr., was absolutely justified. He was right entirely in the instruction he gave me in order to carry out the job which I had in hand.

Now, I have known a good many other presidents of colleges, technical schools, and so forth, much instructed in those ways by the agents and officers of the General Education Board; that is, their function in that respect seems to me a very useful one. The result can be seen in facts which are published and, I doubt not, are before the commission. By giving away $72,000,000 to the institutions of higher education, the General Education Board has brought into education additional amounts to the extent of $117,000,000; that is, in all nearly $200,000,000 have been put into American education through the working of the General Education Board since 1902. You see, it is a young board; it was not really endowed until 1905.

I hope I have answered, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. I think that covers it. Doctor, do you feel entirely free to criticize publicly the report of the General Education Board?

Dr. ELIOT. The published reports?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Dr. ELIOT. Perfectly.

Chairman WALSH. Did you see the report of 1902 to 1914 before it was published?

Dr. ELIOT. I did not.

Chairman WALSH. When did you first see the report, please?

Dr. ELIOT. I think it was about a fortnight ago; about 10 days ago.

Chairman WALSH. And when was it published?

Dr. ELIOT. I am not quite sure. I don't know the date when it was published. It was printed when I saw it—fully printed and bound.

Chairman WALSH. When was your attention first called to the fact that there was to be a report?

Dr. ELIOT. I think it was three years ago.

Chairman WALSH. Three years ago?

Dr. ELIOT. I should think so. The General Education Board discussed the matter of annual reports and expressed a desire to have the officers prepare an annual report; and the first one would necessarily go back to the beginning, which covers several years. I think that was three years ago.

Chairman WALSH. Was there formal action taken at the meeting of the board, Doctor, with respect to this subject of issuing annual reports?

Dr. ELIOT. Not, I should think, three years ago. I think that was informal.

Chairman WALSH. That was informal?

Dr. ELIOT. But there has been formal action taken. I think it was a year ago, or perhaps last May; I don't remember; but there was formal action taken.

Chairman WALSH. This was the first formal report, was it, that was issued by the board of education—the General Board?

Dr. ELIOT. No.

Chairman WALSH. This 1902 to 1914?

Dr. ELIOT. No; not the first report issued; certainly not.

Chairman WALSH. What other reports were issued, please?

Dr. ELIOT. The charter requires that an annual report should be presented to one of the commissioners at Washington. I don't remember the precise official to whom that report is to be presented, but the charter requires that.

Chairman WALSH. And had there been annual reports issued each year in conformity with the charter?

Dr. ELIOT. In conformity with the charter always.

Chairman WALSH. Do those reports in full or epitomized appear in this publication—this report of 1902 to 1914; this book which has been published?

Dr. ELIOT. They can not have the same order, of course, as this report, covering 12 years; but the annual report made to the Government official at Washington covers the whole proceedings of the board—not in detail, of course, but covers the whole financial account of the board and its general doings. But that is a charter requisition and did not proceed from the board at all.

Chairman WALSH. Has the General Education Board recently undertaken a survey of the schools of Maryland?

Dr. ELIOT. It has not undertaken the investigation as yet, but it has made preliminary—taken preliminary steps toward doing it.

Chairman WALSH. Upon what request is that being done, Doctor, if there is any request?

Dr. ELIOT. There was a request from persons representing the State, but I don't know who they were.

Chairman WALSH. Was there a State commission on education appointed in the State of Maryland which made that request?

Dr. ELIOT. Was there not one?

Chairman WALSH. Yes. Didn't the request come from the State commission on education of Maryland?

Dr. ELIOT. I don't know; I don't remember that I heard from whom it came.

Chairman WALSH. Was the State of Maryland to pay a part of the expenses and the General Education Board a part?

Dr. ELIOT. I think that is the arrangement.

Chairman WALSH. Do you know what part the General Education Board is to pay—what proportion, and what proportion is to be borne by the State?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not. I have heard; but I don't remember.

Chairman WALSH. Is this work projected in the State of Maryland any departure from the policy of the General Education Board in the past?

Dr. ELIOT. Hardly to be called a departure; it is perfectly consistent with the policy of the General Education Board in general. But it is a departure in the sense that this is a new undertaking for the General Education Board.

Chairman WALSH. Were you present when the action was decided upon?

Dr. ELIOT. I was.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please state the nature of the study that is to be made and whether or not you have personally gone over the plan of that study and the instructions given to the investigators of the board.

Dr. ELIOT. Certainly not. I should not regard that as my function.

Chairman WALSH. Whose duty would it be to do that?

Dr. ELIOT. The nearest person to it was Dr. Wallace Buttrick, the secretary.

Chairman WALSH. Do you see any essential difference, so far as the power to affect freedom of thought and study is concerned, between the foundation that conducts investigations like the Institute for Medical Research and the foundation that gives money to colleges or other agencies?

Dr. ELIOT. Do I see any difference—

Chairman WALSH. Any essential difference, so far as the power to affect freedom of thought and study is concerned?

Dr. ELIOT. No; I did not see any difference between truth seeking in either case.

Chairman WALSH. Do you think that the same agencies which give the money should conduct the investigations?

Dr. ELIOT. Do you refer to such investigations as the Rockefeller Institution conducts? I do not understand the scope of the question.

Chairman WALSH. I am trying to ask the question in a general way and not trying to apply it to any particular foundation. The question is: Do you think that the same agencies which give away the money should conduct the investigations?

Dr. ELIOT. It seems to me quite impossible that the same agencies that supply the money should conduct the investigation. Such investigations as are conducted by the Rockefeller Institute require the life labor of men expert in the highest degree. And persons or boards who provide the money for those investigations would be absolutely incompetent to conduct the investigations themselves.

Chairman WALSH. I desire to ask you a few general questions on labor—labor subjects, industrial subjects—Doctor.

Dr. ELIOT. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What information do you consider that a stockholder or a director should possess concerning labor conditions in the industry in which he is a stockholder or director?

Dr. ELIOT. The more the better I should say. But my observation as a shareholder to a very limited extent is that the shareholder has not any information as a rule, and he gets no information.

Chairman WALSH. In your opinion to what extent are the directors and stockholders of a corporation responsible for labor conditions which exist in the industries in which they hold stock and act as directors?

Dr. ELIOT. Shareholders do not seem to me responsible at all unless their attention is drawn to an existing evil or wrong; unless their attention is forcibly drawn to an existing evil or wrong. Then they may have some responsibility to induce efforts to correct that evil or wrong. In general the shareholders do not seem to me to be capable of giving any intelligent attention to the conditions of labor in the institutions or factories, mines, etc., in which their money is invested.

The directors are more responsible, but the chief responsibility of directors has seemed to me to be the selection of their agents, the immediate manager. It is, I suppose, quite impossible for directors generally to do more than that, and their responsibility is therefore chiefly that, in my view.

I ought to say, however, that I have no experience whatever in business directorates and never was a member of one and am only an outsider as an observer.

Chairman WALSH. Of course those questions are asked you, Doctor, rather from the standpoint of your general studies and your contact with such matters.

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. In an educational way, of course. According to your standards what would you consider to be proper labor conditions as regards the following points: First, length of working day?

Dr. ELIOT. I have never been able to see there could be any general rule on that subject; the industries differ so, that what is a reasonable day's work in one industry is a wholly unreasonable one in another. And therefore I hope that the community, the American community at least, which values liberty very highly, would be able to avoid uniformity of legislation on that subject. Uniformity is almost invariably, as far as my observation goes, an evil; it is a horrid evil in education, for instance, and therefore I have been inclined to believe we ought not to seek to make a day's work uniform in all our different industries.

Chairman WALSH. What would you consider to be a proper or necessary yearly income for unskilled workmen?

Dr. ELIOT. I suppose that depends entirely on where he lives. The desirable income, the necessary income, in the United States is very different from what it is in Germany; it is very different again from what it is in China.

Chairman WALSH. Well, applying the question specifically to this country.

Dr. ELIOT. Solely to the United States?

Chairman WALSH. Yes.

Dr. ELIOT. I have very little observation of fact on that subject. I once wrote an account of the manner of life of the native people of the island of Mount Desert, and undertook to describe their mode of life, and the money the man of a family needed to earn in cash during the year in order to support suitably well his family. I made a large number of inquiries as to the amount of cash earnings of the men that I knew there. I live in Mount Desert in the summer, and I came to the conclusion that if a man had his house, his cottage, and a garden and a wood lot, those things at that time—this was perhaps 30 years ago—cost very little in Mount Desert, and any young man could get the necessary cost of those equipments in the first four or five years of his coasting and fishing. I came to the conclusion that $250 in cash earnings was sufficient for the family. I called a family five on the average. This statement of mine, when printed, was criticized in two ways: The richest family in the community which I was describing complained that I had put this cash receipt much too low. And finally the daughter of the house alleged, "We spend much more than that in the year. We have got a house and garden and wood lot, and we need more than $250 a year." I pointed out, in the first place, that she belonged to the richest family on the island, with the exception of two or three at Bar Harbor. The community in which I lived is 10 miles from Bar Harbor. She acknowledged that. I then asked her how much her family needed in cash earnings, of the husband and father. She said: "Why, we sometimes spend as much as $400." That was a very intelligent family and best to do in that part of the island. On the other hand, the town treasurer, one of the most admirable citizens I have ever known, serving his town as town treasurer for over 30 years, told me: "Mr. Eliot, you have made a bad mistake in that account you have given of our people; $250 is altogether too high. They do not get it. And first nobody lives in this town that is cold or hungry in winter." That is just one town, a very desirable town, and the occupations of the people are desirable; that is, they are out-of-door men, on the water and in the woods—out-of-door occupations. I have never been able to make up my mind what the proper answer to the question you have asked, sir, is. I do not know what the minimum sum of earnings of husband and father is. I suppose it would be different in different parts of the country.

Chairman WALSH. We will take, for illustration, the city of Boston. What would you say as to that?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not know. I can not say because I have not the facts, and I have never seen any presentation of the facts in that matter which satisfied me.

For instance, I have never been able to make up my mind what the proper or desirable spending of a family of five for food is. I have always been very much interested in public-health questions, and I am afraid that the diet of the ordinary American working family costs a great deal more than it should, and is not the best diet from a health point of view. I am quite sure of that latter point. I believe that all of us in all walks of life eat a great deal too much and particularly a great deal too much meat, and therefore all elements of the necessary cost of food for a family of laboring men seem to be questionable, or that I have ever seen.

Chairman WALSH. What observation or study, or what access have you had, to information which indicates to you the amount of meat that is used by the families of workmen here in the city of New York, or in the city of Boston, or the workers in the steel industry in the vicinity of Pittsburgh?

Dr. ELIOT. I have only had the facts presented in such reports as the survey of Pittsburgh, for instance, in the reports of the boards of health and of institutions where a diet is prescribed—the usual source of information on this point, but no opportunities of observing.

Chairman WALSH. Have you observed—you have observed of course, Doctor, the modern trend of taking care of persons who meet with accidents in industries, as evidenced by what are called workmen's compensation acts, I believe.

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. According to your opinion, what do you believe the proper compensation for industrial accidents, beginning, say, with the loss of an arm, the loss of both eyes, the loss of life, or permanent disability?

Dr. ELIOT. What amount should be paid?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; what amount approximately should be paid for those things, considering the modern standards of living?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not feel competent to answer that. I am not familiar with life insurance statistics or with accident insurance really. I have rejoiced very much in the institution of accident insurance, but I think the Germans have gotten very much ahead of us in that respect.

Chairman WALSH. Briefly and generally, in what particular, Doctor, have the Germans advanced further than we have?

Dr. ELIOT. They seem to me to have started first, to begin with, and in the next place their arrangement for the division of the cost of things is a just one and sound in all respects—good business as well as good humanity.

Chairman WALSH. According to your standards, Doctor, what would you consider to be the age and conditions under which children should be employed in industry?

Dr. ELIOT. My standards in that respect relate altogether to health, the question of the health of children. I think it is a great misfortune for a child not to take part in the earning of the living of the family, so to speak, and in the household work and in the farm work. That, from my point of view, as a teacher, as an educator, is the great difficulty that the urban communities suffer from, the great difficulty in education I mean. The child on a farm has a chance to work in that healthy way in the helping of the family. A city child, with the factory system in the city, has no such chance. My belief is that children should never be employed in any machine industry indoors—should never be employed in a machine industry indoors.

Chairman WALSH. When you say "children," Doctor, what age limit do you fix, or is there any difference as to sexes?

Dr. ELIOT. I believe the school age—the age of compulsory going to school, which is usually in this country 14 years, is a pretty sound basis, scientific basis, but personally I should desire that that limit be raised for all factory industries. I believe 16 is as low a limit of age as should be used in factory industry.

Chairman WALSH. What is your attitude, Doctor, toward the organization of employees into labor unions for the alleged protection of themselves and for the advancement of their interests?

Dr. ELIOT. I am of course very much in favor of that; I believe in the organization of labor.

Chairman WALSH. And upon what information or experience is your attitude based?

Dr. ELIOT. I suppose it is very probably based upon my considerable observation of the value in all higher professions of organization; in all the higher professions there is organization. I do not mean like unions, but they are organized, all the higher professions in which men work and enjoy their profession and its prospects, they have organizations for promoting those interests; and the trades and various labors in which men have common interests—it has always seemed to me they should be similarly organized.

Chairman WALSH. What features of present-day labor union organization activities would you consider to be socially undesirable as you have observed their creation and development?

Dr. ELIOT. Certain policies of the unions have long seemed to me to be very undesirable, not only for the community but for their own members; and my theory has been that the greatest injury done to the community through the members of the unions were in these respects: The closed shop, the boycott, union label, limited output. I think those are the four I have believed to be policies of the unions which were seriously injurious to the community, and more injurious still to the members of the unions.

Chairman WALSH. As a result of your observation and experience, Doctor, do you believe that industrial discontent in America is increasing or decreasing?

Dr. ELIOT. I have seen neither one nor the other lately. I do not know whether during the last five years the unrest has been increasing or decreasing, but before that time it seemed to me it was increasing. Conditions have been very extraordinary of late, and I really do not know whether it has been going up or down, the general unrest.

Chairman WALSH. Up until what time did you say it was increasing, Doctor?

Dr. ELIOT. About four years ago, I think it was; up to that time I felt it had been increasing, and since that I have been doubtful; I do not know.

Chairman WALSH. You have been doubtful as to whether or not it was increasing?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. What forces have been at work during the past five years that you think would make for an increase or decrease in industrial discontent—what forces or agencies?

Dr. ELIOT. The force which seems to me to perhaps have diminished the industrial discontent—I do not speak with confidence about this—is that I think I have seen a very considerable change in the disposition of employers toward their employees during the last few years.

Chairman WALSH. In what way, please, has that been experienced, Doctor?

Dr. ELIOT. In the first place, I think there is much more disposition than there used to be toward what is called in our days "cooperative management"—giving a share in the management to the employees, and an effective share. That is the first tendency I have seen among employers. And another is, and I have known of this because I have studied the subject—I know that many experiments are going on in profit sharing in large variety, and I think that has affected the industrial discontent; it is only beginning to.

Chairman WALSH. Do you believe, Doctor, that the fact, if it be a fact, that a large foundation like the Rockefeller Foundation is making a survey of industrial conditions, the relations between capital and labor in the United States, and the fact that upon the board of trustees of the foundation are a number of persons who are also the directors in industries in which very serious labor disputes and conflicts are going on, might be a matter of irritation to a vast number of the workers in those industries, and thus bring about further discontent upon the part of the laborers?

Dr. ELIOT. This refers, of course, to the investigation which is proposed by the Rockefeller Foundation?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; I have that one particularly in mind in asking the question.

Dr. ELIOT. I had something to do—I had a good deal to do with approving that particular investigation into industrial conditions, and therefore I am not entirely impartial in answering this question.

Chairman WALSH. We might get your viewpoint, Dr. Eliot, which you indicate very clearly.

Dr. ELIOT. I believe that an honest investigation of industrial conditions by the Rockefeller Foundation can shed much light on the existing causes of industrial unrest, and that it is reasonable to hope that it will also find means of diminishing the source of discontent, the source of friction between capital and labor, so that I see no reason for apprehension with regard to this particular investigation by the Rockefeller Foundation, but, on the contrary, I see good hope in it.

Chairman WALSH. But while it is going on, conceding for the sake of this question that the conditions I have mentioned about the same individuals being on the boards of trustees, my question was, do you not think while it was going on it might be a source of irritation to the laborers involved and directly connected in these labor troubles?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not see any good reason why it should.

Chairman WALSH. My attention has been called to the fact that the Rockefeller Foundation holds 500 bonds of the American Agricultural & Chemical Co., with a plant at Roosevelt, N. J., where this unfortunate occurrence has just taken place. Do you believe that the foundation, as a foundation, has any special obligation, because of its benevolent purpose, to look into the conditions of labor in the particular industry that this investment represents?

Dr. ELIOT. I see no obligation on the part of the Rockefeller Foundation, as a charitable and educational endowment, to take part in that investigation of that particular disaster.

Chairman WALSH. Does the fact, if it be a fact, that a member of the foundation board is also a director of the corporation of the American Agricultural & Chemical Co. in any way affect the foundation's freedom of action in its work in the industrial field?

Dr. ELIOT. Not in the least.

Chairman WALSH. You think that if a member of the foundation was a director in a company where there was a dispute going on in which lives were lost and an effort was being made to fix responsibility, that in the field of industrial investigation generally that director would not be hampered in any way?

Dr. ELIOT. He ought not to be hampered as a member of the Rockefeller Foundation in any way. His function as a member of the Rockefeller Foundation is totally distinct from his function as a director in this or that commercial or industrial concern.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Lennon would like to ask a question or two.

Commissioner LENNON. Doctor, you have mentioned the fact that when Harvard applied for a donation from Mr. Rockefeller, sr., Mr. Starr J. Murphy came and made an investigation as to the necessary funds required to make the buildings effective and carry on the work. Now, where such requests have been made by other colleges, by smaller colleges, have you ever known an investigation to be made as to the methods of teaching and the principles that are taught and the giving of money made dependent upon a change in policy in those directions?

Dr. ELIOT. Never. I never heard the suggestion of such a thing. I may add perhaps that when the General Education Board makes an award to a college or university, and it makes such awards to hundreds, it gives the money outright to the corporation aided, or body of trustees aided, and keeps no control whatever over the expenditure of the money, unless, indeed, there is some condition that the money should be used for a building; but it has no control whatever over the subsequent expenditure of the money.

Commissioner LENNON. And seeks to exercise no influence as to what shall be taught?

Dr. ELIOT. I could not say quite that, because there is a general condition imposed which goes with all gifts made by the Rockefeller General Education Board to institutions of learning.

Commissioner LENNON. What is that condition?

Dr. ELIOT. The condition is no part of the money shall be used for what is ordinarily called "theological education." The attitude of the board has been from the beginning that it did not wish to contribute to any instruction which could possibly be called sectarian, and therefore this universal condition is attached to their gifts.

Commissioner LENNON. That is the principal condition, or only one?

Dr. ELIOT. It is the only one; only one which I have ever heard of.

Commissioner LENNON. In reply to a question—I can not repeat the question, but I think I have your reply—you said that in advance of meetings of the education board that you were furnished with an outline of the work that was to be performed at that meeting?

Dr. ELIOT. Docket; yes.

Commissioner LENNON. Yes; a docket. Who gets up that docket?

Dr. ELIOT. I suppose it would be got up by the secretary, Dr. Buttrick, and his two assistants. He has two assistant secretaries. I suppose it to be; it is always signed by him.

Commissioner LENNON. Now, at a meeting of the board can you originate legislation that does not appear on the docket?

Dr. ELIOT. Any member can. The matter may have to be laid over to the next meeting, but any member can bring in any proposal at any meeting.

Commissioner LENNON. Regarding the matter of organization, you expressed your approval, that as the higher professions, as you were pleased to call them, were organized that the right should extend to labor—the same right to organize in a general way. You objected, however, to what is known by the world at large as the closed shop. Doesn't that principle prevail in the professional organizations? Will the physicians in practice in the allopathic school admit homeopaths, or eclectics, or other schools? Will they practice with them?

Dr. ELIOT. The admission to the profession is regulated by public law, as a rule, in our country. In Massachusetts there is—all the schools of medicine are equally admissible to the practice of a profession. They have in Massachusetts an ancient society more than 100 years old called the Massachusetts Medical Society; and practitioners of the different schools are also admitted to that organization.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you ever noticed any evidence of physicians of different schools by their organization trying to obtain exclusive control of city and State and municipal charities that had to do with public health?

Dr. ELIOT. I have noticed such things.

Commissioner LENNON. Have you noticed the same thing as regards the organization of the bar associations?

Dr. ELIOT. The bar associations generally admit with great freedom persons whose standard of education satisfies them. They also exercise the power of dismissal, and turn people out of the bar association. That is, however, a power exercised very seldom and with a great deal of care. I suppose it to be necessary for the protection of the profession against incompetent or unjust persons.

Commissioner LENNON. In other words, they exercise their right of judgment as to the best methods of protecting their organization?

Dr. ELIOT. They do. But yet they never undertake to prevent any private person from employing whomever he wishes to employ. A lawyer, for instance, dismissed by the action of a State bar association may be employed the next day by any private person who wishes to do so.

Commissioner LENNON. Can he be employed before the court in trying cases if he has been disbarred?

Dr. ELIOT. That varies in different States, I think. In some States he can not be employed before the court, but he can be employed for all chamber work, as it is called.

Commissioner LENNON. Well, in so far as these principles may be exercised without the violation of law have not the labor organizations an equal right with the professional organizations to exercise them?

Dr. ELIOT. So far as their own members are concerned, they have equal right, of course; but what I object to in general in regard to the closed shop is that they undertake to prevent the employment of men not members of their profession.

Commissioner LENNON. Well doesn't the medical fraternity undertake to prevent men or women from practicing medicine who had not met the standards in their organization?

Dr. ELIOT. That is done by State law always.

Commissioner LENNON. Yes; but who promotes the law; is it not the physicians' organization?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; backed by all persons interested in education and in the competency of men who have public responsibilities.

Commissioner LENNON. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Mrs. Harriman would like to ask you a question or two, Doctor.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Dr. Eliot, are you familiar with the industrial arbitration council—of course, not compulsory as to arbitration—in England in labor disputes?

Dr. ELIOT. No.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Well, there is such a council there.

Dr. ELIOT. I think so.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Would you think it would work well if the same were applied to this country—the same idea?

Dr. ELIOT. I really do not know enough about the method of work of that council to say whether it would work well in this country or not. Many things do work well in Europe which it is very difficult to transplant, and that may be one of them. I am not well enough acquainted with what that council really does to answer your question. I am sorry—

Commissioner HARRIMAN. May I put it another way? Would you think that arbitration and mediation—I mean again not, of course, compulsory arbitration—would work well over here?

Dr. ELIOT. So far as I have had the opportunity to observe the arbitration method in this country it has seemed to me to be a failure. I have not seen good results from the arbitration methods, because it generally results in a compromise which satisfies neither party. With regard to conciliation I have seen good results in the way of truce, and truce in the fight is often of very great value; but I have not seen results from conciliation toward permanent peace. There is a very great difference between the result desirable from the point of view of truce and the result desirable from the point of view of permanent peace. And so far as I have been able to learn, the conciliation methods in this country have not, as a fact, led toward permanent peace. I used to be a member of the executive committee of the civic federation, and I withdrew from it because the conciliation employed by that organization did not seem to me to tend toward industrial peace.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Have you any suggestions to make as to bringing about permanent industrial peace—what methods might be used?

Dr. ELIOT. The first method that seems to me to go that way is a constant and perfect publicity—a knowledge in both parties to a strike of what is going on and what has been done; and the great enemy to peace is secrecy, and that is true in international war and in what precedes international war, in my view.

Now, after publicity, any effort to offer to the workingmen precisely the same motive for doing a good day's work that the employer or manager feels toward permanent peace. The two parties must feel the pressure of the same motive—that is, the welfare of the family, the profits to the individual, something in the way of a prospect of receipts or income in addition to wages. It has not seemed to me that we could get permanent peace on a basis of mere or plain wages. The human desire for a profit and for a new advantage ought to be brought into the industrial situation.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Does that mean that you would approve of a profit-sharing plan?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Such as the steel company?

Dr. ELIOT. I like very much all profit-sharing plans as tending to real industrial peace, but I am confident that there is no one profit-sharing plan which will work in all the different industries. Profit-sharing plans have got to be adapted to a particular industry in which they are employed, and there must be great variety, and they must always be associated with cooperative management, if they are to work. Of course, we all know that many profit-sharing schemes have been tried and have failed. So that there is a great study to be done in all industries to bring in cooperative management and profit sharing.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. How do you feel about industrial democracy—labor having a vote in the management of the industry or the corporation?

Dr. ELIOT. Acting as representative?

Commissioner HARRIMAN. On the board.

Dr. ELIOT. Labor into the board of directors? I see no harm in that at all. I dare say it would do good. But the composition of directorates seems to me to be a very great problem in general.

Now, what we want in directorates are experts in management. We want the men of genius for the industrial organization. We are not getting them under the present arrangements, and I am afraid we should not get them if we undertake to make directorates representing capital on the one hand and labor on the other in equal proportions, say. But then we are now speaking of one of the great problems in modern industries—the right of organization of directorates.

I suppose we all agree we have not proceeded with that problem thus far. And that, I may say, is the case with regard to boards of trustees generally. It is a great problem of institutions of education to get competent, devoted boards of trustees—I mean for religious, charitable, and educational institutions. It is not a wonder that it is difficult to get good directorates in industrial corporations, because it is very difficult to get them in institutions and boards which are not carrying on operations for profit.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Have you any suggestions, Doctor, how that might be improved—the present method?

Dr. ELIOT. It seems to me that we have seen a good deal of improvement in the last 15 years. And that improvement resulted from, I suppose, fair to say, the life insurance investigation in this State and city. And we must hope that all inquiries like this which this commission is carrying on can bring something to pass in the way of the improvement of directorates. But it will not be an easy problem to solve. I ought perhaps to say that I have been for many years associated with a directorate for Harvard University, a body of seven men, created by charter from the English Government in 1650. Now, that directorate has never been altered in composition. It has always been seven men, of whom the president and treasurer were two, and none of them were paid ever, except the president and treasurer, and they not as members of that board.

Now, the personal composition of that board has been extraordinarily well made up ever since 1650. But it has been a result, I think, of a somewhat public opinion in Massachusetts as to how such boards should be composed—the public opinion which was sound at the beginning and remains sound to-day. And I really believe that it is public opinion that has got in the last issue to be relied on for the improvement of commercial industrial directorates. We shall get as good boards as public opinion, intelligent public opinion, will call for. And I suppose that this commission could render a great service by contributing to the formation of an intelligent public opinion upon that point, on that method.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Just one other question. Dr. Eliot, do you think if organized labor would eliminate the four policies which you have mentioned, which you regard as evils—the closed shop, the boycott, union label, limited output—that it could command attention on the part of unreasonable employers?

Dr. ELIOT. Command attention? Yes; I should suppose; but whether the labor union would actually effect on the object for the promotion of higher wages, for example, of shortening hours, as effectively if they abandoned their present instruments of warfare I should doubt. The conditions of things at the present time is a warfare, and the effective instruments of that warfare for the unions are those conditions that I have mentioned. But it seems to me that we do not sufficiently recognize the fact that these four instrumentalities are instruments of war. I meet a good many people who do not understand, for instance, that the boycott is a fight—a warfare. And its effects are often very destructive. I meet a great many people who do not understand at all that the union label is an instrument of warfare, and who know it. Now, the unions have been carrying on a warfare for a hundred years, and certainly that was a very justifiable warfare for many, many years. What we are looking for now is the means of finding a way out of that warfare, at least that is what I look for, and I have no doubt all members of this commission.

Commissioner HARRIMAN. Thank you.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell says he would like to ask you a few questions, Doctor.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Doctor, in addition to the four matters you say that labor should eliminate, do you justify the strike of the organization?

Dr. ELIOT. Do I justify that?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The strikes; yes.

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; if there is no other way.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What is the difference between the strike and the boycott or the label?

Dr. ELIOT. The strike is essentially nothing but a statement that "We, the employees of this factory, will not work any longer on the present condition. We have been refused an improvement of conditions. We say we will not work any longer on the present condition without improvement." Now, that is everybody's right, every freeman's right. The boycott says, "We will kill your business"—a merchant having nothing to do with the factory in which the unions are employed—"we will kill your business because you buy goods that are made free of union rules." Now, that is an attack on another man by the union. In my opinion it is an unwarranted attack, and therefore I feel that the unions ought never to use that weapon.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose the union orders a strike because the employer won't use the label; suppose they say to them, "We won't use the label," and they say, "We won't work for you; we will strike"; is that strike justifiable?

Dr. ELIOT. I am afraid I do not understand the question.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You say you justify the strike; that they have a right to strike. Supposing that strike is to compel the employer to use the label, which you say is one of the things that they should not have.

Dr. ELIOT. To compel the employer to?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. To use their label.

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. On his product.

Dr. ELIOT. They do not strike. They boycott; if they strike because they are not willing to work themselves under existing conditions, they are within their rights. If they strike because they wish to compel the employer not to use any label—the union label—except the union label, they are without their rights, in my view.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Of course, if that is a strike to compel the employer to use the label, naturally it goes that they must employ the union label?

Dr. ELIOT. What I mean, should that justify the strike?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. No matter what the cause. You say make four propositions which you believe labor should eliminate?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But we differ; of course, that is not conceded by some?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Let me say, in those four, is not there included the strike, hence the strike, I take it from you, is not justifiable, you concede their right to do it regardless of what the cause may be?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They may strike for just the four things or some of them which you say they should not have?

Dr. ELIOT. Then I believe the strike to be unjustifiable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then in some circumstances you think the strike ought to be added to the four you have named?

Dr. ELIOT. I should not like to add that, because under some circumstances the strike is justifiable, in my view.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is only one thing—

Dr. ELIOT. The other four are never justifiable.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There is only one thing after the four which you have mentioned to add to the organization, as I see it, and that will be to the one "strike," and then there would be nothing for them to organize for; an organization would mean nothing.

Dr. ELIOT. Therefore I should not advise you to add strike. I would not add or advise you to put strike in the list.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Behind it all, all the other things, is the word "strike" or not?

Dr. ELIOT. Is what?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Strike. Is not the fact that the organizations do strike—is not that the cause behind it all why the employers, at least a great proportion of them, would not concede to deal with labor as organized labor? Does not that contain in it the closed shop, the boycott, the label, and all those other things of which we hear complaint?

Dr. ELIOT. It has not seemed to be so. On the contrary, I should say it distinctly did not belong in the list with the boycott and limited output and does not belong there. because there is a legitimate right to strike in the sense that "We refuse to work for you under present conditions." There is the rightful thing. The other four are wrongful things.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Ethically the right to strike, Doctor, in your four propositions does not boycott—a certain employer is manufacturing a certain article, and he has trouble with his employees because he pays too small wages, or he works the people too many hours per day, or he works them under insanitary conditions, or a dozen and one things which the men think wrong. They strike. And he sends the work across the street to some other manufacturer to produce for him, and the employees over there refuse to work on that work and strike, too. That is a so-called secondary boycott. Do you think that strike is unjustifiable?

Dr. ELIOT. Utterly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Utterly unjustifiable, regardless of the conditions for which the other men struck?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes. The justifiable strike is, in my thinking, when men or women say, "We will no longer work for you under those conditions." The strike for the purpose of a boycott, to enforce the boycott, does not come under that description. It is for another purpose altogether. It is to promote an attack on somebody else.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The men across the street have not the same right to strike to force the conditions which the men are striking for on the opposite side of the street, to aid in compelling the introduction of what they would consider such reasonable and sane conditions of employment for their fellow employees, fellow members of the organization?

Dr. ELIOT. I think not. It is a sympathetic strike you refer to, I suppose.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. So-called; yes. I do not see anything sympathetic about it, the men in the same organization, of the same family, of the same union, strike simply when in order to force the employer across the street to recognize the conditions which the men are striking for, which are the very worst that can be imaginable.

Now, if they have not that right, then should not the word "strike" be added to your four propositions?

Dr. ELIOT. Not by me, because I believe there is a justifiable strike and there is an unjustifiable strike.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would you give a justifiable strike?

Dr. ELIOT. Just that employees request of their employer an increase of wages or shortening of hours or improvement of the sanitary conditions, and the employer refuses. The employees say, "We will go out."

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then no one can, under that case they would not have the right, ethically or otherwise, to ask the cooperation or assistance of their fellow workers in the battle, the battle would be absolutely between them and their employer, absolutely?

Dr. ELIOT. Not necessarily; not necessarily.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. To where would it go?

Dr. ELIOT. It must not go to the boycott.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Who will step in and adjust it, force an adjustment?

Dr. ELIOT. You call boycotting a means of enforcement, means of compelling the employer, and you make the strike a part of it. That is to say, as far as I understand you, you believe that the strike should be used as a force to compel the employer to obey the unions. Is not that it?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I am trying to get that point: Is it not in effect saying, "I won't buy your article," saying to somebody else, "You must not buy that article—I am not going to manufacture your article, the members of our organization, regardless of where they may be employed, are not going to manufacture it, and a strike at one place; we are against you all through the whole proposition"; would you say that is right?

Dr. ELIOT. I think not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then do you not consider the word "strike" ought to be added to the four propositions?

Dr. ELIOT. No; because there is a justifiable strike which does not go to that length as a fighting force.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. What power or influence does the strike become, then, if a man can not appeal, if the organization can not appeal to its sister organizations and ask for service; to come and render you service to the other organizations it is in violation of the principle.

Dr. ELIOT. The strike which I regard as justifiable is not helpless necessarily by no means. It appeals to public opinion strongly. It may appeal very strongly to public convenience. It is not the useless act, the hopeless act. It has force in itself. It may very well have the force behind it of justice and expediency. The strike does not, it seems to me, which I claim to be a right, does not seem to me to require the additional use of the boycott and label, and so forth, which are other means of compelling other people to do your will, which are elements in the general industrial strike, which, I think, ought to be eliminated by an intelligent people from the present industrial conditions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I will not argue with you, Doctor. But let me see if I can not bring a concrete case. I am not mentioning the name of the firm for any reason, but it just comes to my mind. Take the United States Steel Corporation, it has an immense number of plants scattered all over our country. The men go on strike at the Pittsburgh plant against a reduction of wages. They do not pretend to reduce the wages any place else, but just at Pittsburgh. The men go on a strike against that reduction. The firm proceeds to have its work done at South Chicago, or Milwaukee, or wherever there are other plants located. Now, the men in the other plants say, "We will not work on this material, we will not manufacture this article, because our brothers are on strike at the Pittsburgh plant." Would that be a justifiable strike if they went on strike also?

Dr. ELIOT. Not to my thinking.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Then, all the steel company would have to do would be to keep up the fight with that little portion of their firm or concern or manufacturing plant at Pittsburgh, while they could move the work around to the other plants and starve the men out at Pittsburgh?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That would be justifiable?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard says he would like to ask you some questions.

Commissioner BALLARD. Doctor, there has come up a number of times—I think, this morning—in the questions of Commissioner Lennon, perhaps, a confusion between the rights of workmen to require that their labor unions should have the entire right to work in a certain way, and also the association of the professions, such as doctors and lawyers. Let me see if I have in my mind correctly the thought. From what you stated in regard to colleges, when young men are graduated they take an examination, perhaps, before the State board for their admission to the bar or admission to practice in the professions. They may or may not join these associations of the bar or of the medical profession. Whether they do or do not, they are allowed to practice in that State wherever they have taken out their proper license. Now, is that different at all, for instance, from, we will say, a stationary engineer? The law of the State might say that no man could run a stationary engine unless he had two years' experience, and after that he should apply to the State and get a license. As I understand it, the labor union might say no man in the State shall run a stationary engine unless he also has a card in the stationary engineers' union. Would you consider that an analogous case, where the medical or the legal profession have their associations?

Dr. ELIOT. No; I do not.

Commissioner BALLARD. You approve of the one and not of the other, then?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson says he has a question he would like to ask.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Doctor, you have stated you believe in the organization of men. You have criticized some features of labor organizations. I should be glad to have an expression from you on one point, if you feel free to give it. That is, the officer of a labor union is charged with an offense—we will say it is ethical and immoral—accepting of a bribe or either embarrassing an employer or of embarrassing the rival of an employer. I suppose that you would hold that an utterly improper practice on his part?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Now, would you hold the union which he represented responsible if, on proof of the fact, they failed to discipline him? Would you hold by that that they assumed a responsibility for his act or gave tacit approval to that line of conduct?

Dr. ELIOT. I think they assume a moral responsibility. I do not know whether they assume a legal responsibility or not.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Well, moral responsibility.

Dr. ELIOT. I am not a lawyer.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then, as stockholders in that union, they are responsible morally for the acts of their executives, unless they apply the remedy?

Dr. ELIOT. For instance, if they reelect a man who has been convicted of a crime, that sort of thing—

Commissioner GARRETSON. They accept responsibility, then, for his former acts?

Dr. ELIOT. They seem to me to.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You do not believe in a double standard of ethics for two sets of men?

Dr. ELIOT. No; not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How can the Rockefeller Foundation, as a holder— it being an artificial person under the laws of New York, and the holder of a large amount of bonds of the institution at Roosevelt—evade that same moral responsibility for the acts of its executives?

Dr. ELIOT. The trustees, the directors of the Rockefeller Foundation, have nothing whatever to do with the acts of that particular commercial company which led to a great wrong and investors. They have no connection with it whatever.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Except that they own the stock?

Dr. ELIOT. The stock or bonds.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am using stock, not bonds.

Dr. ELIOT. Stock; yes. They have no connection. As stockholders they have no control over the action of the real management of the company, where the difficulty occurs.

Commissioner GARRETSON. What control has the member of the labor union over its officers, except as stockholders?

Dr. ELIOT. As I understand it, the members of a labor union vote for their officers.

Commissioner GARRETSON. They do.

Dr. ELIOT. When they vote for officers who have been convicted of crime, they take a serious moral responsibility.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How about those stockholders in any corporation who vote for an officer who has been convicted of a crime, or give their proxies to a man they know will vote?

Dr. ELIOT. They will bring upon them an equal moral responsibility if they know what they are doing.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Then there is exactly the same responsibility between the stockholder in one and a stockholder in the other, the same moral responsibility?

Dr. ELIOT. Not necessarily. I think your statement covers too much ground altogether. You say the "same" responsibility. It is different.

Commissioner GARRETSON. How can it be otherwise unless a proper qualification is attached to moral responsibility?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not think I see the bearing of that question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In other words, the stockholder in a million-dollar corporation, can he evade any moral responsibility that the stockholder in a labor union, that has no assets except what those individual stockholders pay in as dues—can one evade the moral responsibility that the other can not?

Dr. ELIOT. Still I do not see what analogy there is between the two cases.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I do not care to press the question.

Chairman WALSH. Dr. Commons would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. You spoke of moral responsibility?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you think that unions should be made legally responsible in civil damages, we will say, in these cases where there is in any case damage done to employers' property?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; I do.

Commissioner COMMONS. How would you accomplish legal responsibility?

Dr. ELIOT. I am not enough of a lawyer; I am not a lawyer at all; I should not know just how to accomplish it. One method of accomplishing it has been suggested, I think, incorporation of unions, in order that the union might be responsible as a person, just as an ordinary corporation is. I do not know whether there would be any other means.

Commissioner COMMONS. But in general you think it should be made legally responsible in civil damages?

Dr. ELIOT. I do; for injuries inflicted by the officers of unions.

Commissioner COMMONS. By the officers of the unions?

Dr. ELIOT. Certainly; just like any other industrial body.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would you extend that responsibility to injury inflicted by a strike?

Dr. ELIOT. Such as destruction of property, for instance?

Commissioner COMMONS. No; just merely a strike as you have defined it.

Dr. ELIOT. No; I should not. If it was—the strike consisted merely in refusing to work for the employer concern.

Commissioner COMMONS. You made a distinction between a justifiable and unjustifiable strike.

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would you extend the responsibility to an unjustifiable strike; could that be made legally responsible for an unjustifiable strike?

Dr. ELIOT. If that unjustifiable strike involved injury to other persons?

Commissioner COMMONS. Yes.

Dr. ELIOT. Or property?

Commissioner COMMONS. So that if a justifiable strike involved injury they would not then be held legally responsible in damages, according to your idea of what it should be?

Dr. ELIOT. Not for injury to the employer which resulted simply from refusing to work for him.

Commissioner COMMONS. What would be an unjustifiable strike? Would a strike to oppose a union employee be unjustifiable?

Dr. ELIOT. I think so.

Commissioner COMMONS. And a strike to have a nonunion man discharged would be unjustifiable?

Dr. ELIOT. Certainly; because it interferes with his liberty.

Commissioner COMMONS. What other strikes would be unjustifiable?

Dr. ELIOT. Boycott strikes, I should say.

Commissioner COMMONS. Sympathetic strikes?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. And you would impose a penalty, a legal responsibility in damages, on the unions for engaging in a sympathetic strike?

Dr. ELIOT. From which damage resulted?

Commissioner COMMONS. From which damage resulted; yes, sir. Would you apply that also to the illustration that Mr. O'Connell mentioned with reference to the Steel Corporation?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; any strike in support of a boycott.

Commissioner COMMONS. And you would impose civil damages, if damage was proved?

Dr. ELIOT. If damage was proved.

Commissioner COMMONS. You would carry the legal responsibility, then, in such form as would be effective either, by incorporation or otherwise, to all unjustifiable strikes?

Dr. ELIOT. I would. But I would like to say this in general with regard to the tendency of the questions to which I have been lately responding, that I have no faith whatever in law—legal action—as conducing to permanent industrial peace. I do not believe that industrial peace can be arrived at by the present process, and that therefore I am hoping and looking for other measures than those of legal responsibility, for instance, for the bringing on of real peace in our industries. Such discussion as we have been lately having has no great interest for me because I despair of arriving at the desirable conclusion, and the peaceful cooperation of capital and labor by any such process as that which has been going on in this country for the last 25 years, including all the legal contrivances.

Commissioner COMMONS. That is based upon your idea that they are simply war measures?

Dr. ELIOT. These are all war measures, and nothing else.

Commissioner COMMONS. You would penalize the unions for using these war measures?

Dr. ELIOT. War measures—I would penalize the employers just as much if they used war measures.

Commissioner COMMONS. Penalize both sides?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would you apply this same rule to the unjustifiable lockout?

Dr. ELIOT. Oh, yes.

Commissioner COMMONS. If it damaged the members of the union?

Dr. ELIOT. The unjustifiable lockout, I suppose, is damage, I should think. Commissioner COMMONS. And to the black list?

Dr. ELIOT. The blacklist, I am not clear about. I have not ever seen any effective black list, and I do not know how that works.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard overlooked one question he would like to ask you, Doctor.

Commissioner BALLARD. Doctor, I had one other question in mind to ask you. You gave us four things that you thought the union perhaps did that they should not do. That if they would abandon they might relieve some of the friction between the workmen and the employer. Have you thought of, or have you considered in your mind, anything that the employing class in industrial work, the owners of manufacturing plants, could do that they should also eliminate from their present methods to relieve the friction between themselves and their employees?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; I have some such things in mind very clearly.

Commissioner BALLARD. Would you mind telling us some of them?

Dr. ELIOT. I think they should invariably procure the cooperation of their employees in the management and discipline of the works, whatever the works are. That has not been much practiced until lately.

Commissioner BALLARD. Do it through the groups of men who are elected by the various groups of men in their employ, and meeting with those foremen or those men selected?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; by the election on the part of the employees in suitable groups of representatives in a committee of management and discipline in which same committee the employers or the managers are represented.

Commissioner BALLARD. Would you let that committee of employees go so far as to request a share of the earnings of the company, a share of the profits in addition to their wages?

Dr. ELIOT. That seems to me to be a separate matter. I am a believer in the profit-sharing question pretty strongly, but that is separate from cooperative management.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask a question or two.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Among the other things here that this commission are called upon to determine is as to whether the great foundations, such as the Rockefeller Foundation, are a good or bad influence to society. Therefore we are inviting all the opinions, all those opinions we value that we can get.

Yesterday at our hearing Dr. Holmes, pastor of the First Unitarian Church, expressed certain views concerning the question of foundations. For your information I would like to present to you his views and his opinion and to ask in how far you concur with this point of view.

Reading from the record, this appears:

“Q. If you were so fortunate or unfortunate as to be the possessor of $100,000,000 that you wanted to use for the common good, what would you do?—A. I should consider, sir, that I was confronted by one of the most difficult problems that could confront any man. For the sake of my own individual integrity I should try as best I could to get rid of that $100,000,000 and my own thought which comes at the moment here, I should want to place it upon the Government, the representative of the people, to assume that great responsibility, as Mr. Roosevelt placed the $40,000 Nobel prize, not in his own hands or in any private personal concern, but in the hands of the Government. The fact that the Government did not know how, or the Government or its citizens did not respond to that generous and wise gift, does not impugn, it seems to me, the wisdom of what was done.

“Q. You would, then, place the matter entirely out of your own hands and put the $100,000,000 into the hands of the employees of the Government?—A. I should get rid of it just as quickly as I could. I feel that no man has a right to such a sum of money.

"Q. Would you have any strings tied to that gift of all the people?—A. I should hope not. I should, not believing it to be ethically right to have such a sum of money, want to be rid of that responsibility.

"Q. You would simply take this $100,000,000 and turn it over to Congress and say, 'Do with it what you consider best'?—A. I should hope—I should suppose I would think the matter over carefully, more carefully than I can at present; but I think that is the thought I should have, and my object would be to get into the hands of the people the money they have produced.

"Q. You mean just put it in the common treasury just to be used for any purpose it wanted, or would you specify?—A. I might think it a matter of wisdom to specify. I do not think I should attach any binding condition, as Mr. Roosevelt did, that this money should be used for any particular industrial benefits, or anything of that kind.

"Q. That is, you would do it without qualification as to the use of the gift?—A. Qualifications of recommendation rather than perhaps insistence or dictation.

"Q. That is, in the nature of suggestions?—A. Yes; in the nature of suggestions as a donor to a college might say, 'I would like to have this used for books or for scholarships or for a library; but if it can be used better, use it as you see fit.'

"Q. Well, if Congress should see fit to take your $100,000,000 and simply put it into the common treasury, and to use it for operating expenses, within a very brief time that $100,000,000 would disappear and comparatively little permanent good might flow from it. Would you think that would be wise?—A. Why, it probably would disappear in serving the interests of the people. The fact that it went back into those interests would not in itself, it seems to me, be an ill. I can imagine the Government might well expend it for purposes that I was not at all concerned with, such as the Army and Navy, for example; but if I made the gift under those conditions I should have to take the result.

"Q. But I take it if you had this vast sum of money, if you were burdened with it, that you would naturally want to use it for the most permanent good, so that the largest number of your fellows might be helped, not temporarily, but that it might be used as a means for continuing to aid those who were worthy of being aided?—A. What right, sir, have I to assume that I have any knowledge as to what is the highest permanent good for this country?

"Q. Well, we have a right to assume that you ought to have more than average knowledge as to what is the highest permanent good, because the country has given you the benefit of its better educational resources and assumes, for example, that you are using that intellectual development in the common interests, and therefore you ought to know more than most of us and that money should be expended so that it will result in the best good and to the greatest number. You are an educator, you are an uplifter, and therefore we have a right to expect more from you than from some of the rest of us.—A. I should feel that those advantages, if they exist, sir, should be used for the exertion of the strongest kind of personal influence as a member of the community; but not as to the dictation, to the administration of such boundless, stupendous source of power as is contained in $100,000,000."

Would you be good enough, Doctor, to tell us in how far you are in agreement with Dr. Holmes's attitude?

Dr. ELIOT. I agree with him in thinking it is a grave responsibility to be the possessor of $100,000,000, and if I had it I should want to get rid of it; but I do not agree with him, I suppose, so far as I can judge his sentiments from this reading, in thinking that the Government is the strongest agency for administering money which is intended to promote the public welfare. We have seen in Germany a large amount of money used by the Government with the intent to promote the public good, but, although that money was used with immense intelligence, it does not seem to have conducted the German people to a fortunate state of mind. Now, free governments, on the other hand, have long relied, and I think are going to rely, on two different modes of promoting the public welfare; one is by the expenditure of the public welfare of money raised by taxation from private property, and the other is what I may call the corporation method of using large sums of money for the promotion of human welfare. The freer governments have already relied on both these methods, and more and more on the second, and I think that we are likely to do the same. We have done it already with one of the chief means for promoting the public welfare, and that is education. Education in this country has been conducted in a very important particular—in large measure—by chartered corporations or boards of trustees established under the public law, and I believe that on the whole the promotion of the public welfare through such chartered educational and religious corporations has been more effectively promoted than by the governmental agencies. And I suppose this will be the case in the future as well as in the past; and moreover, I believe that such corporations, in the training of men and the management of such corporations, is a very great reinforcement of free institutions in general, and an extraordinary enforcement of free institutions and public liberty, and therefore I hope for a prolongation of the great service of these corporations, dependent on public law and dependent also in a great many respects on publicity of their actions toward the public. I look for their continuance and a great development of their services, and I seem to differ from my friend, Dr. Holmes, in this expectation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You do not, then, in common with Dr. Holmes, regard great foundations as a menace to society?

Dr. ELIOT. I do not. I have been in the service of such corporations all my life, I may say; and my testimony may not be regarded as impartial. But I have never known a charitable or educational corporation to do anything which threatened the welfare or the liberties of the American people. I have had no observation of any such corporation—of any such attempts. And I have, on the other hand, seen a great deal of the activity and intelligent promotion of the public welfare by such corporations. There is in them, so far as my experience teaches me, not only no menace, but a very great hope for the Republic.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you know of any wiser or any better or any more effective way than Mr. Rockefeller, for example, could have used his hundred million of dollars than by creating the foundation?

Dr. ELIOT. The Rockefeller Foundation is the largest and freest attempt to do permanent good in the world, not only in this country, but in the world, that I have ever heard of or known anything about—in any country. And in its management it is absolutely free. To use the common expression, there are no strings to it at all, and its purpose seems to be just that which is expressed in its fundamental deed of trust. It is for the benefit of mankind without regard to race, cast, or religion. I have been a member of the board only for about a year. I was not one of the original members, but through all I have seen of it, I should describe it as the most admirable charity that I have ever known anything about. And by "admirable" I mean wise in its objects and effective in its organization.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What is your comment on the criticism or the suggestion that has been offered by some that the State should have a voice in the management of a foundation of that character?

Dr. ELIOT. By "a voice" you mean a representation in its board of directors?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes.

Dr. ELIOT. I have known of several trusts of this general nature in which the State had a voice. For instance, the Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston. That is a very valuable trust and has been of enormous beneficence. Now the management really is in what may be called the hands of private citizens, but the State is represented on the board; and I dare say that that representation has been useful, because the public has felt that it has been represented in the board, and the hospital has worked all over the State, and, indeed, accepts patients from all over New England. But this has been the experience of that particular charity. The State's representatives in the board are never active. They have plenty of good will, but, as a matter of fact, they are not active, and the business of the corporation is done by the other members. Nevertheless that representation in that particular trust may have been useful. Whenever, in my experience, ex-officio members are put into a trust they are liable to be so much occupied with their other duties that they do not get time to attend to the trust in which they are ex-officio members.

Commissioner LENNON. Your opinion, then, I gather, Doctor, is that State representation on the board would prove inefficient?

Dr. ELIOT. In that sense that the ex-officio members appointed by the State would not be able to take part, active part, in the work of the charity, the hospital, or whatever it was.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Therefore I take it that you would regard it as comparatively of little restraining value?

Dr. ELIOT. Precisely. I do think it has a very moderate influence either in restraining value or in the commanding of public confidence. But, then, it may not be the same in the future as it has been in the past.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Taking up the question of the labor problem, Doctor, do you think that organized capital should recognize and deal with organized labor?

Dr. ELIOT. I do recognize it, surely. Deal with it in what sense?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, establish contractual relations?

Dr. ELIOT. Oh, yes; certainly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You think it should?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If you were an employer you would recognize and deal with organized labor?

Dr. ELIOT. Certainly, in the sense of holding communion with them; but I ought to add that I have never been an employer.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Should the funds of organized labor be placed within the reach of the law when labor unions become lawbreakers?

Dr. ELIOT. Should they—that is, is it right?

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Yes; that is, is it right morally and should it be made legally so?

Dr. ELIOT. It seems to me so.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. To hold the unions responsible for their illegal acts?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In answering questions submitted by some of my fellow commissioners, you stated, among other things, that you regard it as unethical and unwise to elect or to reelect officers of their organizations convicted of crime. Do you know of any instances where that has been done—where unions have elected or reelected officers who have been convicted of crime?

Dr. ELIOT. "No" is rather a strong word. I only have such knowledge as one gathers from the publications of the moment. Those publications have given me the impression that, in regard to the dynamiting convictions, the unions reelected men who had been convicted.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have reference to the case of John Ryan, president of the Structural Iron Workers?

Dr. ELIOT. That is one of them.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you regard that as a mistake on the part of organized labor?

Dr. ELIOT. I regard that as something worse than a mistake.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. How would you describe it?

Dr. ELIOT. As a serious moral offense against the community as a whole.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gather also, from what you said, Doctor, that you regard the greatest enemies of organized labor to be within the ranks of organized labor rather than without the ranks of organized labor; and I inferred from that, and, if my inference is in error I will be glad to have you correct it, that you regard a unionist as an enemy to labor if he becomes a lawbreaker in the so-called interest of unions?

Dr. ELIOT. I do; but that is not precisely my point of view when I say that. The boycott and the limitation of output by union labor are injurious to the workmen themselves—to the members of the unions themselves. That is rather, perhaps, going to the bottom of things, but I believe that whatever injures the prospect of a man for happiness in this world is a wrong thing to him; and have we not all seen that the conditions of the laboring men of our country who belong to unions make it impossible for them to be happy. They can not be happy in their work—their daily work—and no one of us could ever be happy in working under such limitations as the unions prescribe. Take, for example, the limitations of the output. Now, no ambitious, energetic, zealous man can be happy or contented even under conditions of a limited output. That condition alone makes it impossible for him to have a happy life. And that is what I mean by saying that the conditions imposed on labor by the unions are seriously injurious to the men themselves, and that is the worst wrong that the unions do, in my opinion, the injury that they inflict on their own members. Therefore, my reply to your question, sir, would be that these policies of the unions are unhappy to the last degree, and, therefore, injurious not only to the unions but to the entire community.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gather from what you say, Doctor, that your conception of one of the causes that lead to human happiness is development of the individual to his highest efficiency? That is, the highly efficient individual is naturally more happy than the inefficient individual or the individual whose efficiency has been stunted and blunted? Do I understand you correctly?

Dr. ELIOT. That is what I believe, most assuredly.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And therefore anything that tends to minimize the efficiency of the individual is harmful to the individual?

Dr. ELIOT. Precisely. And that is the only conclusion to which any man can come whose life has been spent in education. The whole object of education is to develop the individual to his highest capacity, not only for production, but for enjoyment and happiness, and that is what these unions cut all their members off from.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I take it, then, Doctor, if you and I were unionists and the union should say to us you shall do so much and no more, thus minimizing our efficiency, it would be an enemy in disguise?

Dr. ELIOT. Not much disguised, I should say. I never would consent to work under such conditions, and there has never been a moment in my life when I would have consented to work under such conditions, and that I believe to be true of most vigorous and independent men.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You speak also of the fact that in your judgment industrial peace can not be arrived at by present methods. What do you regard as a weak spot in the present method?

Mr. ELIOT. The present methods are fight—both sides. I can look for no permanent peace out of such conditions. And peace to me means conditions of community happiness and of personal happiness.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, what methods would you substitute for the method of fight?

Dr. ELIOT. Publicity, cooperative management, and profit sharing in great variety.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gather, then, that you are a believer in the wisdom of industrial democracy?

Dr. ELIOT. Entirely—in a proper sense; in a proper sense.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you would give labor a voice in industrialism?

Dr. ELIOT. In the management; yes, sir—in general, and in discipline.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From your observation, Doctor, what do you think is the present tendency? Is the tendency, so far as you can see, for a higher degree of industrial peace or for a lesser degree of industrial peace?

Dr. ELIOT. I have not been able to make out the tendency. As I think I have said before, up to three or four years ago I thought that the tendency was to continued fighting without peace, but latterly I have begun to think that there are a good many forces making toward peaceful adjustments.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Do you or do you not believe, Doctor, that much of the industrial friction that has taken place in this country in more recent years is due very largely to misunderstanding—largely to the fact that each side looks at the situation through one eye in the place of looking at the situation through both eyes—

Dr. ELIOT (interrupting). Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK (continuing). Due to the fact that the one side does not put itself in the other fellow's place?

Dr. ELIOT. I think that is part of it—ignorance on both sides of the other fellow's feeling, and also of human nature in general. But I am afraid there is another serious difficulty, and that is the demonstration and manifestation of intense selfishness on both sides—the manifestation of selfishness being most acute, I should say, on the side of labor.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you a few questions, Doctor, which I will put to you now. First, with respect to the economic doctrine bearing on the tariff. What has been the prevailing doctrine of those business interests of New England from whose resources the fund of Harvard College have been largely drawn?

Dr. ELIOT. Some of the fund—no very large proportion—of Harvard College came in before the tariff question arose in this country. We have seventeenth-century and eighteenth-century funds. The greater part of them have come in the nineteenth century and the twentieth. In the nineteenth century I should say that a considerable portion of the funds came from men who had been believers in protection.

Chairman WALSH. And what has been the characteristic doctrine of Harvard College economists on the same subject?

Dr. ELIOT. There has been no characteristic doctrine on the subject of protection or the tariff in Harvard College. We never had a professor of political economy until 1870-71, I think, and since that time we have had four or five professors at work at the same time. There has never been an agreement of opinion among them on the tariff. The professor that gave a quarter part of his time to political economy before 1870 was an extreme protectionist, and he taught protection quite actively, with the result that among his disciples a good many free traders were developed. But then in general Harvard College enjoys a very great degree of freedom, both on the part of the teachers and upon the part of the students on all subjects, I may say.

Chairman WALSH. One other question. Following the line of your testimony that the boycott was never justified, this question has been handed to me:

If strikers of one shop were to announce to the public that the products that were being manufactured in a nonunion shop were being manufactured under exactly the same insanitary conditions under which they struck and in which the public is deeply concerned, would you call that a justifiable boycott?

Dr. ELIOT. So far as giving to the public this information, entirely so. That is merely an element, as I understand it, in publicity—publicity of the existing conditions.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard says he has one other question he would like to ask you.

Commissioner BALLARD. Doctor, I was afraid there was a slight misunderstanding occurred, and I would like to have you clear it up, and that is this: Do you consider the responsibility of a stockholder in a corporation the same as the responsibility of a bondholder? Do you see any difference in the responsibilities of those two methods of ownership?

Dr. ELIOT. Yes; I do.

Commissioner BALLARD. If then, for instance, one of your foundations held bonds in an industrial corporation, you might not feel any responsibility, whereas if it held stock you might feel some responsibility. The questions that Commissioner Garretson brought out, I am afraid, left you or your expressions a little confused in that regard.

Dr. ELIOT. The responsibility of a stockholder, so far as my observation goes, is limited to a choice of the directors. Now, the bondholders have not any such responsibility as that. They have nothing to do with it. Therefore it seems to me the responsibility of the bondholder is really different from the responsibility of the stockholder. Is that what you meant?

Commissioner BALLARD. Yes; I thought there was a little confusion.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock, I believe, has a question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Just one more question, Doctor, if you will bear with me. Referring to the question of foundations, if you had all the wealthy men of the country assembled before you and were discussing with them the wisest way to use their wealth, would you or not advise them to follow the example of Mr. Rockefeller, Mr. Carnegie, and others and to establish foundations to be used for the common good?

Dr. ELIOT. I should not know any better advice to give them. All methods of using great sums of money for the public welfare, to do good with in permanent ways, are difficult—very difficult. I have never seen as much care used in setting up large funds for the permanent benefit of the public as in the case of the Rockefeller Foundation, in the sense of the public or in the sense of the whole world. I have never seen greater care exercised than in those cases of the disposition of the permanent benefit to the people of the great sums of money such as have come into the hands of the Rockefeller family.

Chairman WALSH. You may be excused permanently now, Doctor, and we are very thankful to you for your testimony.

We will now stand adjourned until 2 o'clock, to meet in this room at 2 o'clock sharp.

(Whereupon, at 12.30 o'clock p. m. of this Friday, January 29, 1915, a recess was taken until 2 o'clock p. m.)

AFTER RECESS—2 P. M.

Chairman WALSH. The house will be in order, please, and we will proceed.
Mr. John Hays Hammond.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN HAYS HAMMOND.

Chairman WALSH. State your name, please.

Mr. HAMMOND. John Hays Hammond.

Chairman WALSH. What is your place of residence?

Mr. HAMMOND. Gloucester, Mass.

Chairman WALSH. What is your business?

Mr. HAMMOND. Engineering.

Chairman WALSH. I believe some questions were submitted to you by this commission, Mr. Hammond?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Have you prepared answers to the same?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Would you prefer to just read the questions and answers, Mr. Hammond?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think I would, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Please do so, then, and I would suggest that you pitch your voice a little higher for the reason that it is difficult for some of the commission to hear and also the auditors in the rear of the room.

Mr. HAMMOND. I will do so; but in presenting this statement I wish to absolve any of my associates in the National Civic Federation for any expression of views that I give. I am chairman of the industrial, economic department, and I have not consulted with them as to the statements I make, and it is therefore only fair to state that. Moreover, as I shall touch on some subjects which may not be very popular, I wish to state very emphatically that I have no connection whatsoever with any trusts, directly or indirectly, nor have I ever had, nor am I interested in a protective tariff, but on the contrary my interests are elsewhere. I only state this to give a little credibility to my position in making statements that may seem in conflict with them.

Now, as to the question of responsibility of stockholders and directors, I would state that the stockholders of corporations are only remotely responsible for the labor conditions which exist in it and for the social conditions which are produced, since the stockholders delegate their responsibility to a board of directors of their choosing. It would obviously be impossible for stockholders to be conversant with the details of operation of a corporation, and it would be impracticable for them to exercise administrative functions. Directors are responsible for the general policy of corporations and are specially responsible for the executives whom they select to conduct its operation; but the responsibility directly falls upon the manager as far as the labor conditions of the corporation are concerned. The general labor policy may be determined by the board of directors, and should be determined by the board of directors, but the details as to the carrying on of this policy must be left to the manager, who, from a constant and intimate connection with the labor conditions arising in the operation of the corporation, is more competent to determine the details of the labor problems than the directors of the corporations.

As a matter of fact, no high-class manager would submit to the constant dictation by the directors of a corporation as to the details of administration, which are often responsible for the beginning of labor troubles. Moreover, in the interest of all concerned, stockholders, directors, and wage earners themselves, the manager should be experienced in handling labor, one thoroughly conversant with labor conditions and especially with local labor conditions, and he must be backed up by his board of directors to be able to carry out the general policy of the corporation; but there should be a managing director to keep the other directors in close touch, by personal visits to the property, of conditions there. The directors, or some committee of directors, should be compelled in the case of labor disturbances to make a personal visit to the property and acquaint themselves with the actual conditions. The directors of corporations rarely have had the kind of experience necessary to qualify them to deal directly with labor conditions, their activities having been confined as a rule to the financial management of corporations, and in that sphere men of ability, experience, and high standing are required to protect the interests of the stockholders and to so finance the corporations as to enable the manager to carry out his work under those advantageous conditions; and this in turn should result in more steady employment and better wages for the employees.

Every successful manager knows the importance of establishing good relations between the management and the employees and that it is bad business—it does not pay—to have seething discontent among the employees. For that, if for no other reason, a good manager would endeavor to win the confidence and respect of his employees by giving them fair treatment, able and resolute management, and by showing a personal interest in their welfare. These are the underlying conditions that exist between stockholders, the executives of a corporation, and employees; but, of course, in practice the personal equation comes into play. Often the local managers are hampered by unreasonable and unwise interference by the directors, the effect of which is to discredit them with the employees and to weaken their authority. On the other hand, the managers themselves are too often unreasonable and arbitrary and are directly responsible for well-founded discontent, which may develop into labor troubles. Then, too, managers have often to deal with unreasonable employees who have become disaffected because of the pernicious activities of labor agitators. Very much of the trouble between corporations and the employees is caused by the walking delegate and this is especially so where the dominating element among the employees is foreign labor, ignorant as to American labor and social conditions. Such a situation is often aggravated by the political demagogue, who plays his selfish rôle in abetting the labor agitator in order to secure the labor vote. There is no doubt also that the responsibility for this condition very often lies with the large corporations, which have for selfish purposes employed an undue percentage of the kind of labor to which I have referred because of the lower wages paid, to the exclusion of higher-grade labor, which, having been elevated to the higher standards of American living and citizenship, require higher wages to maintain those standards. I regard a policy of that kind on the part of corporations as not only culpable but shortsighted, and one which will always be costly in the end. If we are to build up responsible citizenship in this country we can not lower the standards of living of the wage earner. Unless the great protected industries of this country can pay an adequate wage they should not be accorded the benefits of a protective tariff. This is good civics, good business, as well as humanitarianism.

As to the broad question of unemployment, the underlying causes are economic, but there are other factors which accentuate and sometimes determine conditions locally. The question of supply and demand is, of course, basic. It is unfortunate that the solution of great problems of this country, purely economic in character, is not always dissociated from politics. Legislation dealing with the tariff, the currency, the trusts, and other economic subjects vital to the welfare of the entire Nation is in a large measure determined on strictly political lines, indeed is often determined by superficial orators on the political stump in times of a heated campaign, rather than by the deliberations of business men in boards of trade.

One of the most important adverse factors in the problem of the unemployed is the "briefless" lawyer who, despite an absolute lack of experience in business affairs of any kind whatsoever, is selected to legislate on economic problems of national import. But the self-centered business man is in a large measure responsible for this condition, because of his failure to take an interest in civic and political affairs. This condition is due to the fact that at one time in our political history some great corporations, by generous contributions to campaign funds, were able to elect legislators who would attend to matters of legislation for them. Fortunately for the country and, indeed, for the corporations themselves, this order has changed, and large corporations would now be perfectly satisfied to receive only what is due them under equitable laws. But the pendulum has swung too far in the other direction, and political demagogues, taking advantage of the unpopularity of corporations, which some years ago was in a large measure deserved, because of their reprehensible practices, are still at times making political capital out of this circumstance by promoting anticorporation legislation.

As bearing on the question of unemployment, one of the economic lessons taught by the present European war is the complete vindication of the fiscal policy which has resulted in the building up and expansion of our great national industries. We learn more clearly than ever the interdependence of our industries; the total dependence, for example, of that great industry of agriculture on the prosperity of the manufacturing industry, for in the manufacturing centers it finds its best market. We learn the importance of all of our industries to the extensive classes employed in our great transportation systems, in our agencies of distribution, etc., and we must conclude, therefore, that the keynote of our economic and fiscal legislation must ever be to preserve unimpaired the integrity of our home industries and the purchasing power of our domestic markets.

With a rapidly increasing population we obviously must extend our industries, but we must nevertheless not lose sight of the fact that overextension inevitably causes depression in times of business recession. Indeed, authorities agree that we are now rapidly approaching the limit—that is to say, the point of saturation—in our domestic markets, at least in so far as present demands under normal conditions are concerned. It is obvious, therefore, that we must either curtail the capacity of our factories, which would result in throwing out of employment millions of wage earners, and the disorganization of complementary industries as well, or we must depend upon the exploitation of foreign markets for the relief of our congested home industries.

In competing with foreign markets we are to meet our great trade rivals, who have by years of experience and by the expenditure of colossal sums obtained a foothold more or less firm in the markets we seek. Therefore, to successfully compete with these nations we must secure for ourselves every advantage that can be derived from the most efficient exploitation of our national industries, fostered by constructive legislation at home, and promoted by able commercial diplomacy abroad. This has been the policy of Germany, and its success is evidenced by the unparalleled strides she has made in the development of her great foreign commerce.

Economics is too often subordinated to politics. The vehement attacks of our Government on corporations, indiscriminately impeaching the integrity of corporate practices—I say indiscriminately—and of our business men, has not only prejudiced our position as exporters in foreign markets, but has increased the difficulty of obtaining in foreign financial centers capital for our industrial needs. This has a far-reaching consequence, having regard to the fact that we have borrowed from abroad upwards of five billions of dollars for the development of our home industries. It is by our excess of exports that we are able to pay the interest on this large sum, and to gradually wipe out this indebtedness.

There has been much unintelligent prejudice, partly inspired for political purposes, against what we call "big business," but the people of the country should be convinced that unless our industries can be developed on large-scale production, as is the practice of our European rivals, we will be seriously handicapped in our quest for foreign markets, because of the inevitably higher cost of production at home. England permits, France encourages, and Germany frequently compels combinations, which inure to the advantage of cheap production and the country's export trade.

One of the essentials of efficiency in production is industrial peace. This is too large a subject to discuss at present, but, while realizing the complexity of the problem, I do not believe that I am too optimistic in expressing the opinion that the relations between employer and employee are better to-day than for many years past. The employer is recognizing the justice and the advantage, when properly conducted, of the principle of collective bargaining, and both employer and employee recognize more than ever their interdependence and their reciprocal obligations as well, and with the spirit of fair play that generally prevails, and must ultimately prevail, we have every reason to believe that the labor agitators, on the one hand, and the unreasonable employers, many of them on the other, will soon become less serious obstacles to industrial peace generally.

While I am opposed to the principle of the closed shop, believing it to be thoroughly un-American, I nevertheless strongly favor labor organizations when the leadership is in the hands of the best class of labor leaders, and I believe that employers of labor would do well to support labor organizations of that kind to prevent the growth of organizations of the radical stripe.

I do not believe that there are any irreconcilable differences of an "irrepressible conflict" between capital and labor. While it may be true that both are not equally benefited by the maintenance of industrial peace, it is true that they both are greatly hurt by industrial warfare. I believe that if the managers of corporations would more generally take into their confidence their employees as to the business necessities and as to the disastrous effect of adverse legislation to their business, they would not only stimulate the interest of the employees in their work, but also enlist their support and influence against injurious legislation. It is necessary for managers of corporations to impress upon employees that they are "in the same boat," and for their own safety they both should oppose either political demagogues or selfish labor agitators "rocking the boat."

One of the great labor problems is efficiency. Some years ago America enjoyed a great advantage in industry—the superiority of American labor in respect of its productivity—compared with the labor of other countries. Unfortunately we now enjoy that advantage only in a limited measure, owing to the improvement in the standard of foreign labor through vocational education, scientific training, and especially owing to the introduction into those countries of improved machinery, for the great part of American design or manufacture. Therefore, if we are to compete with foreign countries, and at the same time maintain the higher wages of the American wage earner, we must attain the highest possible efficiency of labor without, of course, the imposition of the "speeding-up" system, which is in all respects objectionable.

I believe that American industry would be greatly benefited by the extension of vocational training, for those who directly supervise labor and for a more general scientific training for the higher officials themselves, and, indeed, for the directors of corporations.

It is said that "he is idle who is not best employed." There are certainly a lot of misfits not only in industry but in all branches of human activities, because of the fact that they were not properly sorted out in their collegiate training. The more scientifically trained leaders of industry there are the more men will be added to the producing and taken away from the nonproducing class of the community. I believe that it is a misfortune for the country and adds to the number of the unemployed that the universities are yearly turning out an overproduction of nonproducers, who crowd into the already congested so-called "polite professions." Graduates of technical schools would be a far better asset to the Nation.

The people of the country, of all classes, irrespective of political affiliations, are beginning to recognize the fact that politicians have, in a large measure, by their indiscriminate attacks on national industries, created a lack of confidence, which has contributed to periods of depression. For that reason there is to-day a strong revulsion of feeling throughout the country against the attitude of such legislators, and I believe we have every reason to hope that the compelling force of enlightened public opinion will in the future result in legislation facilitating rather than has hitherto been the case, obstructing the processes of industrial development, while at the same time adequately safeguarding the interests of the State, community, and individual. There will always be social unrest—not often, it is to be hoped—in the form of accentuated discontent, but due to a natural and commendable desire for social betterment, a perfectly normal and healthy aspiration, which makes for progress unless it is stimulated by the pernicious activity of designing and unscrupulous individuals, or unless it is repressed by selfish, greedy employers of labor until it becomes abnormal and radical and then attempts to progress by revolution rather than by evolution.

I believe that many strikes and lockouts could be prevented by boards of mediation if these boards were composed of men who commanded the respect and confidence of the community. An impartial report, made public, by a board of high character on the issues in controversy between the employer and employee would so crystallize public sentiment on the merits of the controversy as to make it unprofitable for whichever side is adjudged in the wrong by the board to continue the strike or lockout in defiance of public opinion. It would enable the public to judge between good employers and bad employers and good labor organizations and bad organizations, and to be able to discriminate in that way is advantageous to employer, employee, and the public.

"Do the existing private and public agencies deal adequately with these problems?"

I do not believe that existing private and public agencies deal adequately with these problems. I favor a national employment bureau to facilitate the distribution of labor and to prevent its congestion in certain centers, which, of course, is the direct cause of unemployment at that point.

It is better for the job to hunt the man than for the man to hunt the job. It is better to have too few men than are necessary for present requirements of labor, than to have a surplus of labor and men go unemployed and hungry.

Furthermore, I believe that every wage earner in the country capable of working and willing to work is entitled to employment, and that our immigration laws should have this important matter in view. To assure the employment of these wage earners would not, I believe, be a very difficult problem, as the surplus labor would occur only at rare intervals, in which case the Federal Government should provide employment, rather than have self-respecting and deserving wage earners become objects of charity.

This I know is contrary to the laissez faire theory of economics, but is, nevertheless, a prerequisite to removing just causes of social unrest; for I believe that the criterion of good government should be the degree attained in the prevention and alleviation of misery, rather than in the promotion of prosperity. Great national wealth, even though it be widely distributed, insuring general prosperity, is by no means indicative of good government if there exist in the community in which we live preventable or remediable distress among any considerable number of its citizens.

"Do the large resources of endowed foundations constitute a possible menace? If so, what regulation or supervision is desirable?"

I do not believe that any menace exists which can not be obviated by making public the object and the operations of the foundation. There can be no doubt that such foundations have contributed inestimable service to the welfare of the people generally, and that many of the larger foundations are managed very much more efficiently than many private charities, the direction of which is more or less desultory. They are, as a rule, conducted by men of achievement and not by place seekers.

I have no sympathy with stimulated discontent, and I believe all capitalists who are not animated solely by considerations of present expediency, but who, having ordinary provision, must recognize the fact that the safety valve upon which the country must depend for industrial peace is the opportunity for the wage earner to earn a livelihood for himself and family according to the American standards of living, and, moreover, to have the opportunity for advancement provided he possesses character, ability, and energy, and is willing to make the personal sacrifices always essential to success.

Profit sharing undoubtedly is an important step in the solution of this problem. It should not have any of the taint of charity, but should be incorporated in the wage to which the wage earner is entitled.

Safety devices in industry, proper sanitation, etc., I regard as a part of the mechanism of industrial operations and not a concession to the welfare of the wage earners.

Employers of labor should anticipate its just demands and not be compelled to make unreasonable concessions to labor at the point of the pistol.

While I have great sympathy for the oppressed of other lands, and especially for those politically oppressed, I believe that "charity begins at home," and that no immigration should be allowed to threaten the maintenance of the American standard of living among the industrials by an oversupply of labor, even though it be temporarily of advantage to our national industrial development. I would prefer the test of admission of immigrants be determined by the character of the immigrant, the reputation he has borne in his home country, and his availability as a future member of the body politic, rather than by a literacy test, because I believe that the educational feature can be supplied by our public-school education, whereas moral delinquency will always be a menace to our democracy.

I do not believe in what is called, as I understand it, the democratization of labor; that is, to have industrial methods, processes, and direction determined by employees, as this would result in bringing politics—that is to say, intrigues—and other factors, which would have an undermining and subversive influence in industrial operations. But I believe thoroughly in the men in each department of the management keeping in close touch with the work of those departments, and that has been done in all the activities that I have attempted, with the result that I have never had a strike on the part of any of the employees I have had all over the world.

Such a policy would, I am sure, be opposed by labor itself, recognizing that it is absolutely incompetent to determine the technical and complex questions involved in industrial operations, and that those problems must be left to technically trained and experienced specialists.

Chairman WALSH. I have been asked to ask you the following questions, reasonably short questions: Do you believe that all the people of this Nation are properly fed and sufficiently clothed?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not.

Chairman WALSH. Until they are so, can there be any such thing as overproduction?

Mr. HAMMOND. Overproduction of what—what do you mean?

Chairman WALSH. Of wealth.

Mr. HAMMOND. Of supplies?

Chairman WALSH. Of supplies.

Mr. HAMMOND. Well, the overproduction of supplies would be determined by the market for the supplies. I think that has really no direct bearing on the fact that there is unemployment in the industry.

Chairman WALSH. Is not the inequality of distribution of wealth responsible for the inexplicable condition of unemployed land and unemployed factories existing at the same time with unemployed men and women?

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a difficult question. I may say this, that I believe that we must arrive at a better distribution and more equitable distribution of wealth. Now, I am not quite sure that I have got that question—

Chairman WALSH. Perhaps I had better read it again, because it was written and sent to me, and I will read it over: "Is not the inequality of the distribution of wealth responsible for the inexplicable condition of unemployed land and unemployed factories at the same time with unemployed men and women?"

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a very difficult question to answer, because it does not seem to me to be so very clear. The interrogator himself in that confessed that it was inexplicable, you know. But if I understand the meaning, the factories being idle and lands not being developed, and there being unemployed, I think that has very little to do with where wealth is located, because, as a matter of fact, that wealth goes again into industrial development. It is not locked up. It is helping out the development of the country. That has nothing to do with the question of equitable distribution.

Chairman WALSH. I suppose that answers the question.

Mr. HAMMOND. I would state this on that very question—I think I see where it is pointed—that while I would much prefer to see a more equitable division, I do not think that large wealth itself should be criticized. The question should be asked not so much what a man has, but how did he get it and what he is doing with it. That would be my criterion.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Ballard has a question or two that he says he would like to ask you, Mr. Hammond.

Commissioner BALLARD. Mr. Hammond, you speak of the American conditions of living and of men being educated up to the American conditions of living. The statistics show that we have had in the past practically a million immigrants a year. Now, if they are going to require immediate American conditions of living, should they also be educated to the American conditions of production, or would they be given immediately the American conditions of living, which means a certain wage, probably three or four times what they have been getting in the old country, without their being immediately educated up to giving the American output of labor?

Mr. HAMMOND. Well, I think it would take some time to develop them up to the American standard of production; but I should nevertheless insist that those men be paid the American standard of wage so as to make it impossible for the great corporations to bring in a whole lot of cheap labor and dump it on America. I should make no incentive to the great corporations to bring in that cheap labor, provided—the basic position should be that we must preserve the American standard of wage. We can not expect to develop good citizens in this country if we are going to make our men come down to the low level of living that the foreigners are willing or have to as a matter of fact assume. Now, that is the basic principle, I think, in the question.

Commissioner BALLARD. You spoke of stimulated discontent. By that do you mean that where factories are apparently working satisfactorily and under satisfactory conditions that paid organizers come to those factories and plants and stimulate discontent? Is that what you mean by stimulated discontent?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir; I do.

Commissioner BALLARD. In speaking of the limitation on immigration, you know that has been up recently—

Mr. HAMMOND (interrupting). Yes.

Commissioner BALLARD. And I do not want to inject any politics into this question, but I have the impression that the immigration that has existed in the years past was more or less voluntary to this country. In fact, as we all know, in the early stages of the Nation it was a great and serious and difficult thing for a man and his family to come to this country at all, and it required great sacrifice and effort. It has been suggested that immigration in the last few years has been immensely stimulated by the foreign steamship companies. In fact, that there have been a great many steamship companies, on account of the desire of other countries to have ships which they could use in time of war, and those ships desired to get traffic or tonnage from that bringing in of immigrants, just like railroads solicit freight, and that they have stimulated immigration, and that that has been one cause of our perhaps large overimmigration and more than the country could absorb. Have you given any study to that particular view?

Mr. HAMMOND. I have not in detail; but I am absolutely convinced that it is true. I think a great many of them land labor and dump them where convenient and where it happens to suit their purpose. I happen to know something about that thing, because I was chairman of this American committee that looked after the immigrants when they were landed here for some years. We saw the terrible straits they were in without money and without anything else, and evidently brought over here not for their own benefit but for some advantage to the steamship companies, to make all they could out of them, and the thing ought to be very thoroughly regulated and supervised by the Government.

Commissioner BALLARD. Our commission has been directed by Congress to study the causes of industrial unrest. Do you think that is one of the causes?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is a very serious question, and I think the restriction should be made on the other side of the water and not here. I think that is where the investigation and the Ellis Island should be established, through our consulates in the countries where these men come from, so that they might find out the history of the men and make it up to the men to justify their coming into this country rather than have us justify or find a reason why they should not come. Let them bring certificates of good moral character. That is possible.

Commissioner BALLARD. Would you think it would be possible to perhaps make some limitation on the advertising methods of the steamship companies, which they indulge in to persuade people to come to this country, whether they wanted to come or not?

Mr. HAMMOND. Where they are misleading and misrepresenting facts and conditions there most certainly should.

Commissioner BALLARD. Would you prefer some such method or a literacy test, or both?

Mr. HAMMOND. I would not have the literacy test. A great many good people came to this country who could not read and write and have developed into some of our very best citizens. I think that is a very mean and narrow test. It is a character test that I would advocate; and that is not simply academic in character. We can determine by investigation a man's status in the community where he lives. If he came from a bad family and had bad antecedents, we could stop him from coming.

Commissioner BALLARD. You would strongly urge some effort along that line?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do, very strongly, Mr. Commissioner.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask a question or two.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Just one expression of your own experience that I would like to have, Mr. Hammond—if you feel free to make it—and it is because of the experience you have had that I would desire the opinion. Have you or have you not known of many instances where an intelligent and liberal and humane manager was absolutely blocked from making the reforms that he believed to be proper and that he should make in the way of hours, or the conditions under which the men were working, or wages, by what has been referred to in these hearings frequently as absentee landlordism and impersonal direction?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; that has come under my observation; but I never knew a self-respecting manager who would remain after that. He would leave.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If he was strong enough to stand that influence he would disregard it.

Mr. HAMMOND. Either disregard it and defy it or tender his resignation.

Commissioner GARRETSON. But if he did not have the moral fiber to stand against it he would simply go with the stream?

Mr. HAMMOND. He simply went with the stream and lost all the respect of his men and then trouble began.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Isn't that very factor one of the great elements entering into the misunderstanding between man and master?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think it is.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Weinstock has a question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I gather from your statement, Mr. Hammond, that you deny the employer the advantage of the protective tariff unless he paid the standard wage?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; unless he would pay a wage sufficient to keep up the American standard; yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Well, now, how would you put your idea into practice; into practical operation?

Mr. HAMMOND. I am presupposing that he will be accorded protection that will enable him to pay the difference between the cost of labor abroad and here. That is fundamental. If he gets that wage and professes not to be able to pay a living wage to his employee I should cut off the benefits of the tariff.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Suppose there were 100 employers engaged in an industry and 90 per cent of them would pay what would be regarded as a standard wage, and 10 per cent paid a wage below the standard; how would you apply your ideas to that 10 per cent?

Mr. HAMMOND. Of course there are times of temporary expediency, when it might be a question of arrangements between the employer and the employee, that he will skin along, times are hard, and he will be able to economize and get down to the barest necessities, but that should not prevail long because, as a matter of fact, if the industry does not pay a wage charity has to do it. The wage has to come from somewhere or else we will have demoralized our labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. One other thing: Suppose that became a permanent, chronic condition, that 90 per cent of the employers did pay the standard wage and 10 per cent of the employers persistently and intentionally paid less than the standard wage. What is not clear to me is how you would employ your thought of denying them the benefit of the protective tariff.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a difficult question in practical application. It would not be fair to take it off of the 90 per cent.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. For your information, Mr. Hammond, in this connection, it may be interesting to know that Australia tried that very idea. Australia started out on the theory that the protective tariff was intended not for the employer, but for the worker, in order that the worker should be insured a living wage. A law was enacted by the Parliament of Australia to the effect that whenever it could be shown that an employer was not paying the standard wage he would be individually denied the protection of the tariff; but that law was thrown out as unconstitutional, and would doubtless be unconstitutional in this country as well.

Mr. HAMMOND. I had in mind advocating a minimum wage; I had in mind to employ that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would establish a minimum wage?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the employer who failed to pay that minimum wage would be individually denied the protection of the tariff?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I suppose you are not sufficiently familiar with the legal phase of it to know whether it would be constitutional?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; but I hope we can make the law conform to the necessities of the case, for the welfare of the country.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. I also gather from your statement that you are not a believer in what has been termed as "industrial democracy"?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; if I understand the definition of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. If I understand the definition of industrial democracy as given by Mr. Brandeis, who is an advocate of it himself, it is giving labor a voice in the management of the industry.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not believe in that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you would differ from Mr. Brandeis and Dr. Elliot, who testified this morning?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir; I do not think that either one of those gentlemen has had anything to do with labor.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have been an employer of labor?

Mr. HAMMOND. I have all my life, and that does not work out. Labor does not want idealism. They are practical, and labor knows that that is impracticable. I heard Dr. Eliot testify this morning to that effect, and I beg to differ with him.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. At what point would the scheme fail?

Mr. HAMMOND. The scheme would fail when labor was taken in beyond that of an advisory capacity. When it came to directing it would absolutely fail, and labor itself knows that it would be unsafe. That would be one point, and it would fail from the fact that labor had not been trained—that is, the average laborer—it would not have the ability to produce at a profit; it would close up industry and it would be bad for all. I can not see one thing that could be urged in its defense.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. But is it not a fact, Mr. Hammond, that so far as the question of wage, and the question of hours, and the question of working conditions, that so far as those questions are concerned, that you practically have industrial democracy where there is collective bargaining? That is, the labor there has a voice?

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a very different thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where would you draw the line? At what point, if you admit that collective bargaining is practically industrial democracy, and give labor a voice in that particular?

Mr. HAMMOND. They ought to have that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Where would you draw the line of industrial democracy?

Mr. HAMMOND. There comes the question of where a certain number of hours of labor can be determined—the number of hours that labor in a special direction can do efficient work and keep its health and find enough time to be human, and I think that does not require any expert to accomplish; but when it comes to laying out great metallurgical works or railroad enterprises, I do not think that labor knows anything about it or professes to.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then you draw the line at anything that affects the immediate welfare of the worker, so far as wages, hours, and working conditions are concerned?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, you would give him a voice in determining those questions of hours, wages, and working conditions, but not beyond that?

Mr. HAMMOND. Not beyond that; no, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You draw the line at that?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir; I draw the line at that.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. We have had employers, very large employers, testify before this commission, Mr. Hammond, who admitted that organized labor was a good thing; that labor had the right to organize and should, in its own interests, organize. They have even admitted it was a good thing for the other fellow to do with, but that when it came to themselves they wanted none of it.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a selfish view; that is the view of the employers who generally want to reform the other fellow. [Laughter.]

Chairman WALSH. You will please preserve order and make no audible expression of your feelings.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You are not in sympathy, then, Mr. Hammond, I take it, with this kind of employers?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; I am not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You have been a large employer of labor, have you not?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And as you stated a little while ago, you never had a strike?

Mr. HAMMOND. I never had a strike of my own laborers.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Have you dealt with organized labor?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; I have dealt with organized labor, the open shop, and the closed shop, and all kinds of shops. I never had a strike or was connected with a strike, except the strike in the Coeur d'Alene district, where I protected my labor, and that is where the strike occurred.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You can not give the commission an expression of your opinion on scientific management?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not think I am as well qualified as a good many others, and I would rather not, for the same reason that I have not answered very definitely the questions about the foundation.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The question of scientific management is one that this commission has gone into quite extensively, and there seems to be a difference of opinion, and you have been called on to give your opinion of scientific management, and we are anxious to know whether it is a good or a bad thing, and we have heard conflicting testimony on that point. We have had witnesses who pointed out that scientific management is good for the employers, is good for the workers, and good for society; and we have had other witnesses who claimed that scientific management was simply a system of speeding up in disguise, and that it was meant in the end to exploit the workers.

Mr. HAMMOND. I am against that, as I said in my statement.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. From what you know of scientific management, and I suppose you have been more or less in touch with it, assuming that it is properly and wisely managed, do you think it is a good or a bad thing for the worker and for the employer and for society?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think a little introduction of scientific management would be very good, but there might be an abuse of it. I see the other side of it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, unabused; you favor unabused scientific management?

Mr. HAMMOND. Unabused scientific management. And I have not had very much experience with that. That is one of the new fads that has come in lately. I have gone on the good, plain, old business plan of getting the best work I could out of my men. I have had to work not as closely perhaps in the old days as may be necessary now where we have to skim the thing down pretty close.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. As a man of long experience in handling labor, Mr. Hammond, what have you found to be the best ways to get the best results out of labor?

Mr. HAMMOND. To go right straight to them, get in touch with them. That is the way to do it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, is that physically possible with a man who employs a great many men? If you had 10,000 men, could you do that; if you had that many under your control? You could not possibly come in touch with them?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; not with each one individually. But there are many opportunities to meet them—in the evenings and in their assemblages, their societies, discussions, in which the managers and the submanagers could get pretty close and keep pretty close with them there. It is a great deal the personal equation, in my judgment. We have all kinds of managers. Some make trouble every chance they get and some do not. And so it comes.

I may tell you an experience. Some years ago I went up to a mine that was situated in Colorado about 13,000 feet above sea level, and the men are locked in there all winter, four or five months, and you can imagine the discontent that arises in a place like that, how they hate the sight of one another, even the best of them. I went over on what is called an aerial tram line about 3 miles and got to the men. They were just ready to kill everybody that had anything to do with the company. I called them in. I had a talk with them. I said, "I am not the offender. I have not been here for a year. You can not have it in for me particularly. Now, what is the trouble?" They said, "That Italian cook." I said, "What is the matter with the Italian cook?" "Well, he gives us the same old thing from time to time to time again. Same thing Monday, same thing Tuesday, and the same thing Wednesday." So I called the cook in and I said—told him what they had said, and he admitted it. I said, "How many things can you cook? Take potatoes. Can't you do better than boil potatoes?" I found out really the man could cook potatoes in half a dozen different ways. And so I went on through the list. I said, "Instead of having potatoes boiled on Monday and then Tuesday and then Wednesday, have them boiled on Monday, and then have them fried on Wednesday, and go on through the week and make a meal." I appointed a menu committee of the miners. I said, "You will have to decide what kind of meals you are going to have." The thing went all around. I went up afterwards, a year later, and the same conditions—peace and prosperity—prevailed. If the manager had been able to get up there, he could have stopped it. They were on the point of a strike—for nothing. That is the whole thing.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You believe, then, that the secret lies in the "get-together" idea?

Mr. HAMMOND. I do absolutely. You can not have any peace without it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is, the long-distance manager is apt to bring about the evil results?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think so. Of course, it is not possible for a board of directors running large corporations to be able to personally visit all those different corporations. But unfortunately I do not think most of the directors would do any good if they went there, because they have never been up in touch with labor. That is the whole trouble. A man born in New York City who has never been West and rubbed elbows up against the people and has never shaken the hand of a workingman. Take the mining case—that he can not talk to them in their language; he has no influence with them at all.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. He has got to be one of them?

Mr. HAMMOND. He has got to be one of them; that is it.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You were speaking, Mr. Hammond, about the difference between the job hunting the man and the man hunting the job. Of course, we all realize that when two men are hunting one job wages are low.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And when two jobs are hunting one man wages are high?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Does that not bring about a conflict of interest between the employer and the worker?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. In other words, it is in the interest of the employer that two men shall hunt one job?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is a selfish interest, shortsighted.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. And the interest is contrary when the two jobs are hunting one man?

Mr. HAMMOND. I would rather have it that way, though.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Now, in the interest of two jobs hunting one man, unionism first establishes unionism to minimize the volume of labor, and on the other hand is opposed to immigration to minimize the volume of labor. Do you find yourself in sympathy with those two attitudes of organized labor, first to minimize the supply by unionizing it, and second to minimize the supply by diminishing immigration?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; not that way. I go on the basic principle without regard to how it affects organization or unionism. I am thinking of the welfare of the country generally, because there are a great number of men who do not belong to the union. I am not speaking of the union; I do not care for that at all. I would determine those questions entirely by how it affects the welfare of the American workman generally, whether he belongs to the union or whether he does not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Having that end in view, the welfare of the Republic?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. The welfare of all the people?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. What would be your attitude on the matter of immigration, for example?

Mr. HAMMOND. If I found a million people were coming in here, was going to make an overproduction of labor—

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Oversupply.

Mr. HAMMOND. Oversupply of labor, I would cut down the inequity.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You would not leave the gate wide open?

Mr. HAMMOND. No, sir; I would not.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. Then, your test was, I understood, a moral test rather than illiteracy test?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner O'Connell would like to ask some questions.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Mr. Hammond, on the question of the labor being represented in the directorate of corporations, we will say, you think they would be unfit because of their unfamiliarity with the affairs of business corporations. How about the director who is unfamiliar with the affairs of the company of which he is a director, and which a number of them who have appeared before this commission have stated they know nothing of the business in which they are directors, and stated their unfitness to direct?

Mr. HAMMOND. You refer to the conduct, the actual conduct of operations, do you, the big factories and the mills and all that?

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Yes; a director who is directing, if not on the ground, from away; he is made a director of the business.

Mr. HAMMOND. As I said in the beginning, no self-respecting, high-minded manager would stand the dictation from that kind of a director. I know I should not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The laborer would be as able in that case to direct as a director?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; exactly.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And probably more so because of his familiarity with the business?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; I think he would.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to get your idea of what is an open shop. We have had the open shop advocated before our commission by men in every walk of life, and I think probably most of them would differ as to really what the meaning is. What do you understand the open shop to be?

Mr. HAMMOND. I take it in the broad sense the open shop would take a man whether he belonged to the union or whether he did or not. If he is a union man there is no discrimination against him, and if he is a nonunion man there is no discrimination against him. There is no discrimination against him whatever.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If an employer runs what he calls an open shop, and he don't employ union men, is he operating an open shop, so called?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; he is not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If he discriminates against union men he is not operating an open shop?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; I would not call that an open shop. I think that is very much of a closed shop.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. With the open shop, as I understand, the freedom of the individual to contract for himself; in other words, here is a shop that pays so much money and works so many hours and if you want it take it, and if you don't, don't take it. Has labor a fair chance under that condition of open shop?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think it has, providing you establish the wage, the standard of wage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. But the employer sets the standard of wage, the hours to be worked, and the condition of employment. I come along and want a job as a machinist. I find the wages set, the hours set, the conditions of my employment set. He says, "Yes, I want a machinist. Here are the conditions. If you want to work, take, and if you don't, don't take it." Is that a fair condition or a fair chance in that condition of open shop?

Mr. HAMMOND. There comes the question for the strike, does it not? I mean if those are satisfactory, he is simply taking one extra man; it seems to me he has that right.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Suppose I get the job. I do not like the wage after I get the job, and as an individual I strike; what have I accomplished? What effect have I on the situation?

Mr. HAMMOND. That is where collective bargaining comes in.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I want to get to that.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; that is where it comes in.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I would have no chance?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; not individually.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. In the present industrial world I would have no chance?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; not at all; not individually.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The open shop, with open shop and employees dealing individually?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Now, in the great industrial world of which we are a part, what chance have I as an individual dealing for my own condition of employment?

Mr. HAMMOND. You would not have any; you could not do a thing. You ought to join the union; if you have got the right kind of a labor union, join the union. That is what I would do.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We change our officers occasionally, as we change the officers of our Government occasionally.

Mr. HAMMOND. I understand.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. As I understand the open shop, it means the employer claims to maintain the right of hiring whom he pleases under any condition of employment that the person making an application will work under.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If he is satisfied, and that is a bargain?

Mr. HAMMOND. With always the limitation that he must not work below the right standard of wages, and I always keep that in mind.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. The employer in operating the open shop sets the standard of wages; he does not deal with anybody; he sets the standard of wages, or it is set by his directors; the company sets them.

Mr. HAMMOND. That is coming in sometime. That depends on the laws of the country, of each State, as I understand it, the State law. They have already introduced the law of the minimum wage in some States, and that will prevent the greedy, unreasonable employer trying to establish a standard below what the law requires.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Well, we only have the minimum so far as affects women and children.

Mr. HAMMOND. It will come; it will go on further than that, in my judgment. But I am told labor opposes that; labor itself opposes the minimum wage.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. They do not want to adopt a standard.

Mr. HAMMOND. No; I do not believe in a standard either.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You mean the minimum standard. That is what labor would be afraid of.

Mr. HAMMOND. I do not think that would be. That is the opinion of a great many of the labor leaders; they feel if you establish the minimum wage it would be made a standard of wages.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. If the employer wants to operate what he is pleased to call the open shop and he wants to be fair, should he deal with the employees collectively as to their conditions of employment, agree upon hours and wages and other things that go with it?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. How is he going to do that without some form of organization with his employees?

Mr. HAMMOND. He leaves that to the employees. If they do not wish to take advantage of their right to organize and wish to see him individually by the appointment of a committee simply having a temporary organization, he treats with that committee. If they are organized, then he treats with the organized committee. It is a little difficult to work out. You will get into what you call a twilight zone very often, and that is where the good, intelligent manager can do the most effective work.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. I understand the twilight zone is just what is in this industrial question where we get into it. You have said in the paper that you read that you believe one of the things necessary for peace was profit sharing. But first we must and should have a fair wage.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You mean by that that the wage should first be agreed upon?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And then a system of profit afterwards?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. We have had a number of gentlemen before us who have spoken of profit sharing. Dr. Eliot did this morning. You heard him. And that is used almost as freely as the words "open shop." They have got all kinds of styles, forms, and conditions of so-called profit-sharing plans which are not profit-sharing plans at all.

Mr. HAMMOND. No; a good deal of it is not.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Different bonuses and premiums and things given to stimulate men in the employment in the industry?

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Have you in mind any definite thing you can suggest to the commission as to just what you mean by profit sharing?

Mr. HAMMOND. It is a very difficult thing. You have to depend on each case; in that respect I happen to agree with Dr. Eliot. I do not think there can be any general law worked out as to profit sharing. It must be dependent on the individual case.

I am trying an experiment out in California myself—a company which I happen to control absolutely, where I do not have to consult other directors or shareholders. I do not know how it is going to work out. I would be very glad to let you know the solution of it some time. It is a very difficult problem. You want to do something that is not in the way of giving a man a greater amount than he is entitled to; otherwise he will be discontented. You want to give him as much of the profit as possible above the standard of wage to make it one of the incentives of the development into a good citizen, to give him some hope, with the result that his hard labor will be rewarded. The profit-sharing part of it is not my idea, to give a man enough to live and pay his daily wage. It is something beyond that. It is to enable him to save up for the future. That really is a definite profit sharing.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Would there be a possibility of the employer agreeing upon a plan whereby the wage, the daily rate, might be so arranged that they would get every day the higher rate of wage?

Mr. HAMMOND. I doubt if that is feasible, because the profits can not be determined that way. If you take an industry that is making no profits, very often an industry is kept up in the hope of better times, in order to keep the organization intact and to give their employe'es wages. I do not think at that time the wage earner should expect his profits. It has got to be something that cuts both ways.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. You would not expect him at the time to accept a reduction in wage below the standard rate, would you?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; but I believe in the smaller operations. I do not mean the large corporations. If an employer goes to his men and explains fairly and honestly the exact condition, his temporary embarrassment, I am confident lots of them will say, "We will cut down our wage a little while and you can make it up in better times." I have that much confidence in the fair spirit of the employe'es, if you get the right kind of employe'es and they have your confidence.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is your opinion, Mr. Hammond, that a great portion of our industrial unrest, our strikes and lockouts and boycotts and black lists and all those things that keep society disturbed are the result of the employer and the employe'e not getting together and meeting each other?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And seeing each other?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think so.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And understanding each other?

Mr. HAMMOND. Absolutely.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. Is that not fundamentally at the bottom of all of our troubles?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think the employer has been unreasonable. I know very many of them can not see the other side at all. Of course, you sometimes have the same kind of trouble with the labor agitator. I must be fair in that way, but the unreasonable man is being put out of commission. The people have not any use for the pinhead, whether a labor agitator or a politician or whether he is an employer. The people of this country are broad-minded and they want the man that is level-headed and is fair. That is all. I think the conditions are very much better than they have ever been, and what we want is plenty of publicity.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Commons would like to ask a few questions.

Commissioner COMMONS. Is your idea that unions should be made responsible for damages, civil damages in case they have damaged the property or business of an employer—legally?

Mr. HAMMOND. You mean going to the question of whether unions should be compelled to incorporate?

Commissioner COMMONS. Well, not necessarily incorporate, but in some way should be made liable, from the funds in their possession, should be made liable to the employer in damages?

Mr. HAMMOND. You can't do that if they were not incorporated. I think they should be made, individually, the men that are directly responsible, should be compelled to pay, but I do not think it is fair to hold the union itself responsible, especially if it is not incorporated.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would you favor their incorporation for the purpose, then, that they should be made—

Mr. HAMMOND. I didn't catch the question.

Commissioner COMMONS. Do you favor incorporation of the union so that it may be made liable in damages to the employer for the acts of individuals or their agents?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think it ought to be. It is a poor rule that does not work both ways. But as a matter of fact I would be inclined to be illogical and inconsistent in the attitude toward labor, because I think that until they get a little bit better organized—I mean in the sense of getting more in touch with the big economic conditions—that they ought to be treated with a good deal more leniency. Capital has the advantage of the very best kind of talent and can take care of itself better than labor. I think we can put up with a great deal that is inequitable for the time being in that respect, and of our treatment and exactions from labor. But I have no patience whatsoever with the unreasoning labor agitator, the labor leader and agitator that resorts to violence.

Commissioner COMMONS. But the question would come, if a union has such a leader and through his influence the union damages the property of his employer, would you hold simply that leader liable or would you have a law imposing liability upon the union as a whole?

Mr. HAMMOND. I rather would see the criminal punishment than the civil punishment in a case of that kind.

Commissioner COMMONS. Have no civil damages against either the leader or the union?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; I should not. I would make the man that causes the infraction personally responsible as a malefactor.

Commissioner COMMONS. And if he had committed a crime or inflicted damage or trespass in the way in which you have mentioned, acting for the union, would you hold the other members of the union liable also?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; I think that public sentiment would control that a good deal.

Commissioner COMMONS. Would you consider, then, that as the act of particular individuals?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think that is the only redress you can have.

Commissioner COMMONS. You would not incorporate them, or any other means by which the union as a whole could be brought in?

Mr. HAMMOND. That is a pretty difficult question to answer. I might only say ultimately the man punished. If the union is going to exact certain rights, then it has got to be put on a parity with capital in that respect. But I think that a good deal of trouble between capital and labor for the infraction of law can be determined by the punishment of the individual directly concerned.

Chairman WALSH. Commissioner Garretson would like to ask you a question.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Arising out of another question that was asked of you, Mr. Hammond. Would you hold that if an industry, protected by a tariff, went into the markets of the world, was able to sell its product in that market of the world in competition with unprotected production, would you consider that fact alone as a reasonably conclusive proof of one of two things—either that the industry combined in the protection of the tariff or that it was paying less than the wage necessarily guaranteed by that tariff?

Mr. HAMMOND. No. In other words, would I justify the selling abroad of American products cheaper than at home?

Commissioner GARRETSON. Yes.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; I would, most certainly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. You would?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think I can explain to you.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Do so.

Mr. HAMMOND. The only justification is that you can keep your industry running full force here in times of overproduction by sending your material abroad and dumping it abroad. You can meet conditions over there where it is absolutely necessary to sell below the market price in this country. Now, you accomplish something more than that. You are putting out or embar-raising the development of large-scale industry in your foreign competitors, and if you can make them, confine them, to a smaller unit production by keeping their markets or occupying their markets, then you have a better field elsewhere, in some other country, foreign country, to get a higher price for your product. In other words, it is better, it seems to me, for the wage earner that be allowed, because it gives him employment, and it is better for the consumer, because he should get some benefit out of large-scale operations.

Commissioner GARRETSON. If that condition is true as applied to anything but periodic action, what result must it have the year around on the domestic consumer if the goods abroad are sold at less than a profit? Does not the domestic consumer have to pay the freight?

Mr. HAMMOND. Well, now, that is a question, I think, for each individual case. It may be that if a large corporation sells 10 per cent of its output abroad that the very fact that it is able to work up to 100 per cent efficiency instead of 90 per cent would enable them to sell domestically in the home market at a price very much better than if they did not produce that extra 10 per cent because of unrestricted operations, and consequently higher cost of production.

Commissioner GARRETSON. On the other hand, if that industry reduces its production for a very considerable portion of the year, a considerable portion of its plant, would the theory be tenable?

Mr. HAMMOND. If it reduced—I think that is the question for each industry. I do not know how much it would reduce it.

Commissioner GARRETSON. I am only speaking—I am making the industry impersonal.

Mr. HAMMOND. Yes; I understand. But that is done by every other great nation. They do it in England and France and Germany, and must have some justification over there.

Commissioner GARRETSON. In your experience—this is brought up by the twilight zone—have you ever had a practical exhibition of the desire of the laboring man to be taken into partnership, to do more than arrange his wages and the conditions under which he will serve and live?

Mr. HAMMOND. I have never heard of it. Some of these theoretical economists have been agitating the question recently. It was new to me.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Practically that means the twilight zone does not in fact exist?

Mr. HAMMOND. No; not at all.

Commissioner GARRETSON. Your attitude on immigration—if I understand your attitude on immigration, it is founded purely on two things: First, the welfare of the State, and, second, on your conception of what are the responsibilities of the State to furnish labor to a man and pay for it if he desires to work?

Mr. HAMMOND. That is it exactly.

Commissioner GARRETSON. That is all.

Chairman WALSH. What do you consider to be the standard wage for an American workman? I mean unskilled labor.

Mr. HAMMOND. Do you want me to discuss like President Eliot did about that this morning?

Chairman WALSH. No; if you can fix it I wish you would.

Mr. HAMMOND. The corporations would have to fix that. It would depend on the different industries, the conditions in the different sections of the country. I think it could be determined, though.

Chairman WALSH. Who sets the American standards of living?

Mr. HAMMOND. Well, what individuals?

Chairman WALSH. Yes; or what class of individuals or how?

Mr. HAMMOND. I think that is pretty well accepted without ever being definitely formulated. It is pretty well accepted by all disinterested, fair-minded citizens that the man must be able to support his family, not with extravagance, but give them certain things that they demand in the way of comforts, of schooling, and give him enough time to devote to his family, not to simply become an animal, as in the mine, and worked to death. I think it would be difficult to establish just what the standards were or how it would be determined.

Chairman WALSH. Would you suggest any class of workmen or any particular large basic industry in which may be found what would be called an American standard of living, the American standard of living?

Mr. HAMMOND. I never employed any labor that did not live that way, and live pretty well. I found it good business. In the mining, of course, that is different. A great deal of my work has been out in the West, where the men are respectable and educated; where the men are self-respecting, and they demand certain things and they always got them.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. You may be excused—wait a moment. Commissioner Weinstock would like to ask another question.

Commissioner WEINSTOCK. You made some references, in answer to Mr. O'Connell's questions, I think, or Prof. Commons's, about the dynamiters. What, in your opinion, should be the attitude of organized labor among members in their own ranks who commit violence?

Mr. HAMMOND. It should be unrelenting, absolutely unrelenting, relentless. It is one of the unfortunate things that creep into a labor organization, and it is, of course, something that should be condemned not only by the labor organization and American citizens, but in their own interest. And I do not believe it is condoned by the better class of labor leaders at all. I do not think they are so shortsighted, because it affects them; they do not get anywhere by it.

Commissioner LENNON. Mr. Hammond, are the employers of New Jersey under equal obligation, if their hired gunmen did the killing over there without provocation, to prosecute and punish the men who committed it equal with what the labor man would be?

Mr. HAMMOND. Absolutely.

Commissioner LENNON. Do you know of any labor organization that has justified violence in labor disputes?

Mr. HAMMOND. I never have.

Chairman WALSH. That is all. Thank you for your attendance and your testimony. You will be excused permanently.

Mr. John R. Lawson.

TESTIMONY OF MR. JOHN R. LAWSON.

Chairman WALSH. What is your name?

Mr. LAWSON. John R. Lawson.

Chairman WALSH. And your place of residence?

Mr. LAWSON. Denver, Colo.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you lived in Denver, Colo.?

Mr. LAWSON. About seven years.

Chairman WALSH. Where did you live before you came to Denver?

Mr. LAWSON. I lived in several different parts of Colorado; Pueblo, New Castle, and Palisade, principally.

Chairman WALSH. What is your present position or employment?

Mr. LAWSON. I am a member of the international executive board of the United Mine Workers of America, representing district 15, which comprises Colorado, Utah, and New Mexico; and act as international organizer because of that fact.

Chairman WALSH. You addressed a communication to this commission asking to be heard at this time, I believe?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Please state why you wished to be heard at this hearing.

Mr. LAWSON. When the miners of Colorado learned that the Rockefeller Foundation fund was going to be investigated here they felt that it was within their duty to come to New York and request that they be permitted to put their side of the question before the commission, feeling that when every man lost 100 pounds of coal he contributed to the foundation fund; that when he failed to receive payment for dead work he contributed to that same fund; that when he was not paid a sufficient amount of wages for his labor he contributed to that fund. So, Mr. Chairman, we decided to come here and to bring Mr. Edward P. Costigan, our legal representative, with us, and ask your permission to state these facts.

Chairman WALSH. How did you come to occupy your present position with the United Mine Workers of America?

Mr. LAWSON. I was elected by the miners of district 15 to that position.

Chairman WALSH. How long have you held that position?

Mr. LAWSON. I was elected in the fall of 1905, and I have been connected with the international organization since that time.

Chairman WALSH. Are you a practical coal miner?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Were you present during the giving of the testimony of Mr. John D. Rockefeller, jr.?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; I heard most of Mr. Rockefeller's testimony.

Chairman WALSH. Is there anything in the testimony of Mr. Rockefeller that you would care to comment upon?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman, there are several things that I would like to comment on. I would like to comment on some testimony given before this commission and perhaps before the congressional hearing. I have with me a brief document that I have prepared, and I should like, with your permission, to read it into the record.

Chairman WALSH. Do you desire to read it at this time?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes.

Chairman WALSH. You may proceed.

Mr. LAWSON. I would like to state very much, Mr. Chairman, that in giving testimony before this commission at this time relating to the foundation fund and the Colorado situation that I hope to do it without any malice and with the most kindly feeling. And I sincerely hope it will be taken in that way. I feel it my duty that this commission should get at the facts as far as we can give them [reading]:

The Commission on Industrial Relations was created to inquire into the underlying causes of industrial unrest. Speaking for the many thousands of men, women, and children who suffered through the recent coal strike in Colorado, I say to your honorable body that you can well afford to let the testimony of John D. Rockefeller, jr., bring your investigation to an end. Out of this month came a reason for every discontent that agitates the laboring class in the United States to-day, and if remedies are provided for the injustices that he disclosed a long step will be taken away from industrial disturbance.

For more than 10 years he has been a director of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., vested with what is virtually the power of life and death over 12,000 men and their families, for the isolated nature of the coal mining industry lends itself to an absolutism unknown in other activities. This power, let it be pointed out, came to him by no healthful process of struggle and achievement, but entirely through the fact that he was the son of his father. His huge control of men and money was, in effect, a gift that marked the attainment of his maturity.

In those first days, when he might have been expected to possess a certain enthusiasm in his vast responsibilities, Colorado was shaken by the coal strike of 1903-4. It is a matter of undisputed record that a mercenary militia, paid openly by the mine operators, crushed this strike by the bold violation of every known constitutional right that the citizen was thought to possess. Men were herded in bull pens like cattle, homes were shattered, the writ of habeas corpus suspended, hundreds were loaded on cars and dumped into the desert without food or water, others were driven over the snow of the mountain ranges, a governor elected by 15,000 majority was unseated, a man never voted on for that office was made governor, and when there came a thing called peace, the blacklist gave 6,000 miners the choice between starvation or exile. The Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. organized and led that attack on the liberties of freemen, and yet you heard from Mr. Rockefeller's own lips that he never inquired into the causes of the strike, the conduct of his executives or the fate of those who lost. So little interest did he take in the affair, so faint was the impression it made upon him, that he could not even answer your questions as to its larger facts.

To take the place of the banished workers thousands were imported, and the extent of the company's dragnet for new material may be judged from the fact that over 30 languages and dialects have been spoken in the mines since 1904.

Ten years pass, and in 1913 Colorado is once more pushed to the verge of bankruptcy by another strike. Many strike breakers of 1903, reaching the limit of human endurance, followed the example of those whose places they had taken, choosing hunger and cold in tents on the mountain side and plains in preference to a continuance of unbearable conditions in the mines. By actual count, the union was supporting 21,508 men, women, and children in the various colonies in January, 1914.

What course did Mr. Rockefeller pursue in connection with this upheaval of employees? His duty was clear, for he is on record with this admission, "I think it is the duty of every director to ascertain the conditions as far as he can, and if there are abuses, to right them." Putting their justice to one side, the fact remains that we claimed many abuses and cited them specifically.

The statute law of Colorado ordered a semimonthly pay day, checkweighmen so that we might not be cheated, the right to form unions, the eight-hour day, and payment in cash—not scrip. We charged that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. had violated these and other laws, and in addition we told of evil housing conditions, high rents, company-store extortions, saloon environment, armed guards, and the denial of freedom in speech, education, religion, and politics. When 12,000 men back up such claims by taking their wives and children into wind-swept tents, surely they would seem to be deserving of consideration.

Yet upon the stand, throughout three whole days this week, John D. Rockefeller, jr., insisted that he was absolutely ignorant of every detail of the strike. He stated that he had not received reports on labor conditions, he could not tell within several thousands how many men worked for him in Colorado, he did not know what wages they received or what rent they paid, he had never considered what the proper length of a working day should be, he did not know what constituted a living wage, and, most amazing of all, he had never even read the list of grievances that the strikers filed with the governor of Colorado and gave to the world through the press. He did not know whether or not 50 per cent of his employees worked 12 hours a day, and when asked whether or not he considered 12 hours a day in front of a blase furnace to be a hardship he answered that he was not familiar enough with the work to judge. He did not know how many of his employees worked seven days a week the year around, but judged that it would be a hardship, yet when asked what part of a year could be worked under such conditions without hardship, refused to approximate an opinion.

He knew that there was a system by which injured men or their families were compensated, yet he did not know what the system was, and when a list was read showing the beggarly amounts paid to cripples, mangled miners he would say nothing but that they were not matters that a board of directors would pass on. He did not know that his company's control of the courts had resulted in a condition where not one damage suit has been filed against it in years, and he did not know that men were treated like criminals for daring to mention unionism. He could not even define collective bargaining, nor had he ever made the slightest study of the great union or its principles against which the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. threw its power and its millions. He expressed himself in favor of unions and then proceeded to negative this belief by refusing to answer affirmatively a number of questions that bore upon the manner in which unionization could be achieved. Asked whether he would vote to discharge an executive officer if it should be proved that he had spent money to corrupt the electorate, he answered, "I should want to know the conditions." He did not know what the capitalization was of the subcompany that operates the mine stores or what it paid on the investment.

He did not know that the company built special buildings for saloons, charging high rental, or that church meetings were compelled to be held near saloons, and that in some cases saloons were in close contact with the schools. He knew that the company had maintained a sociological department, but he did not know what its activities were, nor was he aware that his officials dictated the appointment of our preachers and school-teachers, and exercised the right of discharge if they offended by criticism. As an excuse for this amazing lack of knowledge, he insisted that the board of directors had placed control of such matters in the hands of J. F. Welborn and L. M. Bowers and held them responsible for wise and just administration of labor affairs. He admitted that, aside from these two, he had knowledge of no others who would be responsible for labor conditions.

On the witness stand, L. M. Bowers, who gave his residence as Binghamton, N. Y., stated that he was concerned only with the finances of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., and knew nothing of labor conditions. J. F. Welborn admitted that until his election to the presidency he had been connected with the sales department, always in Denver, and that it was not his habit to visit the mines. They pointed to E. H. Weitzel as the man in charge of labor conditions, and Weitzel stated that while he did not visit all the camps "frequently" he got to them as often as he could.

What has been Mr. Rockefeller's attitude to this development? Has he, in spite of his own lack of knowledge, instituted any investigation to discover whether Bowers and Welborn, his trusted executives, are equally ignorant and indifferent? I invite him to point to one single admission that would show the slightest activity in this direction or the least intent to summon these men before the board of directors to give an account of their stewardship. His answer was, "I have not had the opportunity." Fourteen months thousands of men, women, and children suffered on the mountain sides and prairies, and two more months have gone since we called off the strike as a result of President Wilson's proposal, and yet he has not had the opportunity for a personal investigation. His excuse for his lack of knowledge and his failures is that he is "too busy." What is his business? He explained it by stating that "I spend a large part of my time in directing, with others, the various foundations which my father has established and in giving time to questions of investment." I beg you to contrast this attitude with that of Henry Ford, a man who has built up his tremendous business with his own hands, and who follows every detail in its huge ramifications, and yet who finds the time to take a deep personal interest in every one of the 18,000 workers in his employ.

In reply to this, he spoke of the rich returns given by Ford business as compared with the beggarly returns of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. He complained that his father had only received \$371,000 in all of his stock, which was but a $3\frac{1}{2}$ ($\frac{7}{2}$) per cent interest on the cash investment. It was only under questioning that he confessed that his father had received \$8,889,000 from his bonds; that the assets of the company were \$23,000,000 in excess of liabilities; and that this item did not take in an appreciation in property values of some \$19,000,000. Nor did he mention the vast holdings that the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. refuses to develop, keeping it idle while the population increase adds to its value.

Let me say to you in this connection—and I have spent a large part of my life in direct contact with the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co.—that whatever appearance of poverty clings to the company is not due to anything but its own stupid and corrupt policy. Had it taken the money it has spent in controlling officials and the electorate, in purchasing machine guns, the employment of gunmen, and in crushing the aspirations of human beings and spent it in wages and the improvement of working conditions they would have had rich returns in increased productivity. Henry Ford's 15 per cent wage increase, it will be noted, was followed by a 30 per cent increase in efficiency.

These, Messrs. Commissioners—this record of indifference respecting human life and human happiness—are vital causes of industrial discontent. An employer who is never seen, and whose power over us is handed down from man to man until there is a chain that no individual can climb; our lives and our liberties passed over as a birthday gift or by will; our energies and futures capitalized by financiers in distant cities; our conditions of labor held of less account than dividends; our masters too often men who have never seen us, who care nothing for us, and will not, or can not, hear the cry of our despair.

There is another cause of industrial discontent, and this, too, flows from a Rockefeller source. This is the skillful attempt that is being made to substitute philanthropy for justice. There is not one of these foundations now spreading their millions over the world in showy generosity that does not draw those millions from some form of industrial injustice. It is not their money that these lords of commercialized virtue are spending, but the withheld wages of the American working class.

I sat in this room and heard Mr. Rockefeller read the list of activities that his foundation felt calculated "to promote the well-being of mankind"—an international health commission to extend to foreign countries and peoples the work of eradicating the hookworm, ten millions for the bureau of municipal research, a retreat for migratory birds in Louisiana, $100,000 for the American Academy in Rome, the promotion of medical education and health in China, thirty-four millions for the University of Chicago, one million for the Belgians, $20,000 a year for widows' pensions in New York, the investigation of vice conditions in Europe, and thirty-four millions for a general education board. A wave of horror swept over me during that reading, and I say to you that that same wave is now rushing over the entire working class in the United States. Health for China, a refuge for birds, food for the Belgians, pensions for New York widows, university training for the elect, and never a thought or a dollar for the many thousand of men, women, and children who starved in Colorado, for the widows robbed of husbands, children of their fathers, by law-violating conditions in the mines, or for the glaring illiteracy of the coal camps. There are thousands of Mr. Rockefeller's ex-employees in Colorado to-day who wish to God that they were in Belgium to be fed or birds to be cared for tenderly.

As if this were not enough, labor is now informed that this foundation has appropriated $1,000,000 for the purpose of doing what this commission was appointed to do. An industrial-relations division has been formed to find out why we are discontented. Who, let it be asked, are the directors of this foundation out of which comes this investigation? The two Rockefellers; their professional advisers, Murphy, Gates, Green, and Heydt; their secretaries, Flexner and Rose, on the Rockefeller pay roll; and three others, Eliot, Hepburn, and Judson, who furnish an outward appearance of independence. The same control that has directed the affairs of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., the same voice that declared through young Rockefeller that the defeat of the union in Colorado was a great American principle, for which he was willing to sacrifice his money and the lives of his workers; and they ask the laboring class to believe that what they feel as coal-company directors they will not feel as directors of the foundation.

And who is the man chosen to conduct this million-dollar investigation into industrial unrest? One Mackenzie King, an alien, whose contribution to the industrial problem is a law that prescribes a jail sentence for the worker who dares to lay down his tools. If labor had any doubt as to his real intent, that doubt was removed by the letter read at this hearing. Under date of August 6, 1914, Mackenzie King wrote to John D. Rockefeller, jr., as follows:

"It will not be long, however, before the inevitable effects of the European war on American labor conditions are certain to make themselves felt, and, once this becomes apparent, the unions will have to revise considerably some of their present policies. Looking at the ultimate rather than the immediate effect, there is, speaking generally, going to be a large amount of unemployment as a consequence of the war; in certain industries it is going to be easy for employers to find all the labor they desire, and unions will be confronted with a new problem. Here, it seems to me, lies a possible avenue of approach toward restoring normal conditions in Colorado."

The same thought was stated by President Welborn in a letter to Director McClement when he expressed pleasure over a 2-foot fall of snow in Colorado, exclaiming, "This ought to make a good many of the strikers who are living in tents provided by the organization to seek the comfortable houses and employment at the mines."

Even were the source of the investigation less objectionable, what bearing can it possibly have on existing conditions? Mr. Rockefeller himself admitted that the Mackenzie King investigation will probably take many years. What is labor to do in the meantime? What is Colorado going to do? In response to this, Mr. Rockefeller says that "the problem now is for all concerned to develop increasing good will." Labor has been crushed by machine guns and hired soldiery; men, women, and children have died; homes have been ruined and futures blighted; new thousands have been imported for another decade of exploitation; and we are to "let bygones be bygones."

Mr. Rockefeller, sr., is quoted as saying that God must be brought to New York. In Colorado there is a suffering multitude that asks only for a little of the spirit of the Christ who died for human brotherhood.

The causes of industrial unrest, Mr. Commissioners, are not to be removed by promises of endless investigations or by a sudden willingness to hold conferences. They lie in the treatment of free men not as chattels, to be disposed of by deed and will, in absentee landlordism, in the theft of natural resources, or in indifferences to the necessities and aspirations of those who toil in the dark for the benefit of those in the light. Nor will Mr. Rockefeller's proposal for the election of men in coal camps meet the needs of collective bargaining. This is in truth the shadow and not the substance, for men so elected, unless backed by an organization wider even than State lines will be utterly helpless in the hands of those who have sanctioned past grievances.

Nothing has been more clearly shown by your investigation than that workers are unable to protect themselves as individuals, but can only gain this protection through organization in local, State, National, and international forms. It has been admitted by great operators that wage scales in nonunion mines, as well as the working conditions, are based upon the wages and conditions won by the efforts of organized labor.

In theory, at least, Mr. Rockefeller agrees to the principle of unionism. All that remains is to give his theory purpose and effect, something that can not be done by simple expressions of good will or a suddenly expressed desire for meetings.

The United Mine Workers of America is the one organization that represents labor in this great industry. It has been in existence for 25 years. It has a present membership of more than 400,000 and enjoys contractual relations with employers in 17 States. It has kept these contracts inviolate.

With these facts held clearly in mind, I insist that Mr. Rockefeller can not give effect to his new point of view except with the cooperation of the United Mine Workers of America. By official conference with the executives of this organization action should be taken to guarantee the enforcement of the mining and labor laws long violated in Colorado and the establishment of the principle in practice of collective bargaining.

Press reports give great publicity to meetings that are alleged to have been arranged between Mr. Rockefeller and the United Mine Workers' officials. Let me say on that subject that our one great desire is for lasting industrial peace. We rejoice that after all these years Mr. Rockefeller is at last disposed to consider and confer with the workers his company officials have despised, ignored, and endeavored to crush.

We welcome any and every conference, but these meetings should be official and purposeful, not mere social visits designed to give the utterly false impression that industrial war has had no more vital cause than a failure on Mr. Rockefeller's part to shake hands. So far as possible the remedies must equal and be as real as our great wrongs. [Applause.]

Chairman WALSH. We must have perfect order, please.

In your opinion, Mr. Lawson, does the machinery for securing representation by the men in the management of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., as outlined by Mr. Rockefeller, and now being put into effect in Colorado, constitute an effective basis for collective bargaining?

Mr. LAWSON. No, Mr. Chairman, it does not.

Chairman WALSH. Why not?

Mr. LAWSON. In the first place, under the plan as outlined by Mr. Rockefeller and being put into effect by the operators in Colorado, the men are completely at the mercy of the operators, as much as they ever were, for this reason: Under this plan the miners have no organization behind them, they do not even have a local union organization, and the miners in this country to-day, without local unions, without State organizations, and without an international organization to stand behind them in enforcing their just demands, are without power, and I say again, entirely at the mercy of the employers.

Chairman WALSH. What are the essentials of collective bargaining?

Mr. LAWSON. The essentials of collective bargaining are strong unions on each side, with a division of power in which each side may be represented properly and equally by those who are intelligent enough to bring about and negotiate agreements and have power enough to enforce just demands.

Chairman WALSH. Why do you say a national organization is required? Why would not a State or even a local organization do as well?

Mr. LAWSON. Because, in this day and age of great combinations of capital—great corporations combined—labor must also put itself in a position, that when the workers are compelled to strike against injustice, they shall have some way—they must have some manner of getting relief from some other source than among themselves, and they can not do that, Mr. Chairman, for the reason that if a body of men have been compelled to go on strike—working men, the world over, are usually within a very few days of starvation, and it is necessary to have this relief so that they can maintain themselves and exist until the employers shall grant their demands.

Chairman WALSH. I wish you would review briefly the history and form of the organization of the United Mine Workers and its aims and policies?

Mr. LAWSON. The United Mine Workers of America is a democratic organization—an organization formed by and with all the miners and those who work in and about the mines in this country. Its purposes are, first, to protect life and limb and health; to raise wages to a point above the standard cost of living, or placed above the cost of living; to care for the sick, to bury the dead; to help assist the orphans and the widows; to bring about better working conditions and more sanitary conditions, and to give the child of every man an equal opportunity for an equal education.

Chairman WALSH. How many members are there in the organization?

Mr. LAWSON. The United Mine Workers have an organization of something over 400,000 members.

Chairman WALSH. Can you mention how many States of the Union it operates in?

Mr. LAWSON. The mine workers' organization operates in about 20 States.

Chairman WALSH. What has been the influence of the organization as to moral, social, and economic condition of its members and of the community in which they live?

Mr. LAWSON. The effect on the communities has been great, Mr. Chairman. Where there is organization the men have the right and full freedom of enjoying their religious, social, political, and industrial freedom. In places where there is no organization this, so far as my observation goes, and speaking for Colorado, does not exist.

Chairman WALSH. What is the attitude of the coal operators in the States where mine workers are under contract with your organization?

Mr. LAWSON. The attitude of the operators in the States where our organization has contracts has been friendly. They get together and negotiate wage agreements for, say, a period of two years at a time, and during that period there is always, or very nearly always, a period of industrial peace, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. What is the policy of this organization toward strikes?

Mr. LAWSON. The policy of the United Mine Workers of America is that strikes shall only be used as a last resort—not until every other means of effecting a settlement has failed will or can there be any strike.

Chairman WALSH. Does your organization seek written contracts with the employers?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. What is your reason for doing that?

Mr. LAWSON. There are several reasons. In the first place, it gives a stability to the industry; it gives the operators a chance to make contracts, and they know that for the period of that contract there is not going to be any strikes. And there is another reason: In the coal mines the work is mostly contract, and the worker is paid so much a ton or so much a yard, as the case may be, and therefore it is necessary to stipulate exactly what each kind of work is going to be paid, so the men may know and have an understanding.

Chairman WALSH. Will you please tell the commission, Mr. Lawson, what has been your practical experience in mining outside of your activity as an officer of the Mine Workers' organization?

Mr. LAWSON. My experience, Mr. Chairman, has been perhaps somewhat varied. I have worked in a number of different States and under a good many different kinds of conditions. I commenced working in or around the coal mines when I was 8 years of age; I worked in the anthracite breakers in Pennsylvania at that time.

Chairman WALSH. Where were you born?

Mr. LAWSON. I was born in Pennsylvania, in Schuylkill County.

Chairman WALSH. Was your father an American citizen?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir; and a coal miner formerly.

Chairman WALSH. What is your nationality?

Mr. LAWSON. My parents are Scotch.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed; you say you commenced in the mines as a breaker boy when you were 8 years old?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Chairman WALSH. Following that condition, give your actual experience as a miner.

Mr. LAWSON. I worked the mines of Pennsylvania, and after I grew up I went West. I went out first to Oregon and worked there a while prospecting in coal and returned from there to Colorado, or, rather, to Wyoming, and worked in Rock Springs, Wyo., in the mines there, and then went to Colorado and worked in the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. and other companies in the State mostly since that time.

My experience as a coal miner has been varied on account of the many different conditions that surround a coal miner's life.

The dangers that men are confronted with is one of the things that I feel a great many people do not take into consideration. I feel—in fact, I know, that the corporations which have no close contact with their employees never can realize, never can understand, what the men undertake in their behalf or what dangers they go through in working for the companies. I want to cite one little incident that occurred in my experience in Colorado, which occurred at New Castle, in one of the mines of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co. This mine was known to be one of the most gaseous mines in the country, a mine the dust of which was very highly explosive. This mine had a vein of coal about 60 feet thick. It was worked on what we call—it was a pitching vein, by the way.

Chairman WALSH. What is a pitching vein?

Mr. LAWSON. This vein of coal pitched at an angle of about 55°.

Chairman WALSH. Proceed.

Mr. LAWSON. This mine took fire, and, as I stated, it was commonly known to be full of gas, or made a great deal of gas, and the dust was highly explosive. The mine took fire, and the men employed at that mine, although they knew this character of the mine, stayed in the mine until just a short time before the fire finally came in contact with the gas and blew the mine up; in fact, almost literally blew it to pieces—that is, the entry in which they were working. Every one of the men, and I want to speak for the other men there at work and not for myself—all of the men remained there, notwithstanding all those dangers and notwithstanding the hardships existing, notwithstanding the bad air, caused by the smoke. The entries were full of smoke and occasionally a great flame would go down the entries. Two or three of the men were burned in this manner, but they stayed there uncomplainingly until it was decided that the mine could not be saved and that the only thing to do was to get out of the mine and fill it with water, which was done. But before the water managed to reach the fire, the gas and fire got together, and the explosion occurred. This, Mr. Chairman, with a great many experiences which I will not take the time to relate, is the life of a coal miner. Those are some of the hardships the men undergo, and those are some of the things his family must continually bear in mind while he is working in the mine.

Chairman WALSH. In the pamphlet which has been introduced in evidence here, entitled "Facts in Regard to the Colorado Situation," it is noted that at page 49 there is a criticism of what is known in the coal industry as the "check-off system," and it is mentioned as being obnoxious and tyrannical. What is the check-off system?

Mr. LAWSON. What is commonly called the check-off system, Mr. Chairman, is the checking off of the union dues by the clerk of the company, who is given the amount of dues to be checked off by the secretary of the local union. This is turned in at the end of every pay period, for illustration; and the clerk simply deducts from the pay of each and every man who toils in or about the mines or belongs to the union the amount of the dues or assessments charged against him. I want to say in connection with this, that the check off has received a great deal of criticism from the operators and has been held up to ridicule and to the scorn of the public all over the land, and I want to say that in my almost 36 years' experience in or about the coal mines the operators themselves have employed constantly the use of the check-off system. It was they who inaugurated this system, because they took off from the pay of every man, without his consent; and I want to say in connection with the checking off of dues, that the dues are checked off after the men have given their consent to have them checked off, after they have given in many instances a written order to the company to have their dues checked off; but the operators arbitrarily take away from the men their rent, for instance, their store, their board; they check off for the company doctor; they check off for tools, for tool sharpening, for powder, fuse, caps, coal, and for oil and things of that kind, Mr. Chairman.

Chairman WALSH. Is there any difference, so far as the experience of the individual miner is concerned, who seeks employment in the coal camps of southern Colorado, where unions exist and where they do not exist? And, if so, state what those differences are.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman, there is a good deal of difference. The fact of the matter is, I think the difference might be summed up by saying that in union camps men who seek work spend just so much time in locating a place where men are needed. In the nonunion camps, as a rule, it might properly be termed an experiment. For illustration, let us assume that a single man should be in one of the southern field camps in our State and was seeking work; let us assume that he may be given a job. There is no organization; there is no one there to advise him as to what the conditions are, because the men who have worked in the mines there realize that if they are found talking to any one to the extent of explaining what the conditions are or telling of any grievances that may exist in the camp, those men realize they can not remain in that camp and work. This man may go there and get a job. If he is a man that has a lot of backbone and is not afraid of the boss, he might ask the boss what he pays a ton for his coal; he might ask the boss of the yard for his yardage; he might ask if he is paid for dead work.

Chairman WALSH. What is dead work?

Mr. LAWSON. Dead work is a thing that comes in during a contractor's experience. For illustration, many veins of coal have impurities between the coal, such as dirt, rock, sulphur, or bone. Many veins of coal have a soft bottom, which continually comes up with the coal, also some have a soft, or what we call a rotten top, which comes down with the coal when the coal is shot down. Those are some of the dead work that the miners are confronted with. If this man should ask those things he might be told the wages paid; he might be told, and as a rule is told, that the company does not pay for dead work except in specific or particular cases. That is no way for him to find out. Then, when he gets to work, he goes into the mine, and the conditions may not be what he had hoped they would be, the wages may not be what he believed he would get, the deductions may be greater, and because of the fact that there is no checkweighman in the tippie he may be greatly surprised to find that his car which may have had 2 tons of coal on it may only have a ton and a half when it gets out of the tippie. This and other things, such as having a place without good air, having a place that has water in it, or any other bad condition. If this man went to the boss and complained about those things he might say, "This is the best I can do for you, and you will have to accept this." If he goes about among the workmen and talks of the bad conditions and of having those conditions made better and having the air carried to the vein, for instance, as described in the mine law, or if he asks about or insists upon being paid for dead work, or similar hardship or timber, he is told that if he does not like it he can go down the canyon. This man may not have enough money to leave this place and go somewhere else to seek a job. As I stated, he has come there actually broke, and after working there 30 days finds himself in no better condition than he was when he went there, and in no condition to quit. If he goes to a camp that is unionized he has his transfer card with him, and that, Mr. Chairman, is his recommendation and his credential. It shows where he came from, whether he was a coal miner or not, and it shows something about his experience. It guarantees, if he goes into a union camp, that he is going among friends, and he can freely ask questions as to whether the mine is safe to work in and what the conditions are, and he can safely ask all about those things. But he can not open his mouth about them in a nonunion camp, because if he does he is told, "It is down the canyon for you."

If this man should happen to be a married man and have a large family, he perhaps works in the mine under those conditions in the hope that day after day something will improve—conditions will improve rather—or that he may get a better place, or that he may save enough money or borrow enough, as the case may be, to move his family into this camp. After he gets his family into the camp he is compelled to live under those conditions and compelled to keep his mouth shut, because there is no union there, or he is under the necessity of being compelled to leave that camp and seek work elsewhere and leave his family in the camp behind him with the full knowledge that the company owns the house, and it is only a matter perhaps of 10 days when his family will be compelled to move from the house and from the property of the company.

Chairman WALSH. What have you to say as to the suggested necessity in closed coal camps of the coal companies controlling the schools, churches, saloons, houses, lands, town officials, the company stores, because of the difficulty of getting outside capital interested in those things?

Mr. LAWSON. There is no more reason or real justification in a coal company owning and controlling a closed camp, and all those things therein, any more than there is in one man owning and controlling the city of New York. Let me say this: It is true that sometimes, because of the isolated position of the coal where mines are opened and operated, that the company must of necessity build some houses, build homes for the men who are going to come there and live, build boarding houses and things of that character; but there is no necessity for that company or corporation forever owning those things, Mr. Chairman. The question has been raised, I have heard it discussed before this commission on several occasions, to the effect that it is absolutely necessary that the company should own those homes and keep them, and that the miners would not want to buy a house in a coal camp.

Let me ask why not. They say a man would not want to buy property where he did not have a permanent job. Let me ask, Mr. Chairman, where is there a workman in these United States who is permanent. His job is from day to day, just the same in a coal camp as elsewhere. I know the mines in Colorado. They have been working ever since I first went to that State. And when I happened to be in Pennsylvania a few weeks ago I passed near by a coal mine—it is the Alaska breaker, to make it specific, located in Alaska, in Northumberland County—that I worked at myself 35 years ago. Now, I don't see any reason why a man should not have a right to own his own home, the right to buy his own home, even if the company did build it. If a man were able to buy his own home he could invest the few dollars he would be able to save, if he could save any, in purchasing that home in the place of paying rent. In a few years, if he stayed there, he will pay for that home, whereas, otherwise he would have to pay out nearly as much for rent. Let us assume he was not able to continue work in this particular mine, that for any reason, whether he is discharged or quits of his own volition, or for any other reason—why he could sell that home to some one else, or he could rent the home to some one else. I don't see any reason why he could not own the home as well as the company.

Now, so far as the store is concerned, I will agree that it is a difficult question to answer. Perhaps as a matter of convenience to the employees and to the company, too, the company should start out and establish a company store in the camp; but there is one thing, Mr. Chairman, in connection with that that I want to say, that the miners of Colorado have no objections to any company establishing a store in any camp, so long as they leave the gate open for men to come in from the outside to sell their goods to them, or so long as they leave their gate open for their employees to go elsewhere and spend their money in the purchase of the necessities of life as they choose, and where they see fit.

Chairman WALSH. Isn't that done?

Mr. LAWSON. It is not, Mr. Chairman. It has not been done in the closed camps in Colorado. There are other things in connection with that matter. You take, for illustration, the doctor question. There is another question that has aggravated the miners of Colorado for a great many years. Why should men who are willing to pay, and who do pay their money for a doctor to take care of themselves or their families, why should they be compelled to take the choice of some company official who has not the interest in their family that they must have themselves. Why should they employ a man and have, say, 500 or 300 men or 200 men pay this man a dollar a month, and then pay the fellow perhaps $75 or $100 a month for the services rendered to the men? Why should they have a right to select their own doctor? Why should they not have the right to see who it will be that will enter their home, perhaps when they are at work in the mine, to look after the welfare, so far as the practice of the physician is concerned, of their families and their babies. I say, Mr. Chairman, of all the things—all the wrongs that have been done, that the miners of Colorado have suffered, that has been one of the grievances that they have been justified in complaining against. They should have a right to select their own doctor.

I was going to say, further, than that, the question of the boarding place has been brought up here. It is also true that, as a matter of convenience, the company has a right to build a boarding house. It has a right to perhaps bring some one in to take care of the boarding house, but, I ask the question, Mr. Chairman, has any company or any man in this great country of ours the right to say that you must board there when you yourself pay the bill? I say they have not.

Chairman WALSH. Are you familiar with coal-mine disasters and industrial accidents in Colorado? And also with the compensation ordinarily paid there for accidents and deaths?

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, Mr. Chairman. I am more or less familiar with nearly every mine disaster that has happened in Colorado since I have been there, and with some, through reading of them and being told about them, before I went there. I shall not enumerate the number or particular accidents in the coal mines of Colorado except to say that in no place in the world, in the coal-mining industry, have there been so many and so great terrible coal-mine explosions and disasters as we have had in Colorado. Men—speaking as I was a while ago of camps that are closed and where no organization can exist—the men have no opportunity, without jeopardizing the job, of insisting that the conditions must be remedied if they are wrong; and notwithstanding that we have had coal-mining laws on our statute books, not perhaps the best law, for a great many years; but there has been a coal-mining law on our statutes for about 25 years. Notwithstanding that fact, year after year has seen the coal mines of Colorado the scene of the greatest explosions and disasters, the greatest loss of life, of any place in the world. Men can not, as they would in a union camp, even find fault, or they can not, as they would in a union camp, notify the mining inspector of the conditions that exist there without jeopardizing their positions.

Now, so far as compensation is concerned for death or injury, I think again that Colorado leads the world in the lack of compensation paid to these people who have lost their lives in the mines through explosions, accidents, and so forth. I would like, Mr. Chairman, to just read briefly the amount of money, amount of compensation paid to the miners of Colorado for the year 1913, or to those who were left after them. I will just state that this amount was paid, or assumed that this amount was paid only to the families or the dependents of those who have been killed, and I will not say anything about the 354 miners who have been injured in the mines, but speak of the 110 cases where the men have been killed. They were paid—but I want to say further in this connection, the mine inspector's report from which I read this or copy it states that there are still some claims pending that he was not able to get. I want to be as fair as I can in the matter, so as not to leave a wrong impression; but I think most of us can easily understand just about how much may be still pending in the State of Colorado. There was paid in the year 1913 $33,593.63 for compensation to those who were killed and injured.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. There were 110 men killed.

Mr. LAWSON. Yes, sir.

Commissioner O'CONNELL. And in the case of those 110 men—

Mr. LAWSON (interrupting). No; that is the case of the 110 killed and 354 injured, but basing it just on those that were killed, I think you will find that it figures out something like $350.40 per man killed in the mines of Colorado. That, Mr. Chairman, is the amount of compensation paid to those people and their dependents. I would like to read briefly the report on a few of the accidents.

Chairman WALSH. What is it you are proposing to read now?

Mr. LAWSON. Just the names and the reports of accidents where men were killed; just a very brief few names, Mr. Chairman; I think 9 altogether, or probably 10.

Chairman WALSH. Go ahead then.

Mr. LAWSON. Perfecto Clark, Mexican; this was January 2; car oiler on tipple; age, 17; was killed by having his arm torn off; was caught in gear wheel at the Delagua mine, operated by the Victor-American Fuel Co., in Los Animas County.

January 3: James Batey, American; miner; age, 52; married; eight children; was killed by a fall of coal in the South Canyon mine, operated by the South Canyon Coal Co., in Garfield County.

January 3: William Snedden, Scotch miner; age, 55; married; two children; and Andrew Snedden, Scotch miner; age, 16; were killed by fall of coal at the Reliance mine, operated by the Alliance Coal Co., in Huerfano County.

January 10: Joe Mohora; night pump man; age, 45; married; five children; was electrocuted by coming in contact with live wire at the Royal mine, operated by the Royal Fuel Co., in Las Animas County.

Chairman WALSH. What year was that?

Mr. LAWSON. In 1913.

April 15: Narso Dami, an Italian; miner; age, 37; married; five children; was killed by fall of roof at the Pinnacle mine, operated by the Routt County Fuel Co., in Routt County.

April 22: Alegro Bonmolos, Mexican; miner; age, 28; married; three children; was injured by fall of rock at the Morley mine, operated by the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., in Las Animas County; died April 23.

May 3: Mike Streenar. English; miner; age, 57; married; six children; was killed by fall of rock at the Williamsville mine, operated by the Thomas Coal Co.

Chairman WALSH. At this point the hearing will stand adjourned until tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock. Please resume the stand to-morrow morning at 10 o'clock.

(Thereupon at 4.30 o'clock p. m. of Friday, January 29, 1915, an adjournment was taken until 10 o'clock of Saturday, January 30, 1915, at the same place.)
